YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 24TH, 1907.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

MR. K. ONO has been appointed Judge in the Yokohama District Court.

THE BRITISH squadron left Otaru on the morning of Aug. 17th for Vladivostok.

EARTHQUAKE shocks were felt in Kagoshima at 2 p.m. and 3.40 p.m. on Aug. 17th.

COLONEL S. Koidzumi has been promoted to the rank of Major General and placed on the reserve list.

A BOMB of a raw silk factory in the village of Minato, Suwa, Nagano prefecture, exploded on Aug. 15th. Twenty one female workers were injured.

It is reported by a London telegram which was received on Aug. 15th in Tokyo that the price of silver was gradually going up in London and New York making the quotations 32 1/4 pence and cents 69 3/4 respectively. It is said that special enquiries have appeared in India and China.

MR. Y. AKIBA, headman of Muroran, on the evening of Aug. 20th, was arrested at a tea-house in Sapporo on suspicion of fraud.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha's steamer Yoshinogawa Maru, early on the morning of Aug. 18th, went ashore off Moriye, Oita prefecture. Details are not yet to hand.

THE Tsukuba and Chitose arrived at Lisbon on Aug. 17th. The King of Portugal visited the Tsukuba and dined on board. On the following day the cruisers left for Naples.

A THUNDER storm was experienced in the district of Ogata, Nagano prefecture, on the evening of August 19th. A farmer who was working in the fields was killed by lightning.

OWING to heavy weather, a lighter with railway materials capsized off Haneda at 5 p.m. on Aug. 16th on the way from Yokohama to Tokyo. The sendoes were all saved by a launch.

ON AUG. 16th, a storm was experienced in Nagano, Shizuoka, Yamaguchi and Gumma prefectures. The usual inundation occurred causing damage to buildings, bridges, railways, &c.

A STORM was experienced in Akita prefecture on Aug. 17th. The rivers Onono and Asahi overflowed. Over two hundred houses in Akita were flooded. Traffic on the railway was stopped.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha's steamer Maizuru Maru, which left Chemulpo on Aug. 10th for Chinnampo, has gone ashore in the neighbourhood of Tsintao. She is in a serious condition.

MR. K. ISOYA, a Judge of the Court of Cassation, has been appointed President of the Yokohama District Court as successor to Mr. Ishii, who was recently removed to the Formosan Supreme Court.

A PASSENGER train and a freight train collided on Aug. 20th at Sugakawa station, Fukushima prefecture. The locomotives were damaged. A conductor and fifteen of the passengers were injured.

A FREIGHT train on the Nippon Railway, on the morning of Aug. 18th was derailed and overturned at Yumoto Station. The locomotive and three of the carriages were damaged, and a conductor and two firemen injured.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha has purchased the British steamers Tartar (4,425 tons) and Athenian (3,882 tons). The company will employ them on the newly established line between Kobe and Bombay.

A SHANGHAI telegram says that two Japanese were arrested by the Chinese police at Tientsin on Aug. 19th on suspicion of having smuggled thirty rifles and a thousand bullets and delivered the arms to Chinese revolutionaries.

A VLADIVOSTOCK telegram says that a Korean named Thaik has arrived there from Pyongyang. On the evening of Aug. 13th, he delivered a speech in the Korean quarter of the town on the political condition of his country. After the speech, some of the Koreans threw stones at two Japanese business houses. On the following day, Thaik and his supporters distributed printed copies of a manifesto of an anti-Japanese tendency among the Koreans.

ABOUT 6.30 a.m. on Aug. 16th, fire broke out in a warehouse belonging to Capt. Weston, No. 42, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama. The flames were put out before severe damage was sustained. Tobacco ashes are said to have been the cause.

LIEUTENANT T. URAKAMI on reserve, has been arrested in Tokyo. It is said that he was undergoing examination in the Gendarmes' Office, as a witness in the preliminary trial of K. Inamuta, who recently murdered K. Maeta at Shiba Park.

PAYMASTER YANUSCHIFF, of the Russian Army, stationed at Nicholaisk, has absconded with twenty-five thousand roubles belonging to the office. It is said at Vladivostok that the officer proceeded to Japan in company with a Russian woman.

THURSDAY and Friday's storm, which passed over Yokohama very lightly, has done considerable damage in various parts of Japan, stopping railway traffic and breaking the telegraph lines to the southward. Another storm warning has been issued.

UTSZ SONG, a Chinese tailor employed at the Chinese Legation, in Tokyo, committed suicide on the morning of Aug. 18th by drinking a quantity of laudanum and subsequently hanging himself with a cord in the servants' quarters. He had been ill for some days.

A TELEGRAM from Odawara says that on Aug. 15th, heavy rain was experienced in the Hakone district. All the rivers overflowed their embankments, and many bridges on the Miyanoshita road were destroyed. Traffic on the electric railway between Odawara and the Hakone district was stopped.

A WHALING vessel has discovered three reefs below the surface about fifty miles southeast of Kinkazan. The discovery has been reported to the Hydrographic Department. Anxiety is entertained lest the Toyo Fishing Company's steamer Choyo Maru, which has been missing since March, has struck these rocks and been wrecked.

ON the night of August 19th, fire broke out in a warehouse belonging to T. Kawate, a merchant dealing in foreign liquors in Ogawa-cho, Kanda, Tokyo. About twenty houses were destroyed. Two young employees of the merchant were burned to death. A burning candle slipped from the hands of one of the youths and fell into a kerosene can from which the flames spread.

M. YOSHIDA who is charged with murder and robbery, attacked two policemen with a short sword at 9 a.m. on August 21st at East Morishita-cho, Fukagawa, Tokyo, while the officers were trying to arrest him. He inflicted severe injuries on the policemen after which he attempted to commit suicide by cutting his breast with the same weapon.

THE insurance companies concerned in the case of the Takenoura Maru, which recently sunk at Kushiro, Hokkaido, have jointly sent copies of a notice to the ship's owner and the shippers of the cargo, refusing to pay the insurance claims. The reason for this refusal is that the accident was caused through extraordinary negligence on the part of the crew. The ship was insured for eighty thousand yen and the cargo for seventy thousand yen.

KOREA.

Saturday, August 17.

On the 14th inst. an Imperial rescript was issued in Seoul announcing the new Emperor's resolve to change his residence to the Palace formerly occupied by the ex-Emperor. But as large repairs have to be effected on this building, a considerable time must elapse before the ruling and the recent Sovereign are separated.

The Japanese appear to be taking very severe measures in the island of Kanghwa. They are said to have placed sentries at the gates of the town with instructions to examine all persons entering or leaving and to fire on anyone attempting to fly. A proclamation declaring that all arms and ammunition must be surrendered by a certain date, and that if any were subsequently found, the whole district of their discovery would be held responsible, caused something like a panic, and resulted in the handing in of quite a large quantity of rifles, mortars, ammunition and various other war material.

On the 15th inst. a party of 20 Koreans fired 14 shots at the Japanese railway station in Suwon. These rioters were speedily put to flight.

There is as yet no definite news of the party which landed from the Katsuragi in Kwangwon-do at daylight on the morning of the 14th inst. to attack the insurgents who were said to number 3,500—probably an exaggeration—and who were under the leadership of the former commander of the Wonju force. The landing party marched in the first place to Kangneung where the rioting had broken out. This place was occupied without difficulty, and it was then found that the three Japanese officials attached to the post office had been murdered.

At Yoji it has been ascertained that two Japanese policemen were killed together with their families, and one was wounded, on the 12th inst., but the rest managed to escape to Seoul. The upshot of this disturbance is not yet announced.

A telegram to the Mainichi Shimbun announces the imminent issue of an Imperial decree declaring that on the day of his official coronation, which, we believe, is fixed for the 27th inst., the Emperor will dock his top-knot and wear foreign costume. The decree is expected to describe this as an evidence of his Majesty's earnest desire for progress, which desire he calls upon his subjects to reciprocate.

Sunday, August 18.

The Emperor of Korea has issued two edicts, one urging his subjects to follow the example which he purposes himself to set on the occasion of his coronation, namely to dock their top knots and dress their hair in western fashion. The second edict refers to early marriages, which his Majesty denounces as most injurious, but inasmuch as he fixes the inferior limit of age in the case of a man at seventeen and in that of a girl at fifteen, it is evident that this reform is not of a particularly drastic character.

It is expected that Prince Yung will not set out for Japan until after the ceremony of appointing him heir-apparent. There appears to have been some opposition to the choice of Japan as a place of education, the ground for objection being that the real idea is to hold the Prince as a hostage. This obstacle has been overcome.

In their attack on the police station at Yoji the Korean insurgents butchered two Japanese women and a child. Such deeds put them beyond the pale of all sympathy.

It appears that two or three bands of in-surgers contemplate a movement against Seoul. On the whole that would not be an unwelcome feature, since it would tend to the speedy quelling of the disturbance. It is alleged that a number of the fugitive soldiers are still lying hid in the capital, and that they are receiving assistance from certain foreigners by whose aid they have been enabled to obtain machinery for striking nickel coins with which they propose to defray what they call their military expenses.

There has been rather a serious skirmish at a place called Chechon between a half company of Japanese infantry and a large force of Korean insurgents. The Koreans, who were armed with Mauser rifles, managed to throw out a line of skirmishers which completely enveloped the small force of Japanese, and these were obliged to retreat after an engagement lasting four hours. The Japanese had one wounded and eleven missing. At Chiksan and Ansung, both of which places are in the neighbourhood of the capital, the insurgents are busy. They have managed to assassinate three Japanese settlers, and as yet they have not come in contact with any Japanese troops.

A rumour has been circulated lately that a concession had been granted for work at the Kapsan copper mine, which is supposed to be one of the best mining properties in Korea. The rumour is now emphatically denied. When this mine was in the possession of the Household Department, an American citizen obtained some kind of concession which, according to Japanese journals, subsequently proved such a questionable affair and would have established such an evil precedent, that the Residency-General declined to recognise it. Since then the American concessionaires have been moving heaven and earth to get their claim taken up diplomatically, and it is tolerably certain that pending the settlement of this question the mine will remain unworked. It may be mentioned in this context that an Italian subject appears to have obtained a concession of a mine in Pyong-audo, which is regarded as the next in point of richness to that of Kapsan.

Monday, August 19.

The disturbances in the neighbourhood of Seoul have not yet been quelled. It is exceedingly difficult to locate the scenes of these troubles, for the names of places are telegraphed in romaji, which renders it impossible to identify them exactly in many cases. The gist of the matter, however, is that the bulk of the insurgents are operating at places not very remote from the capital. This might have been expected, perhaps, inasmuch as the military fugitives from Seoul would naturally refrain from travelling to any great distance, and thus the neighbourhood of the city was bound to become the scene of their disaffection. The Japanese are massing a considerable force in this region, and a whole battalion has been sent to Chihunchon-do and Kangwon-do, whence news comes of considerable disquiet.

The Asahi Shimbun's Seoul correspondent sends a long but somewhat rambling statement about mining questions. There is evidently great competition among foreign prospectors to obtain concessions. Most of the competing nationalities were satisfied prior to the abdication of the Emperor; but Italy and Belgium remain out in the cold, and the Residency-General is now endeavouring to make arrangements on account of these two Powers also. What complicates the situation is that in former times the Court had a pleasant habit of granting several concessions for the same mine to different people, and it has thus become necessary to draw the pen through the past and make an entirely new departure in the case of the Court properties. This is naturally causing much discontent among people who flattered themselves that they had secured titles, but of course in the circumstances someone is bound to suffer.

Pak Yongho has been acquitted of treason owing to insufficient evidence. He thus now stands accused merely of violation of rules.

Tuesday, August 20.

Quite extensive operations are being taken by the Japanese in Korea to quell the insurrection. The plan seems to be a combined movement from Seoul and Kangneung. The latter place, is on the east coast southward of Gensan, and it will be remembered that a few days ago the Katsuragi carried thither the Gensan garrison. It is expected that in two or three days something decisive will be reported. All the commotion seems to be in the southern provinces, and doubtless the above two forces now converging towards each other will make a clean sweep of the trouble.

The Shogyo Shimpō has a telegram from Seoul saying that the insurgents are in league with 33 foreigners in the latter city, and have thus obtained machines for striking false nickel coins, a quantity of which have already been put in circulation.

Tokyo papers continue to speak confidently of the coming of the Korean Prince Imperial to Japan for educational purposes. They say that he will be accommodated with apartments in the Palace and that he will attend the Nobles' School. But from the Seoul Press we gather that the coming of the Prince has not by any means been so definitely settled as these remarks would imply.

Marquis Ito's policy, according to a statement which deserves all confidence as it is made by the Nichi Nichi Shinbun, will not be modelled upon that of France in Algeria, but will rather follow the lines of England in Egypt and in India. In other words the prominent administrative posts will not be filled by Japanese subjects. They will be left rather in Korean hands and only the really working positions will have Japanese occupants. As to the important question of finance, all matters relating to revenue and expenditure will be under the supervision of the Residency-General and thus it may be briefly said that Korea's financial relation to Japan will be pretty much that of Formosa. At present the State revenue is only 9½ million yen, to which a million will be added by the disbandment of the army. This will not by any means suffice, however. Large increases of expenditure will be involved in carrying out the proposed reforms and the pressing question is whence the money can be obtained. At present the taxes nominally paid by the Korean people do not exceed one yen per head of the population, but undoubtedly the sum actually levied far exceeds that amount, the difference going into the pockets of the tax-collectors. The first step therefore must be to correct this abuse and when that is effected there will be a large increment of revenue. This will not suffice by any means, however, and Marquis Ito, according to the report we are quoting from, considers it necessary either that money should be borrowed or that the Diet should be asked to sanction a considerable appropriation from the Japanese Treasury spread over a long period. (We—Japan Mail—may mention here that Count Okuma has severely criticised the idea attributed to Marquis Ito of making Korea a charge upon the Japanese Treasury. The Count considers that such methods are antiquated and that they betray a certain want of political vigour on the part of Marquis Ito. The Progressists' leader would make Korea pay its own way.)

Mr. Kodama, Marquis Ito's private secretary, is quoted as saying that whereas there were only 60,000 Japanese settlers in Korea at the time of the establishment of the Residency-General, there are now 100,000. This looks like a substantial increase, yet it will not bear comparison with the numbers that emigrate to Hawaii, and other places every year. The reason of the difference is doubtless to be found in the fact that an emigrant to Korea must have some command of capital in order to succeed, whereas an emigrant to Hawaii may go practically empty-handed. Mr. Kodama seems to recommend that official assistance should be given in this matter, but one wonders whether the State's functions are to be regarded as illimitable. Mr. Kodama speaks in the highest terms of a matter which has hitherto attracted no attention in Japan, namely the services rendered by Japanese and Korean ladies in succouring the sick and wounded among the military at the present crisis. It appears that there has been a ladies' patriotic society formed in Seoul, mainly through the exertions of the wife of the former Prime Minister, Mr. Yi Chi-yong, and that it is working in whole-hearted co-operation with its Japanese prototype.

Wednesday, August 21.

It appears to be thought that a spirit of reform has actually penetrated the Palace. Even the ex-Emperor has endorsed and is about to put in practice in his own case the queue-cutting edict, and instructions are said to have been issued for devising a costume which shall combine the good points of the old Korean style with those of the modern European. One curious fact stated with reference to the new Emperor's habits is that his Majesty has been persuaded by the Prime Minister to abandon the traditional superstition in favour of drinking human milk. He found himself opposed in this reform by the ladies of the Household but the advice of his Ministers prevailed. We observe with regret that the new style of wearing the hair is to be enforced whether the people like it or not. Too much tenderness can not be shown in dealing with such questions, and it appears to us that the Yi Cabinet is ill advised when it has recourse to compulsion in this matter. Already there are rumours that the decree with reference to the top knot has caused excitement in the provinces, and is likely to augment the spirit of resistance to the new regime. Having before their eyes the disastrous effects of similar procedure in the times of the Tai-won-kun, Korean statesmen ought to know better than to invoke the aid of the law for regulating the people's coiffure.

The Minister of Home Affairs in Seoul has ordered the dissolution of the Cha-kang-hoi and of the Doyu-kai. We are not clear as to the meaning of this latter term, since various ideographs are used by Japanese journals in transcribing it from the telegrams. At all events we may assume that the coterie stands on the same platform with the Cha-kang-hoi and is therefore conservative. The two associations are said to strongly resent the order for their dissolution, and again we read of their enlisted the sympathies of the Young Men's Christian Association and of the Missionaries for the purpose of organising opposition to the Residency-General. It will be observed, however, that all these rumours about Christian participation in disaffection have hitherto proved erroneous, and the public is not likely to credit them any longer.

Wonju and its neighbourhood appear to be the chief centre of disturbance at present. The nucleus of the insurgents consists of the garrison troops of this place who, at the time of their disbandment, managed to get possession of 1,200 stand of arms and 40,000 rounds of ammunition. They have been joined by a number of civilians, so that they constitute a considerable force which is said to be operating in an orderly manner. The Japanese, as our readers know, are moving against this force from two directions, south-east and north-west. It is reported that great difficulties have to be encountered, since the Japanese forces are unfamiliar with the country and can not obtain the assistance of the natives for scouting purposes, whereas the insurgents of course are furnished with full details of their adversary's movements. The general impression is that this insurrection constitutes the only formidable feature of the situation, inasmuch as the insurgents are under the command of officers who hold them in check and direct their operations with some skill. Meanwhile the disbanding of troops in other parts of the Empire has been effected without any difficulty. Three places, however, remain still to be heard from.

Some months ago there was talk of establishing a big pasturage in the neighbourhood of Pyongyang, under the combined auspices of the two Imperial Households of Japan and Korea. We read that this enterprise is now likely to be consummated, and that the necessary expenses will be obtained from the smokeless coal mine in that district.

The upper reaches of the Yalu were visited by a heavy gale on the 18th and 19th inst. Such torrents of rain fell that the river rose 17 feet and many habitations were swept away or inundated. The bed of the railway in the neighbourhood of Wiju was so much injured that traffic will have to be suspended for six or seven days.

There is quite a good deal of talk in the Japanese press just at present about the formation of a customs union between Korea and Japan, some advocating the scheme and others opposing it. Of course if Korea were an intimate part of the Japanese Empire, such an arrangement would be possible and might be desirable, but the Japanese have to remember that before all things they are pledged to the policy of the open door. No arrangements of the kind suggested by some publicists could exercise any practical effect without discriminating against foreign nations, and if anything of that kind were attempted, the commercial world would be at once up in arms. Besides, there are the treaties that already exist between Korea and Western States. So long as these treaties have any validity their provisions cannot be arbitrarily over-ridden for the purposes of a customs union between Japan and Korea. Japan stands at present on a very delicate ground. Rightly or wrongly she has been charged with ignoring the principle of the open door in Manchuria and discriminating in favour of her own traders. It is very likely that this accusation found its material in the days of the military regime and that it is no longer warranted by facts. But the impression created by it remains, and Japan's obvious business now is to live down these suspicions by an immaculate course of conduct. We do not believe therefore that the idea of a Zollverein between Japan and Korea can be said to enter the field of practical politics. Indeed it is a pity that any Japanese publicists should allow themselves to discuss any such contingencies, for they thus create the impression that the question is under serious official consideration.

Thursday, August 22.

The official coronation of the new Emperor is to take place on the 27th instant. Telegrams from Seoul give some particulars of the projected ceremony but we do not suppose that these have any interest for our readers.

It will be remembered that some time ago a statement was published in Tokyo in the sense that all the mines lately transferred from the Korean Household to the Home Department had been promised to the Iwasaki family through the intervention of Mr. Kiuchi, who was described as a relative of Baron Iwasaki. This story was reproduced by the Japan Gazette and from the columns of the latter, which, by the way, has not yet, so far as we know, published any contradiction—the tale was transferred to the Korea Daily News which, it need scarcely be said, made it the basis of a violent attack upon the Residency-General and on Japanese policy in Korea. An explicit contradiction of the story as made out of whole cloth was officially sent to the Korea Daily News and was doubtless published by it. The simple fact seems to be that this is one of the grossest falsehoods which has ever been ventilated in this part of the world. It bears a close resemblance to a story which has just furnished to the China Gazette a theme for a long diatribe. That journal's statement is that the Japanese Government has taken steps to put its settlers in China on a new basis and to give its officials a large increase of power so far as these settlers are concerned. We in Japan had never heard anything of this until it appeared in the columns of the Shanghai journal and we have no hesitation in denouncing it as an obvious falsehood. It is amusing to observe the persistence with which the three anti-Japanese journals of the Far East, one in Yokohama, one in Shanghai, and one in Seoul, ring the changes on every petty item of intelligence, true or false, which can be twisted into an indictment of Japanese fairness or honesty or some other moral quality. If one of them makes what it imagines to be a hit injurious to Japan, the other two hasten to copy it, but never by any chance do they ever produce anything in a laudatory strain. The mischief that might be wrought by such persistent venom is happily nullified by the contemptuous attitude that the public maintains towards these three journals.

The Mainichi Dempo's Seoul correspondent continues to send telegrams to Tokyo implying that the members of the Young Men's Christian Association are in league with the anti-Japanese factions. Our readers have doubtless observed that the two principal of these factions have been dissolved by order of the Government. Naturally they have not accepted their fate without grumbling, and the idea now suggested is that they will join forces with the Young Men's Christian Association, whose members are represented by this correspondent as boasting that their connection with foreigners secures them against legal interference. Considering the explicit denials that had been published by men of the most unimpeachable credibility, we should have supposed that the stories about the Young Men's Christian Association would have ceased to be heard by this time.

There is now some talk of making the jinseng farm a Government monopoly in Korea instead of converting it into a popular enterprise. The question is in abeyance.

There is no definite news of the military operations against the insurgents. It is reported that most of the officers who are now leading the insurrection would give themselves up if they were assured of not being capitally punished. Meanwhile the insurgents appear to have descended to the methods of mere bandits. Here and there they manage to assassinate a Japanese civilian, or to piller a house, but beyond such exploits their ambition does not carry them.

MANCHURIA.

The talk is renewed, and this time in a very circumstantial manner, of transferring the Changchun-Harbin section of the East China Railway to Japan. This matter was discussed some time ago but was then dismissed as quite improbable. Now again, however, it is ventilated in the columns of the Nichi Nichi Shinbun, and the views there expressed are said to have been conveyed to Baron Goto by a Russian railway official. The points made are, first, the very obvious one, that had not Tairen and Port Arthur been in Russia's hands, she would never have dreamed of building this section of the trans-Asian line. The second is, that she finds the road an absolute white elephant. It can not be said to tap any important town or any richly producing districts, and thus for goods transport it is practically valueless, while as for passengers—a minor consideration at best—they are likely to find the inconveniences of the route greater than its attractions in view of the embarrassments attending the Kwanchengtsz junction. Thus from every practical point of view the line is valueless to Russia, whereas in Japan's hands it might be made a comparatively paying enterprise. Thus stated, the proposition has quite a serious aspect, but of course everything would depend upon the price asked by Russia for the road.

Viceroy Hsu's project of raising a foreign loan of 40 million yen is said to be encountering much opposition at the hands of the Finance Department in Peking, but the Viceroy is determined to push his scheme.

The news is repeated that although Viceroy Hsu and Governor Tang Shao-i are anxious to settle all outstanding questions with Japan in an amicable and liberal manner, their good intentions are frustrated by the Censorate in Peking and by the opposition of ex-Governor Chou. Five or six censors have already memorialized the Throne in the sense that Hsu and Tang are adopting a mischievously weak policy, and the Kunpao, which is supposed to be an organ of ex-Governor Chou, attacks the Viceroy perpetually.

The veto imposed by the Chinese Government upon the export of cereals from the leased territory of Kwantung is said to have been inspired by ex-Governor Chou. Its effect has been disastrous to persons engaged in the despatch of millet and beans from Tairen, and incidentally the South Manchurian Railway finds its goods traffic appreciably reduced. The Fiji Shimpō has an article on this subject. It takes the lines already indicated in our own columns, namely, that if China insists upon this veto, she will be practically surrendering the leased territory to Japan as a permanent possession, and such procedure is strikingly inconsistent not only with the attempts she has hitherto made to assert her sovereign power in the leased territory, but also with the rights-recovery policy which she so persistently pursues. Japan holds Kwantung under lease from the Chinese Government. Thus the right of eminent domain plainly is vested in China, and to allege that the Liaotung Peninsula, in spite of this lease, is no longer Chinese territory but belongs to a foreign State, is a plainly impossible position.

The proclamation prohibiting the export of cereals from the leased territory of Kwantung seems likely to cause some embarrassment and friction. The Japanese are remonstrating vigorously through both the Governor-General of Kwantung and the Chargé d'Affaires in Peking, while the Chinese on their side promise to give an immediate reply but refrain from doing so, and in the meantime the veto is strictly enforced. Its result has been to partially paralyze the trade at Tairen, and evidently if the Chinese persist, their obstinacy may lead to quite serious trouble. The Nichi Nichi Shinbun writes a strong article on the relations between the two Empires at present. Neither in the capital nor in the localities is it found possible to come to a satisfactory understanding about the questions now pending. The truth appears to be that the Chinese negotiators have not a free hand. They are hampered by the rights-recovery party whose representatives, not being themselves responsible for the solution of these various problems, can afford to ventilate strong opinions. Unless China desires to impair her relations with Japan it will be well for her to adopt a different tone. Doubtless she has to endure a good deal which is not at all agreeable, but she is only reaping as she has sown. Rights-recovery is a very fine programme and one with which we can all sympathize. But unless there is power to enforce it, the inevitable result is a fiasco. Besides Japan is not asking China to sacrifice any rights: she is merely asking her neighbour to settle questions which naturally and inevitably arise out of treaties already in existence.

The South Manchuria Railway is reported to have suffered very severely during the recent storm. It is stated that on the 17th inst. a space of nearly 80 miles between Wafangtien and Tachichao was rendered more or less impassable by floods.

Speaking of the South Manchuria Railway, we read in Tokyo papers that a great sifting of officials is taking place and that it involves the dismissals of some 500 employees. It is thought that this will cause a good deal of discontent.

The Hungtuzs have been making themselves rather busy in the neighbourhood of Liaoyang. They pillaged one house, murdered the owner of another, and carried off a child which they held for ransom. They were attacked subsequently by the Chinese police, one of whom lost his life in the assault, but the bandits were driven off and the child was recovered.

It is reported that ex-Governor General Chou will replace Viceroy Hsu at Mukden. This would be an unfortunate event from the point of view of Japan's relations with China.

It is affirmed that China's attempt to veto the import of grain from her dominions into the leased territory of Kwantung is a plain violation of her promises to Japan. During the negotiation of the December Treaty of 1905, this question of commerce in grain was brought up by Baron Komura who urged that China should altogether abandon her restriction policy in the matter. The Chinese Plenipotentiaries replied that such a wholesale measure was out of the question, but that so far as Kwantung was concerned there would be no difficulty, and they proposed to insert a clause in that sense in the treaty. But Baron Komura answered that Kwantung did not enter the question at all, inasmuch as it was not foreign territory, and therefore no occasion existed to make a special exception in its favour. All these things are duly recorded in the minutes of the conference, and China can not possibly go back on them now.

Chief-Engineer Furukawa is quoted as saying, with reference to the new Japanese station at Changchun, that the object in view is to link up the Korean system and the Kirin railway with the South Manchurian line at this point. Thus the Korean system and the Kirin railroad would become a branch of the South Manchurian route. To build a station suitable for this purpose a site measuring a million tsubo would be required and an expenditure of about a million yen would be involved. Of this sum Japan has already received from Russia 600,000 yen as compensation for one-half of the Kwanchengtsz station.

There is a telegram, apparently semi-official, to the effect that in addition to the two customs stations already established upon the northern frontier of Manchuria, two others will be placed at Tsitsihar and Aigun.

The recently circulated rumours as to the probable sale by Russia to Japan of the northern section of the East China Railway, namely the section between Harbin and Changchun, are now denied. It is probable that they never found much credence amongst thoughtful people. We do not say that such a step might not be mutually beneficial, but we do think that the time is not ripe for it from Russia's point of view. She has shown a remarkably magnanimous temper when she agreed to sheathe the sword in the recently concluded Batente, but by that act she in reality enhanced her own dignity, whereas the sale of this railway to Japan within a very few months of the evacuation of Manchuria would certainly be misconstrued by many people. After the line has been working for some years in co-operation with the Japanese road, it will be time enough to talk of its future. From this point of view we are disposed to disagree with a leading article in the Nippon which, after setting forth the pros and cons of the case, urges that the Japanese Government should approach the Russian with a view to the purchase of the line. The Nippon itself admits that Russia's refusal to give up this section of the line at the time of the Portsmouth Treaty was dictated by a sense of her national honour, and in that fact, one would think, our contemporaries should discover sufficient reason for not hastening to solicit this special concession from Japan's new friend. We know nothing of Japanese statesmen if they are at all likely to perpetrate such a breach of tact.

All the leading papers of Tokyo publish telegrams epitomising a report compiled by a foreigner in Tientsin who has lately made a tour in Manchuria. This observer has a good deal to say about the railways, but perhaps the most interesting feature of his report is the conclusion he reaches about the mines, namely, that Japan's procedure in taking possession of them as an asset properly accruing to her in her capacity as Russia's successor, was not quite fair. He thinks that the mines were never wholly in Russian possession and that the Japanese will have to pay due compensation for them.

Mukden seems to remain still without rain. The heat and drought are described as almost unbearable, and in view of a failure of the crops, provisions are already beginning to pour into the place from outside regions.

It is expected that the Kwanchengsz station will be opened at the close of September and that the through service will be then fully organised. Two special trains will start daily from Tairen and will perform the distance in 27½ hours.

There continues to be a good deal of talk about the action taken by China in vetoing the import or export of food stuffs from her dominions into the leased territory of Kwantung. The effect of this step would be to deprive Tairen of fully one third of the commerce now passing through it, which commerce would be diverted to Newchwang and therefore transported largely by the Chinese line from Mukden instead of by the Japanese line. It is believed that this is purely a device of the anti-Japanese clique in Peking, and that although the announcement of the veto was made in the name of Sir Robert Hart, he does not approve of it.

MARQUIS ITO.

Marquis Ito is the man of the hour. The newspapers are full of accounts of welcomes given to him. At Bakan his reception was not less cordial and tumultuous than that given to Field Marshal Marquis Oyama and Admiral Togo, after the war, and when he arrived at Oiso on the 16th inst. he found almost every important personage from the Elder Statesmen downwards waiting to receive him. The nation's instinct is certainly right in this matter. Recent events in Korea and the Convention that grew out of them constitute one of the most important pages in the history of ancient or modern Japan, and as this signal result is mainly due to Marquis Ito's astute statesmanship, his country can scarcely show him sufficient gratitude.

News comes opportunely that several officers and soldiers arrested in connexion with the recent culte in Korea have been pardoned and released. After all, these men obeyed a principle of patriotism. They were misguided, and from the moment of their appeal to arms only one manner of dealing with them was possible. But to subject them to any severe punishment for what they did, would partake of the character of vindictiveness, and the intelligence of their pardon will be widely welcomed.

Order has not yet been fully restored throughout the provinces. The neighbourhood of Seoul especially seems to be disturbed, probably because of the presence of fugitive soldiers. Yaju and Suwon are now the scenes of trouble, but there are no signs of anything serious.

Marquis Ito had a most enthusiastic reception when he arrived at Oiso on the 16th inst. The train had been delayed by the storm and was consequently 31 minutes late. Some fifty notables from Tokyo were on the platform to receive his Excellency and both sides of the road were densely packed by great crowds of people. The occasion was taken to open a new road which had been under construction since the beginning of the year and which is called the Tokwan-michii (Residency General Road). The Marquis entertained at luncheon all those who had come to meet him. He seemed to be in excellent health and spirits. His whole progress by train from the south had been a succession of ovations.

Whatever may be Count Okuma's opinion about the Russo-Japanese Entente, he is absolutely unqualified in his applause of the arrangement effected in Korea by Marquis Ito. The Count says justly that nothing would have been easier than to apply force in Korea, but that such a method would have estranged the sympathies of the nations from Japan, and Marquis Ito, fully appreciating the importance of this aspect of the problem, exercised consummate tact and patience, so that Japan has gained everything she wanted without sacrificing anything, and the Koreans have not even the consolation of being pitied.

Immediately on Marquis Ito's arrival at Oiso he was waited on by an Imperial Chamberlain who intimated his Majesty's desire to see the Resident-General. The Marquis, however, asked for a delay of three days in order to get his documents into shape. It was therefore decided that he should leave Oiso by the 7.50 train on the morning of the 20th, reaching Shimbashi at 10.21 a.m. In Tokyo the Marquis and his suite were to be met by Imperial carriages and escorted to the Palace by a body of mounted police. It goes without saying that a great gathering of distinguished personages, from the Lord High Chamberlain downwards, were expected to welcome the Marquis at Shimbashi, and the Mayor of Tokyo was to read an address of welcome. The Marquis is to lunch at the Palace, and subsequently, at the request of the Prime Minister, he will attend a council of Elder Statesmen and Cabinet Ministers. His Excellency's headquarters are to be at the Imperial Hotel during his sojourn in Tokyo.

The House of Representatives has decided that all its members now in the capital shall attend at Shimbashi to receive the Marquis on his arrival, and that a welcome party shall be organised at whatever time or place are convenient to him, and for the purpose of these arrangements a committee of five has been appointed. Three other entertainments are also spoken of; one by the Prime Minister, one by the Tokyo Municipality, and one by the business men of the city.

The Seiyun kai are very actively availing themselves of the great prestige that accrues to their party from the signal success of their ex-leader in manipulating the Korean problem, and from that of their actual leader in negotiating the Franco-Japanese and the Russo-Japanese Ententes. These notable events will furnish valuable material in approaching the constituencies for next year's general elections. If the Seiyun kai could win eight or nine additional seats, they would have an actual majority in the Lower House, which would be an unprecedented event in Japanese political history.

Certainly no Japanese statesman had ever received such an ovation as was accorded to Marquis Ito when he arrived in Tokyo on the 20th inst. It was a veritable triumphal entry, scarcely less enthusiastic than that given to Admiral Togo and Field Marshal Marquis Oyama. The original statement that an escort of Imperial Guards would not be accorded and that police would be substituted, was erroneous. A whole company of the Guards preceded and followed the Imperial carriage in which the Marquis rode. On approaching the Palace the Marquis learned that arrangements had been made for him to enter by the front gate, an unprecedented honour, which, however, he declined. When he left the Palace, he had the Emperor's express orders to make his exit by the front gate.

The Council of State at which Marquis Ito is to submit his report about Korean affairs, and which will discuss the policy to be adopted hereafter towards that country, is expected to meet either to-day or to-morrow.

The House of Representatives is to hold its welcome meeting to-day in the principal hall of the Chamber. Marquis Ito, it is said, has promised to make a speech about Korea.

The Tokyo City, the Tokyo Municipality and the Business Men of the City have agreed to combine the entertainments contemplated by them. They will invite the Marquis to the Guest Hall of the recent Exhibition in Ueno Park on some day subsequent to the 25th. Four hundred prominent men of the capital are the leaders of this movement and each puts up ten yen towards the expenses. It is evident that the list of invitations will be very small as it is expected to comprise only a hundred men.

THE SILK QUESTION.

The Fiji Shimpō undertakes to give a full explanation of the trouble that has arisen between the foreign exporters of silk in Yokohama and the three Companies of Joshi which are the principal producers of sanguri silk in Japan. But we confess that our contemporary's explanation appears to us to labour under the reproach of one-sidedness. The situation it depicts is that, on the one hand, the three Joshi Companies, instead of exporting their silk through the hands of the foreign middlemen, recently made trial of direct export by entrusting two parcels of 40,000 kin each to the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha and the Yokohama Kiito Gomei Kaisha. This action on the part of the Companies is said to have been resented by the Yokohama exporters. They held a meeting to consider the question and decided to announce that they would abstain from further transactions with the three Companies, so long as these engaged in direct export. Is that quite credible? The three Companies are acting strictly within their legitimate rights when they essay the method of direct export, and to allege that merely because of that new departure the foreign middlemen in Yokohama have organised a boycott, is entirely foreign to the habits of these long-headed business men. There is evidently another side to the story and until we hear it, judgment must be suspended. The only instance that we can recall of anything like a combination on the part of the foreign merchants for the purpose of controlling the course of trade was the celebrated Kiito Niadzukari-jo of 1881, and on that occasion the Japanese, whatever may be said in defence of their fundamental idea, certainly tried to enforce in a somewhat arbitrary manner a sweeping revolution of the trade custom hitherto existing. Opposition on the foreign side was only natural in the circumstances, but on the whole it must be admitted that the foreign resident merchant has always gone quietly on his way, attending to his business and avoiding combinations, boycotts, and all that class of performance.

FINANCIAL.

Friday, August 16.

The new shares of the Tokyo Railway Company found their place duly on the Stock Exchange from the 16th inst. Hitherto transactions in these stocks have been of the nature of only promises to deliver, as the shares were not yet actually issued. Until the last few days these shares were quoted at from 26 to 27 yen, but owing to the debacle which set in from the 14th inst., their price fell from between 24 to 25 yen.

News received telegraphically by the Fiji Shimpō from London shows that there has been a strong upward movement in Japanese stocks. British Consols, French Rentes and Russian public securities also show an upward tendency.

The debacle which set in suddenly in the Tokyo share market from the 14th inst. is the subject of many conjectures, but the gist of the matter seems to be that the panic in New York furnished to the bears an opportunity of which they took full advantage. The fact is that the Tokyo newspapers have been in a state bordering on bewilderment during the past five months with regard to stock-exchange affairs. They have maintained an optimistic attitude, and indeed it must be confessed that there was not much apparent room for any other view. But the market has obstinately refused to justify these forecasts, and as a consequence we find the tone of the press gradually losing firmness.

Saturday, August 17.

According to the Asahi Shinbun, Mr. Loonen has been eminently successful in his endeavours to interest French capitalists in Japanese industries. He went home some months ago carrying with him several clever schemes, and fortune favoured him in so far that the Franco-Japanese Entente just synchronised with his presence in Paris. Thus he is said to have procured the provisional co-operation of a number of strong capitalists, and eleven of these are now en route from France to Japan via Siberia. They are expected to arrive at Tsuruga on the 23rd inst., and it is said that the French Government has communicated with the Japanese Government on the subject of their coming. Our contemporary says that among the projects which are likely to be quickly taken up, one is for the construction of a fine harbour at Moji. Fifteen million yen are to be expended upon this, one half being put up by the Japanese and the remainder by the French. Another project is the formation of a compressor company which will use a machine already patented in France for preparing the sites of buildings. It is stated that however unfavourable ground may be by nature for building purposes, this new method can render it adaptable.

The Mainichi Dempo writes in a very pessimistic strain about the Kyoto City loan of 20 million yen. All the money is not required at once. In fact its payment might be spread over a considerable interval, hence if there were any reasonable prospect of obtaining it in the foreign market ultimately, Japanese banks might not be indisposed to grant temporary accommodation. It would be necessary, however, that any banks committing themselves to the enterprise, should be prepared to carry it through to the end, and none seems ready to pledge itself to that extent unless foreign capital be in the background. We are a little surprised at this pessimistic view. One would suppose that the foreign money market was completely closed to Japan. But such is very far from being the case. There can be no doubt that time alone is needed to restore the confidence of foreign capitalists.

The Nippon, quoting an anonymous banker, gives expression to what we think must be regarded as a fine fear. This authority says that the coffers of the various banks are filled with money lying idle, and that the rate of interest now ruling at about 2 sen daily will soon fall to 1.9 sen and possibly even lower. This means that the fever of industrial enterprise will again break out, with corresponding appreciation on the share market, and the country will have to pass again through a period of inflation such as was experienced in the fall of last year and the spring of this. In fact a precisely similar state of affairs existed in the autumn of 1906, and far-seeing men then urged the Government to issue Treasury Bills or to adopt some other means of calling up unused capital. The Government, however neglected this precaution and the result need not be now described. It appears to us (Japan Mail) that this is a somewhat far-fetched apprehension. In the first place, our own information does not go to show that any such large plethora of idle money exists or that there is any prospect of the banks lowering their rate of interest on fixed deposits, which after all is the great test. In the second place, bankers, in whose memory the warning of the immediate past is still very fresh, may be trusted to exercise the fullest discretion in granting accommodation to projectors, while at the same time operators on 'Change have been too hardly hit to be rash.

It appears to be thought that the sharp but apparently temporary depression which overtook the Tokyo share market from the evening of the 14th inst. was due mainly to the impatience of holders who for many days had been waiting for a rise and who, seeing no prospect of immediate improvement, grew tired of delay and threw their shares on the market expecting to get the rates then current. Just at that moment there arrived the news of the panic in New York, and this, although not a prime cause, certainly exercised much contributory influence, being vigorously exploited by the bears. The publication of the Russo-Japanese Entente on the 15th inst. gave a salutary check to the debacle, and probably the consequent appreciation of Japanese securities on the London market as well as the rise in the price of Consols will contribute to that result. The fact is, however, as every close observer must have seen, that the middle of each month is always a period of comparative depression on the Stock Exchange, since it is then that speculative holders unload so as not to be caught on the threshold of settlement day. The next fortnight too is a critical time in Japan. The two-hundredth-and-tenth day falls on the 2nd of next month and the weather on either side of that date is of critical importance to the rice crop.

Sunday, August 18.

There has been talk for some time of municipal loans to be issued by Kobe, Kyoto and Nagoya, and debentures to be issued by the Sugar Refining Company, by the Kanegafuchi Spinning Company and by the Fuji Spinning Company. These various operations would have immediately involved a sum of 17 million yen, and it was hoped that they could have been negotiated in the domestic market at from 6 to 6½ per cent. But the banks are not willing to lock up their capital at such a rate. The Mitsu Bishi Bank, according to the Shogyo Shimpō, has accommodated the Kobe Municipality to the extent of one million, and the Sugar Refining Company (Formosa), being under special obligations, is said to have borrowed 3 millions from the First Bank and the Industrial Bank at 7 per cent. The other loans have been postponed for the time. All this does not look very like that plethora of unemployed capital about which some newspapers have been recently writing.

There seems to be considerable talk at present in England about violations of English patents by Japanese merchants in China. The Manchester Chamber of Commerce has taken the matter up, but the Japanese are understood to insist that the forgers are for the most part Chinese subjects who carry on their operations in the name of Japanese, and that there can be no effectual remedy until the Chinese Government itself enacts and enforces laws for the protection of trade marks.

There has been no improvement on the Japanese share market. On the contrary Saturday was distinctly a day of no buying and all prices showed depression though the afternoon saw a light upward impulse. The market seems to have relapsed into the condition that existed about a month ago.

Monday, August 19.

There is a great deal of talk about the electric lighting question in Tokyo. It will evidently be a very serious matter for the present Electric Lighting Company if the Tokyo Railway's application be granted, as it seems pretty certain to be. The immediate result, according to apparently trustworthy estimates, would be that the Electric Light Company must lose at least 10,000 of its present customers. On the other hand, this Company claims that its water-power scheme will be in operation next month and that it will then be able to supply light at rates nearly as cheap as those offered by the Tokyo Railway Company. It does not appear, however, that great confidence is placed by the public in this water-power scheme. In the first place the plan is not extensive enough. It delivers only 18,000 horse-power in the City, and the Company's actual present requirements demand 14,000, so that there would practically be little margin for development. Besides, from an engineering point of view, the project is said to be open to many objections; objections such that it would not be an unreasonable apprehension to look forward to the City being entirely deprived of light during a period of several days. The Electric Light Company has a supplementary project which would increase the horse power to 36,000, but it would require a further outlay of 6½ million yen. In these circumstances it is easy to understand that whenever official permission seems to be on the verge of being granted to the Railway Company talk is heard of a combination between the two rivals. Combination is not unlikely to take place sooner or later, but we greatly doubt its feasibility at present.

For some time past there has been much talk of the construction of a large harbour at Moji. The position is of vital strategical importance, and moreover, Moji promises to be one of Japan's great tidal outlets. Investigations and surveys have been carried on for a considerable time and are now said to be on the verge of completion. The expenditure involved will be very heavy: seventy or eighty millions of yen are spoken of, but of course this outlay will be spread over a series of years. French capitalists, as we stated in a previous issue, are planning the construction of a large dock at Moji, and it would seem that this project ought to be a financial success.

The Asahi has an article with regard to the Yensui Seito-Kaisha (Sugar Refining Company of the Yensui Lake), a Formosan concern. The Company was originally formed with a capital of 300,000 yen, but in spite of very material assistance granted by the Viceroy of Formosa, want of funds prevented any satisfactory development. Ultimately Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Company agreed to lend 150,000 yen on condition of being entrusted with the whole sale of the Company's sugar, and thus sugar bearing the brand A.S.B. came to be well known in the European market. The Sugar Company then decided to enlarge its organisation. It converted itself into an affair with a capital of 5 million yen, one quarter of which was collected without any difficulty. But when the time came for calling up the next quarter, the directors found themselves confronted by the acute financial depression which set in last spring. They therefore had to consider whether it would not be wiser to defer the call, and in the meanwhile to obtain funds abroad. Accordingly the President, Mr. Arai, proceeded to Europe, and it is now stated, that, through the agency of Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Company, he has succeeded in placing 900,000 yen worth of 7 per cent. debentures, so that the Company will now be able to procure first-class machinery and develop its enterprise.

A most discouraging account is given of the cotton spinning industry in Shanghai by a Japanese expert who is connected with the work and who is quoted by the Asahi Shimbun. He says that there are eleven spinning factories in Shanghai. Two of them are under English management, one under German, and three under Japanese. They are all, according to this account, in a similarly unfortunate position, the outcome of their work being invariably a loss. Large quantities of their products are stored at Hangkow, Shanghai, and elsewhere, but they find no buyers. This is the point in the story which is not fully explained. There is no suggestion that the yarns produced in Shanghai are inferior to those of Japan or India, yet while the latter easily find a market the former are unsaleable. We gather from this informant's statement that, in his opinion, the two great difficulties against which the Shanghai mills have to contend are an import duty of 5 per cent. on raw cotton, and the presence of the compradore. Much stress is laid upon this second factor. The mills of course depend mainly upon a supply of native cotton. This they can procure only through the compradore, who charges his own price. Then again when it comes to selling the yarns, the compradore's services have to be again requisitioned and again he levies a substantial percentage on the sale. All this is probable enough but what about the five factories which are entirely in Chinese hands? The compradore question ought not to concern them in any way, except that it handicaps their rivals. Yet it would seem that these Chinese factories are just as unsuccessful as those under foreign management. Last year the comparative failure of the Chinese cotton crop naturally dealt a severe blow to the Shanghai mills, but a better yield is anticipated this year and possibly it may be attended by some improvement in the industry. The Asahi's informant seems to think, however, that bad organization has much to do with the unpromising state of affairs.

Tuesday, August 20.

In spite of the great depression in the share market, which shows no sign of improving, it does not appear that business enterprise is by any means defunct. Thus we read in the Kokumin that during the month of July new companies were formed involving capital to the extent of 14,650,000 yen, and the capitals of existing companies were increased to the extent of 12,957,000 yen. It thus results, according to the Kokumin, that from July 1905 to July 1907 the capital pledged on account of new companies totalled 1,211,238,000 yen and that pledged on account of increasing old companies totalled 494,682,000 yen the grand aggregate being 1,705,920,000 yen. Our contemporary says nothing about the really important point as to how much of this aggregate was paid up, how many of the companies have since then been dissolved, and how many never got beyond the state of projection.

The Yomiuri Shimbun has a note confirming the report that the Tokyo Railway Company's application for permission to extend its electric lighting enterprise to a section of the whole region traversed by its lines will be officially granted at the close of this month. Our contemporary adds that the rates charged by the Tokyo Railway Company are kept a profound secret, but it is nevertheless pretty generally understood that they will not greatly exceed one-half of the prices now charged by the Electric Light Company. Doubtless the latter will make a great struggle to retain its business, and indeed its prosperous existence is not at all threatened, since the concession asked for by the railway extends only to a belt 840 yds. wide on either side of the track. In fact it may be said that what the Railway Company will get, if its application be rightly construed, is permission to furnish light to areas a mile in width traversing the City in the direction of its lines. The whole of the rest of the space will remain in the sole possession of the Electric Light Company, its only rival being the Gas Company.

The Tokyo share market continues to show nothing but depression. People seem to be in a state of complete indifference, and the volume of business done is extraordinarily small. On the 19th inst. from 40 to 50 minutes is said to have sufficed for all the transactions put through, and the schedule issued daily by the Stock Exchange showed a long list of blanks. The most significant fact was that the shares of the Exchange itself fell some four points at the close of the afternoon session. The price at which these shares stand is generally the surest indication of the state of the market: a rise in their quotation is almost a certain prelude to an all-round improvement in tone, and vice versa. One of the great difficulties, if not the chief difficulty, at present is that speculators are too timid to hold. They buy at the first symptom of a rise and hasten to sell as soon as ever a point of rest seems to have been reached, so that every upward tendency ultimately develops a check upon itself. At present prices are quite ridiculously low, and the prevailing impression seems to be that there will be no substantial improvement until next month, if even then.

Wednesday, August 21.

The Yokohama Electric Railway Company has called on its shareholders to pay up within the last ten days of the current month one quarter of the 11 millions by which the Company recently increased its capital, thereby bringing the total from one million to three. The next installment of the added capital will be obtained by loan, and work is to be undertaken at once with the object of building in the neighbourhood of Hodogaya a new power station which will develop 1,000 kilowatts (1,300 horse power), and of making preliminary arrangements for extending the line to Kamakura and Yokosuka. The Company is said to contemplate an ultimate increase of its capital to 10 million yen.

It is evident that the Japanese will soon discover that they would have done better to place their demands for foreign money on a lower level, and thus to have avoided the mistake of killing the goose that laid the golden egg. The Government financiers, much wiser in their generation than some of their countrymen have been, contracted their first war-loan on terms which, though denounced in Japan at the time, were really wise, inasmuch as they whetted the appetite of the foreign investor. But after the war, what with competition among foreign syndicates and what with inflated ideas on the side of Japanese borrowers, the foreign investor became imbued with an idea that he was being unfairly exploited, and the consequence was that he drew in his horns altogether. It results that Japanese borrowers are thrown back upon their domestic market and they have to pay accordingly. The Kobe Municipality, for example, has to give 6 per cent. to the Mitsui Bank for a sum of one million, which is to be repaid in a year and a half, and the Dai Nippon Seito Kaisha (Sugar Refining Company) is said to be borrowing 3 millions from the First Bank and the Industrial Bank on terms which work out at 7 per cent. and 93 yen net receipts, in other words an interest of 8 per cent. as the money is to lie unpaid for three years and then to be fully paid off in seven.

Thursday, August 22.

An anonymous writer in the columns of the Mainichi Shempo predicts that French capitalists will experience much difficulty in carrying out their idea of combined industrial enterprises in Japan. The three reasons assigned by this critic are, first, that interpreters having an adequate knowledge of the French language are very difficult to obtain in Japan; secondly, that the experts hitherto sent from Europe have not been first-class men; and thirdly, that all newcomers obtain from foreign residents of the treaty ports such a discouraging estimate of Japanese character and methods as to be almost deterrent. To us (Japan Mail) these reasons appear to have very little weight. The last is indeed of some consequence, but in the case of the French Syndicate it may be said that these obstacles have been already overcome.

There are very conflicting accounts about the Joshi silk question. According to the Shogyo Shimpō, which is generally quite trustworthy in these matters, the abstention of the foreign middlemen from purchasing the Joshi Companies' silk has had a disastrous effect upon the price of the latter, and the Joshi sericulturists are beginning to appreciate the unwisdom of flying in the face of their customers. But the Mainichi Dempo gives a wholly different version. It says that this is not the first occasion by any means on which the Joshu Companies have had recourse to direct export, and that, as a matter of fact, nine-tenths of their produce are already pledged to the three principal direct exporters, so that the fraction affected by the decision of the foreign middlemen is a mere bagatelle.

The Far Eastern Muslin Company, which was started last January with a capital of 2 million yen, has experienced some delay owing to lateness in receiving machines ordered from America. The present outlook is that the factory will not be in full working order for another twelve months. There have hitherto been only two muslin manufactories in Japan and their success has not been signal, owing, it is said, to the fact that they made cheapness their great consideration and paid little attention to durability.

It is stated that the Government will effect the conversion of a quantity of Treasury bills before the close of this month. This does not mean that there will be any real repayment of outstanding notes; it will be merely a substitution of new engagements for old. There is talk also of the Treasury issuing additional bills to the extent of 7 or 8 hundred thousand yen.

It was stated some time ago that the five principal fire insurance companies of Japan, finding that they were cutting each other's throats by their system of competition, had decided to combine and to charge a fixed and considerably enhanced rate. This project has now encountered a serious obstacle in the shape of competition on the part of foreign insurance companies. These latter, combining with the minor Japanese companies, are offering rates considerably lower than those charged by the five big companies mentioned above.

The prospects of the rice crop are declared to be much above the average. Climatic conditions have not been absolutely favourable throughout, but on the whole the record has been good, and unless something extraordinary should soon occur, the crop is considered to be safe.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND THE "ENTENTE."

The Seiyu-kai and the Daido Club have shown strong approval of the Russo-Japanese Entente and it appears certain that arrangements will be made for a congratulatory demonstration on the part of the House of Representatives as a body. The only dissentient voice is that of Count Okuma. He is represented as saying that were the Entente limited to the published document, there would not be room for anything but approval. The supplementary protocol, however, is quite a different affair. What its contents are the Count does not state, but he hints plainly that they are highly unfavourable to Japan, and that in short Russia has succeeded in making a tool of her. Inasmuch, however, as these views do not appear in the columns of the Hochi Shimbun, which is the Progressists' Organ, we hesitate to credit them implicitly.

The Seiyu-kai have adopted a very unequivocal but moderately worded resolution with regard to the Russo-Japanese Entente. They say that this Entente crowns the efforts which Japan has been making for several years by succouring Korea and by preserving the integrity of China. The resolution adds that it is now possible to declare that Far Eastern peace is perfectly secured, and concludes with the hope that the relations between the two high contracting parties may constantly increase in cordiality.

The Progressists, however, have assumed a peculiar attitude towards the Entente. They recognise it to be desirable in the interests of the country's foreign policy, but they decline to recognise it in any sense as an achievement of her statesmen. They further allude to the rumoured existence of a secret protocol providing that, in return for formal recognition of her position in Korea, Japan has agreed to recognise outer Mongolia as within Russia's sphere of influence. If such an arrangement exists, the Progressists declare that it would be in plain conflict with one of the principal declared purposes of the Entente itself, namely, the preservation of China's integrity, but they decline to believe in its existence since an emphatic public denial has been made by the Foreign Office. In the circumstances they see no occasion to appoint a committee of investigation, nor do they think it necessary to pass any resolution with regard to the Entente.

We are bound to say that the action of the Progressists, under whatever leader they may now be moving, suggests that they are sacrificing something of the dignity of a great political party on the altar of prejudice. There are ample instances of that kind of thing in the history of British politics, but two wrongs do not make a right, and the Progressists have had such a fine record hitherto that one can not but desire to see them behave with a little more magnanimity. With regard to the recently concluded Korean Convention, which elicits whole-hearted praise from their ex-leader, Count Okuma, the Progressists as a body adopted the curious course of refraining from any definite expression of opinion and declaring that everything depended on the manner of giving effect to the new arrangement. Apparently they could not forget for a moment that the founder of their rival party, the Seiyu-kai, was also the negotiator of the Convention. They are assuming a similarly amorphous attitude towards the Russo-Japanese Entente. Their line is that pending the publication of the supplementary protocol or of whatever agreement may be attached to the Entente, it would be premature to express any opinion one way or the other. If they stop there, they would at least get credit for prudent reticence, but they go on to say, according to newspaper reports, that Russia was already fully pledged to the principle of the open door and of China's integrity, and that consequently to negotiate with her a compact providing for these things only was altogether a work of supererogation. That does not appear to be the opinion of the world, and we venture to predict that the Progressists will be left in the enjoyment of a monopoly of such views.

THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH IN HIGH SCHOOLS.

A very sensible letter on the above subject signed "Shinshuku Ronin" appears in a recent issue of the Tokyo Asahi Shimbun. The writer says that when the High School teachers who met in Tokyo to discuss this topic a short time ago simply recommended the formation of smaller classes for teaching English and the discontinuance of the practice of trying to teach German and English at the same time, they did not go far enough. The present defective knowledge of English displayed by High School students is wholly traceable to the manner in which English is taught in Middle Schools. The text-books used there are far too easy to serve as a preparation for understanding the books used in High Schools. Middle School graduates, thanks to the leniency of the examiners in English, may manage to scrape through the entrance examination for the High Schools. But the first term's work at once reveals to them the fact that, in order to master the text-books in use, they must spend many weary hours over the dictionary and the phrase book. The inadequacy of the instruction given in Middle Schools, and the comparative ignorance of English of the Japanese teachers employed, are familiar to all the Middle School graduates who succeed in entering High Schools. Reform must begin at the root of the evil complained of. English should be well taught during the last 2 years of the Primary School course. Correct pronunciation should be insisted on when boys are 10 or 11 years old, and only Japanese who can converse and compose in English should be employed in Middle Schools. English should be used instead of Japanese for teaching by certain Japanese teachers, and students should be encouraged to converse with each other in English and ask questions in class in the same language. The whole system of teaching English in Government schools needs alteration. As long as the High Schools have hundreds of badly prepared students thrust upon them with the request that in three short years they will turn them into good English scholars, notwithstanding the fact that numbers of other subjects use up the brains of these students every week, the University professors will go on complaining of the poor material that is handed over to them by the High Schools. That the few well prepared students to be found in every High School class make rapid and sometimes astonishing progress in English during their three years' course and go to the University thoroughly well up in the language suffices to prove that the High Schools are wrongly blamed for the present state of affairs.

Tokyo journals give what professes to be an analysis of the decision adopted by the Educational Department with regard to the foreign language difficulty. One proposal, it will be remembered, was to reduce the number of foreign languages taught at the Middle and High Schools, and to devote the money thus saved to providing better facilities for the study of the surviving language or languages. This plan has been abandoned for obvious reasons. The decision adopted is said to be, first, that the number of students in each language class shall be reduced by about one-half; and, secondly, that the number of language teachers shall be increased at the rate of two per term in the High Schools only, during three terms. As there are only seven High Schools throughout the Empire, this would mean a total increase of 42 additional teachers. But it appears that even that programme will have to be reduced on account of financial considerations. We observe that the salaries of these teachers of foreign languages are put at 100 yen per month, which means of course that Japanese not foreigners are to be employed.

A slight outbreak of fire, which, however, was quickly subdued, took place at No. 50 on Monday night.

CHINA.

There are many telegrams about the progress of events in Peking but it is extremely difficult to construct a consecutive story out of them. The views of the reformers seem to be focussed on the necessity of breaking down the barriers between the Manchu and the Chinese. Steps recommended for that end are the disbanding of the Eight Banner Corps, the sanctioning of inter-marriage between the two races, abolition of distinctive phraseology in official documents, and so forth. All this has little to do directly with the reforms of which China is supposed to stand in need, the obvious aim being to strengthen the ruling dynasty. Meanwhile there are a great many rumours about disquiet on the part of the various disaffected associations, and there is a story that Viceroy Yuan has sent detectives specially to Shanghai to effect the arrest of two important suspects.

Telegrams from Peking indicate that China has received the news of the Russo-Japanese Entente with some disquiet. The brevity of the document suggests to her the existence of a supplementary convention of some kind, and she infers that everything concealed from her must be inimical to her interests. There is no statement as to whether the Waiwupu, on receipt of the official copy of the Entente, inquired whether this represented the whole agreement.

It is telegraphed from Peking that a new bureau has been established there under the presidency of Prince Su. The name of the bureau shows that its business is to be connected with the establishment of a system of local autonomy, which, it will be recollected, is one of the main features of Viceroy Yuan's scheme of reform. The Viceroy has elaborated a most excellent and well thought out programme for the purposes of the metropolitan province over which he presides, and if his ideas were universally adopted, a vast change would be effected in Chinese local administration.

The Chinese Government seems to think that the Russo-Japanese Entente will have a great effect on the fortunes of Manchuria. They have ordered all the senior officials in the Three Eastern Provinces to submit reports on the state of affairs subsequent to the publication of the Entente.

We recently stated that a member of the Hanlin College had addressed a memorial to the Throne urging that all Chinese students now in Japan should be recalled and that none should be allowed to replace them in the future. It is reported that Prince Su strongly opposes this memorial. The Prince's argument is that to recall all the students because a small fraction of their number have shown a rebellious spirit would be about as sensible as to give up eating altogether because a morsel of food had once gone wrong. The memorial itself is interesting as an illustration of the extreme lengths to which some Chinese conservatives are prepared to go. Nevertheless this conservatism has undoubtedly its uses. Had it not declared itself in Japan at a timely moment, many of the qualities which make for Japanese greatness would have been in serious danger of extinction.

The newly established China Japan Company which has been organised by combining four smaller companies hitherto engaged in the transport trade of the Yangtze, is said to be in a very flourishing condition. Its methods of obtaining custom are eminently successful and altogether it has assumed formidable dimensions. We now read in Tokyo papers that the three companies, namely the Ewo, the Taku and the China Merchants, have combined to compete with the above Company and have already made heavy reductions in their rates. As yet the injurious effects of the competition have not been experienced by the Japanese company, but doubtless the situation will evolve some acute phases before long.

THE GRAND EXHIBITION OF JAPAN.

The Committee of the International Exhibition of 1912, seeing that various titles have been applied to the fair by foreign writers, have announced that the authorized English name shall be the "Grand Exhibition of Japan." We are surprised that the term "International" has been omitted, nor can we think that its omission is well advised. The Committee further give notice of an important fact. It appears that several Japanese merchants have already communicated with their correspondents in Europe and America in the sense that if the correspondents desire to send exhibits to Tokyo, the Japanese merchants will make all necessary provision as to space and arrangements. But the committee give notice that such procedure will not be allowed. The plan pursued will be that the Japanese Government will communicate with foreign governments for the purpose of securing their co-operation, and that no exhibits will be received from a country unless its government has officially announced approval. After that preliminary has been satisfied, intending exhibitors will have to comply with whatever measures are indicated by their own government. An announcement has already been sent to the various foreign governments. It says that the Exhibition will be opened on the 1st of April, 1912, and will remain open until the 31st of October. The Central Government devotes a sum of 10 million yen to the purposes of the Exhibition, besides which large contributions will be made by the provinces. There will be three main buildings within which space will be duly allotted for foreign exhibits, but if any foreign country or any foreign exhibitor desire to have a special compartment, land will be given without charge for the purpose. Every facility will also be accorded in the matter of customs dues. This last proviso doubtless means that no import duties will be charged unless articles are sold, but the fact is not clearly stated in that form.

ESCAPE FROM TAXATION.

There is no greater abuse connected with taxation in this country, says the Fiji Shimpō, than the way in which a very large number of people succeed in avoiding their liabilities under existing laws. The Government has tried to put a stop to this evil. It has even gone to the length of inquiring at banks concerning the amount of money standing to the credit of tax-payers, but still the abuse continues. As things are now, the burden of taxation is borne by a public-spirited minority of private citizens and by Government employees and others the amount of whose incomes is known to everybody. The majority either escapes payment altogether or pays a mere fraction of what the law demands. The Fiji thinks that the present system of classifying incomes and determining corresponding rates of payment should be abandoned. In order to escape the higher rate of payment, taxpayers perpetually understate their incomes. Though this classification aims at making taxation fair, seeing that most income-tax payers habitually understate their incomes, the result is gross unfairness. The Fiji is in favour of having a percentage rate only on all incomes above a certain figure. In order to secure payment, according to our contemporary, dividends paid to shareholders should be taxed while the money is still in the hands of the officers of joint stock companies. The Fiji thinks that it will be a long time before public spirit here in the matter of paying taxes reaches the level it occupies in England. The Government must take the people as they find them and devise measures for making evasion of liabilities next to impossible. This can only be done by exploring the sources of incomes in a thorough manner.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

There has been another serious railway accident closely resembling that which took place some years ago when a train on the Nippon Railway was blown over the Hoki-gawa bridge. This time the catastrophe occurred at the Karasu River on the Kamizuke line. It seems that one or more of the piers of the bridge had been undermined by the recent floods, and the bridge gave way under the weight of the passing train, so that several cars were precipitated into the river from a height stated to have been over a hundred feet. One passenger was killed and twelve were hurt more or less seriously.

There has also been a collision on the Nankai Railway in Shikoku owing to a signalman's mistake. Three persons were severely injured and eleven had minor hurts.

We may mention in this context that accidents are much more frequent than they ought to be on the Tokyo Railway. The newspapers state that no fault whatever is to be found with the appliances of the line, and that the blame must be laid upon the motormen and conductors. But if our own testimony were asked we should say that no small part of the fault lies at the door of the wayfarers themselves. There appears to be an idea, especially on the part of men drawing loads, that tram cars must always be prepared to get out of the way of anybody and everybody.

A passenger train on the evening of Aug. 16th overtook an empty train at the Namba station, Osaka. Serious damage was sustained by both trains, one person was severely injured and nine slightly.

A shocking railway accident occurred at 8 a.m. on Aug. 20th at Sukagawa station on the Nippon Railway, when a passenger train from Fukushima collided with a freight train which was discharging goods. The result was that both locomotives were severely damaged by tremendous explosions; some carriages of both trains were damaged; and one of the engineers, three conductors, and twenty of the passengers were more or less injured. It is said that prior to the arrival of the passenger train at a certain point near Sukagawa station, a danger signal was displayed, but the engineer and conductors took no notice and the train proceeded at usual speed.

Mr. P. F. G. Pearson, a Belgian gentleman living in Akasaka, Tokyo, was examined in the Tokyo District Court on Aug. 15th. Tokyo papers say that in January this year, he promised a merchant of Kyoto that he would sell a lot of foreign illustrated post-cards and received a hundred yen as bargain money, but did not deliver the goods.

THE ALLEGED IMPLICATION OF CHRISTIAN IN THE KANGWHA INSURRECTION.

A few days ago the correspondent of a Tokyo journal wired a rumour in the sense that American missionaries had instigated the Kangwha riots. We noted, in reproducing the story, that it would probably be found to be without foundation. The Right Reverend Bishop Harris now writes:—A letter just to hand from Dr. G. H. Jones of Seoul says:—

The Chemulpo paper (Japanese) comes out to-day with a wild story that the insurrection at Kangwha was originated by Christians. If such a story gets abroad in Japan, deny it in toto. No Missionary on this island had any connexion with the riot. No American Missionaries reside on the island. * *

* At Kangwha we have 3,500 Christians out of a total population of 17,000. When the Imperial Decree ordering the disbanding of the Army reached Kangwha, a local society united with the soldiers, seized arms and rose in insurrection. They tried to make our various Christians join them, but the Rev. Mr. Son, the pastor, held our people steady and sent a messenger to me. On my request Mr. Maruyama sent a captain and eight officers to protect the Christians. The Christians wear a badge and are very kindly treated by the Japanese policemen.

The Bishop also encloses an interesting letter from Dr. Jones, which runs as follows:—

Seoul, Korea, July 28, 1907.

MY DEAR BISHOP HARRIS,—Your kind letter of the 21st just at hand and I hasten to thank you for your kind offer to come if we should need you. I hasten to report that the crisis is safely passed, city is normal and the strong hand of Japanese law is visible everywhere as a guarantee that there will be no further uprising. As my last letter indicated we have passed through a very perilous and trying time. I had the responsibility of watching for the safety of our missionaries, protecting our property and "holding on to" our Korean Christians to keep them out of harm's way. Our property has not been in the least jeopardized. The missionaries are all safe and I am glad to say that among the 210 Koreans wounded and killed during the disturbance, and many put under arrest, there is not even one of our Christians. The native pastors have loyally supported me and, while many were engaging in the anti-Japanese disturbance, many of our Christians were gathered in prayer groups asking that violence and bloodshed might be averted. You will have noted that Mr. Zumoto fully refuted the charges of complicity of the Y. M. C. A. with the disturbance. The report was sent by some enterprising Japanese reporter who thus hoped to make a "scoop." You know also that the Japanese paper at Chemulpo reported that Scranton's journey to Kongju in a special car was for the purpose of raising an army of 2000 Christians with which to attack the Japanese.

On the other hand a crack-brained agitator on Friday published a fiery note against me as the pro-Japanese Mokka. A good many of the Christians are out "gunning" for him figuratively, and are making the town hot for him. So it goes. There has been no monotony—something "do" all the time. It has all been very interesting and promises to continue so.

The people take the new agreement in a very philosophical way. Some seem to think that they don't realize its significance, but they do very fully. They accept and are watching to see what the Marquis will do. That is all that is necessary. He will win them over to his side for he always "wins."

Ever Yours, GEO. HEBER JONES.

THE SPY QUESTION.

Since the assassination of Mayeda by a man who believed him to be a Russian spy—if that was indeed the true motive of the murder—there has been a silly tendency on the part of some minor newspapers to suggest that certain Russian subjects engaged in the business of pedagogy in Japan, make spying their real occupation. Such foolish fancies are not the monopoly of any nation, and no one suggests that the Japanese are more prone to them than others. But that is small consolation to these Russian residents who, in consequence of these baseless insinuation, find themselves the centres of unpleasant observation and comment. The Russian Minister has thought it expedient to enter a protest against this sort of thing through the columns of the Kokumin Shinbun. His Excellency declares that the duty entrusted to him by his Sovereign in connection with his appointment to the Legation in Tokyo was to restore the relations between Russia and Japan to their old friendly footing. M. Bahkmetieff alludes in a feeling manner to the embarrassment attending his first efforts in that direction, but says that those efforts have resulted in a degree of success which he could hardly have anticipated. It would be most regrettable if the happy state of affairs now nearly brought about were marred by the circulation of groundless rumours such as have been inspired by this spy question. His Excellency emphatically declares that the three gentlemen who are objects of suspicion have absolutely no function whatever in the nature of spying. They are simply men of science who labour for the promotion of general information and with the object of furthering a better mutual knowledge between Japan and Russia. Nothing could be more unjust than to taboo these men merely because some wholly misinformed person has fixed upon them an unwarrantable stigma.

REWARDS TO THE ARMY AND NAVY AFTER THE WAR.

It will be remembered that after the war a sum of 150 million yen was set aside for the purpose of rewards to the Army and Navy. The apportionment and delivery of this money has proved a most arduous task owing to the great number of persons involved. Some who should have been recipients have died; in the case of others representatives have not been forthcoming, while yet others have been represented by persons not competent. We read in the Nippon that up to the 19th inst. the total allotted to the two services was 112,644,920 yen, out of which the Army received 105,718,513 yen and the Navy 6,926,407 yen. There will doubtless be some other payments to make, but it is evident that the sum originally allotted will prove considerably more than sufficient. The distribution in the case of the Army is given as follows:—

	Yen.	Numbers.
Officers.....	6,043,250	15,765
High Civil Officials attached to the Army.....	494,025	584
Non-commissioned Officers and Men.....	95,768,475	881,778

DEATH OF HERR JOACHIM.

With the passing away at the age of seventy-six of Joseph Joachim the world of music loses one of the most interesting figures of the Victorian era. His fame will principally rest on his extraordinary skill as an instrumentalist, but he was too great an artist not to keep his own wonderful technical ability always subordinate of the interpretation of the music he was playing. His Monday and Saturday popular concerts at the old St. James Hall will long linger in the memory of all music-lovers. Born at Kitsee, near Presburg, Hungary, of Jewish parentage, he began his musical studies at the Conservatory of Music in Vienna. Before he was twelve he had won a name as a violinist, but it was not until 1850 that he first visited Paris, though some years before he had gone over to London. From that time onward he was a frequent visitor to the English shores and as the years rolled on Cambridge made him a Doctor of Music, Oxford followed suit, while Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL.D. In his wife, Madame Amalie Joachim, he had a worthy helpmeet for she was perhaps one of the greatest of German ballad and oratorio singers. She died in 1899. As a composer Joachim belonged to the school of Schumann and one of the most famous of his compositions is undoubtedly the "Concert a la Hongroise."

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Nothing is officially known as yet, it would seem, with regard to the employment of Chinese labourers on the Kyushu Railway. That the consent of a local Governor would have been an essential preliminary to the hiring of any foreign labourer in the interior of Japan, goes without saying, but, further, it would have been necessary for the Chinese labourers individually to comply with certain formalities, and according to the officials of the Home Department, which has been consulted by a representative of the Mainichi Dempo, no steps of that nature have been taken. Meanwhile the perplexity is increased by news that since May last 41 Korean labourers have been employed upon the Yokohama-Hachioji railway. They are said to have been paid 55 sen a day if they fed themselves and 25 sen if they were fed by the railway Company—a daily wage which does not materially differ from that paid to Japanese—and the Company had further to defray the full cost of their passage to Japan and half the cost of the return journey. A most unfavourable report is made as to the efficiency of these men. For rough work requiring mere muscular strength they are said to be good enough, but if any intelligence or handiness be needed, they break down conspicuously, and moreover they do not appear to have the slightest effective instinct of economy, for immediately on receipt of their wages they spend them in self-indulgence. Moreover 16 out of the 41 have absconded and their whereabouts is still unknown. In fact they are pronounced far inferior to the Chinese in many important respects. But did the Governor of Kanagawa Prefecture sanction the employment of these men?

The climatic conditions have been somewhat disturbed for the past few days. There were four centres of depression cruising around. One of them had its origin in the Riukiu vicinity, whence it passed to Kyushu, thence to Shikoku, and thence across the centre of the main island into the Sea of Japan. This produced flooding in some districts and interruption of traffic, but it did not seriously damage the rice crop. The second made its first appearance in the neighbourhood of Noto, whence it ultimately passed up the Sea of Japan, striking Hokkaido en route. The third was a purely local affair, originating in Shinano and passing thence eastward, finally emerging into the sea at Boshu. The fourth had its genesis in the Yangtze Valley, but it took its way thence across the north of Korea into Siberia, so that Japan was not affected. At present there are no reports of any new centre of depression.

A correspondent writes to us from London as follows:—"A man of two addresses namely R. Kano, Bangai 17, Hatago-machi, Kita-ku, Osaka, Japan, and R. Kano, 1, Korai-bashi, Shichome, Osaka, Japan, recently inserted an advertisement in The Times to the following effect:—"A Japanese youth desires to exchange picture cards and letters in the English language only. Address as above." To the numerous innocent people who replied to the above advertisement Mr. K. Kano sent the most filthy cards and printed books offering to supply them at certain prices. The books are printed in English, and for all I know, the man carrying on this blackguardly trade may be an Englishman, but of course Japan gets the discredit. Some time ago this sort of filth came from Holland, and got to such a pitch that the newspapers refused to publish advertisements even of banks or hotels from Holland until the matter was put a stop to. In this case a communication has been made to the Japanese Embassy, and it is to be hoped for the credit of Japan that some means may be found of coming down on this person and stopping any recurrence of such incidents. The Times, as might be expected of it, has refused all advertisements of this nature."

It is confidently affirmed that the new Commercial Treaty, the Fishery Convention and the Entente having now been concluded between Russia, and Japan the two Powers will raise their Tokyo and St. Petersburg Legations respectively to the rank of Embassies, and that the first ambassadors will be Mr. Baklanetieff and Mr. Motono. We may mention that the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce has sent a warmly congratulatory telegram to Mr. Iswolsky and Mr. Motono.

We have been hearing nothing from Formosa for some time but in this case no news is essentially good news. Had the aborigines been offering any resolute resistance, the fact would certainly have been telegraphed to Japan. We now learn that on the 19th inst. the Aiyu lines were securely linked up and that the attitude of the aborigines is pacific. There is no talk, however, of a fresh advance and we assume that it will not be made until climatic conditions are favourable.

THE BOOKSHELF.

"Bibliography of the Japanese Empire." Vol. II.

MR. VON WENCKSTERN has published a second volume of his unique work. It comprises all literature about Japan from 1894 to the middle of 1906. Some idea of the dimensions of the book may be gathered from the statement that it contains 535 closely printed pages. One would suppose that such a voluminous compendium should amply suffice to include everything that has been written about Japan, but as a matter of fact it covers a period of only eleven and a half years. When Mr. Wenckstern published his first bibliography in 1895, the general comment was that his industry must be considered altogether unique, since there is no opportunity for making a literary reputation or obtaining pecuniary reward by such labours, while on the other hand the trouble and research involved are stupendous and the expense is very considerable. We learn from the author's introduction that the sale of the 1st volume covered the outlay incurred, but we strongly suspect that this refers to printer's and stationer's bills only, and that it does not include the large expenses involved in travelling hither and thither to collect materials for a volume of the kind. The book is not merely a mixtunigatherum of publications about Japan. It is on the contrary carefully divided into 24 sections each devoted to a special subject, as for example, "Religion and Philosophy," "Travels," "Philosophy," Literature and Literary History," "Law" and so forth. It will at once occur to a reader that this arrangement throws some difficulty in the way of reference. That is certainly true, but the difficulty is largely obviated by an index in alphabetical order containing the names of authors and indicating the pages where their works are to be found. This index alone occupies 35 pages, from which fact some idea may be gathered of the extraordinarily comprehensive character of the work. It is evident that nobody interested in Japanese history, literature, or civilization can fail to supply himself with a copy of this most useful compilation. It is like a catalogue raisonné of a great collection, and we offer the author our sincere homage for the extraordinary energy and self-sacrifice he has displayed in compiling such a work. We may add that the printing is good (Kobe Chronicle) and the paper tolerable. In all other respects the technique is excellent. The proof reading alone must have been an immense labour, and we fail to detect any errors.

The Chinese Language and how to Learn it; by SIR WALTER HILLIER, K.C.M.G., C.B.

For many years Chinese Secretary to the British Legation in Peking and now Professor of Chinese at King's College, London, Sir W. Hillier is known to be one of the finest Chinese scholars in the world. A manual for students of the language, coming from such hands, commands respect even before we open its pages, and our respect grows when we come to look closer. The author's plan is to take the thousand ideographs in commonest use and to compile with them a number of exercises, with notes and explanations of a thoroughly helpful character, and when the student has mastered this much, Sir Walter Hillier tells him that he has learned one-third of all he need know for ordinary purposes. Of course the book commences with a table of sounds, for he that would attempt to acquire the Chinese language without mastering the sounds, would be as rational as though he set himself to master English without learning the alphabet. Then, after a brief but highly instructive essay on the method of writing, he proceeds to carry his pupils into the realm of phraseology, the scheme pursued being to accompany each English sentence with a rendering in which the order is recast so as exactly to suit the Chinese idea, the English words themselves also being modified. Incidentally we observe that this method of Sir W. Hillier furnishes the first absolutely satisfying explanation of the origin of "pidgin" English. Take, for instance, the following example:—"You want what" (for "what do you want"); "that piece is what thing" (for, "what is that thing?"; "You look seed not have" (for, have you seen it?); "he buy-sell not have mine large" (for, "his business is not as large as mine"); "I look see you, you not look seed me" (for, "I saw you but you didn't see me"), and so on. Is it not thus made abundantly plain that the Chinese themselves, when they invented pidgin English, merely adapted the words of the English vocabulary to the construction of their own language, and that their English visitors had very little to do with the task of building this curious language. At the bottom of each page the author gives a vocabulary of the words used in the sentences written above, the pronunciation being added in each case, as well as the corresponding ideograph. It need scarcely be said that much care is devoted to examining the calligraphic methods of the Chinese. The thousand characters are beautifully reproduced in large handsome and eminently clear type, chosen so as to be attractive and to suggest ease of acquisition. In fact, the whole plan of the work seems excellent, though we find difficulty in endorsing Sir Walter's estimate that the entire contents of the volume can be mastered in six months. That would involve learning six new ideographs daily, to say nothing of mastering the exercises, and probably even a student of exceptional capacity would find the task sufficient to occupy him for twice six months. The book is admirably brought out by Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner and Company, and it has an introductory page from the pen of his Excellency Wang, Chinese Representative in London, which page is a most beautiful specimen of highly cultivated brush-work.

THE AIZAWA DAY NURSERY.

A little more than a year has passed since the fire swept through Aizawa destroying hundreds of homes of the very poor and with them the building that was to have been the home of the Day Nursery. It is just a year ago this month that the generous people of Yokohama expressed their sympathy for their poor neighbours so substantially that, within a month after the fire, it was possible to begin a new building for the Day Nursery, better suited in every way to its needs, than the old one could have been.

The auspicious events of the year, the formal opening in November and the wonderful Christmas party arranged by the King's Daughters, have already been chronicled. The quiet routine which transforms some very pinched and dirty babies into clean, healthy, hearty, rollicking children may be seen any day in term time by any one who cares to visit the nursery.

Just now while elder brothers and sisters are home from school and can take care of the babies the faithful matron and her assistant are having a much needed rest, but in September the nursery must again open its doors to relieve weary mothers who must be bread winners for the family, and to train their babies in ways of health—physical and moral.

During the year eighty children have been so taught. Most of them bring two sen a day to pay, in part, for the food they eat, but the real expense of the nursery has been borne by residents and visitors to Yokohama, the Charity Club having assumed the support of the matron and the King's Daughters of any soldier's children who may attend.

With many thanks to all these kind friends we add the financial report for the half year ending June 30th, 1907.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE "ENTENTE"

TOKYO newspapers are unanimous in applauding the Convention just concluded between Japan and Russia. Their view is that Chinese affairs were the only source of danger between the two Empires, and that the status quo and the integrity of China's dominions being now explicitly guaranteed by the Entente, the peace of the Far East has been definitely assured. Much importance is attached to the fact that the High Contracting Parties exchanged copies of all the treaties and conventions existing between them and China, and that they mutually agreed to respect such treaties and conventions in so far as their provisions do not contain anything incompatible with the principle of the open door and China's integrity. This interchange of documents, private as well as public, is regarded as an incontrovertible evidence of good faith and sincerity. It is also noted with much satisfaction that the Entente has been effected so shortly after a terrible war. Evidently the belligerents learned to respect each other, and where respect exists esteem follows easily. Another opinion expressed almost unanimously is that although, had this Entente existed ten years ago, the Russo Japanese War would never have occurred, yet inasmuch as the conclusion of such a compact could never have taken place without the war, the Entente may be said to be one of the latter's compensations—a dearly bought compensation, it is true, but all the more valuable. As for the rumour busily circulated in Tokyo within the last few days, to the effect that the Entente is supplemented by a secret agreement recognising outer Mongolia to be within Russia's sphere, it is effectually disposed of by Mr. Yamaza's public denial. Indeed an official denial was hardly necessary, for the recognition of any such right on Russia's side would have clearly conflicted with the fundamental principle of the Entente, namely the preservation of China's integrity. There may be a supplementary protocol—indeed some well informed publicists continue to assert its existence—but we may be sure that it does not contain any such provision about Mongolia.

For our own part the first impression produced by this Entente is a sense of Russia's magnanimity. Little more than two years have passed since the terrible struggle at Mukden was decided in Japan's favour. Two years is a mere drop in the ocean of international revenge. Russia was beaten, and all the circumstances of her defeat were such as to suggest that she must thenceforth harbour a passionate desire to re-assert her military prowess. Indeed we have it on record that when she signed the peace treaty at Portsmouth, she regarded the document as merely a temporary promise to be set aside as soon as ever a favourable occasion offered. But now she has had the conspicuous moral courage to stand forward and clasp hands with her victorious enemy. It is an act that will go down in the pages of history as one of the finest achievements standing to the credit of any nation. Russia has shown herself really great. It is not permissible to assume that any one man has been the dominant factor in bringing about this Entente. All Russia's principal statesmen must have been in accord with the idea. Yet we can not but think that had any other save M. ISWOLSKY presided over the Russian Foreign Office at this juncture, the conclusion of the Entente must have been at least deferred.

The second impression suggested by the Entente is that the gods certainly seem to have Japan in their bosom. We do not mean to imply that she has not qualified for, or is not deserving of, the blessings that have been showered upon her during the past fifty years, but we do think that few if any nations have ever had such an uninterrupted record of good fortune. Consider the annals of the present year for example. There has been the Entente with France, to which we may almost add the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, for though the latter does not belong to the record of 1907, its influence has largely contributed to that record. Then there has been the Korean affair, which must justly be regarded as an invaluable result from Japan's point of view. She has gained in the Peninsula a position universally recognised, which can not but inure to her great advantage in future, and which may be said to dispel any cloud of potential trouble the hung upon her political horizon. Then there is this Entente with Russia; in many respects the most signal of all Japan's successes. It is curious to reflect, as one reads the text of this Entente and recognises how completely it binds Japan to alliance of interests with the Occident—it is curious to reflect that only quite recently she was held up to the world as the head and front of the Yellow Peril and that still more recently she was openly accused of contemplating a new war, and of purposing to recoup her losses at the expense of her neighbour, China, whose integrity she has now explicitly pledged herself to preserve. There can no longer be any doubt about the place that Japan occupies among the nations, and it should always be remembered that if, in 1904 and 1905, Russia involuntarily helped her to reach that place, the voluntary and magnanimous assistance of the great northern Power has now contributed materially to the final elevation.

THE SALVATION ARMY AND SEAMEN'S HOMES.

The Salvation Army having decided to withdraw from the work among the foreign sailors at Kobe which they took up at the request of the Committee of the Seamen's Institute some four years ago, a meeting was held at the Institute on Friday afternoon to consider what steps should be taken concerning the continuance of the work. Bishop Foss presided, and among those present were the Rev. J. W. Platt, Mr. J. B. Rentiers (British Vice-Consul), Mr. W. Campbell (Consul for Norway), Mr. C. Lange De la Camp, Mr. C.

Crowther, Mr. P. S. Cabeldu, Mr. A. Macdonald, Mr. F. Parrott, and Mr. P. Fraser, who acted as Secretary for the occasion. Staff Captain Dudd (Superintendent of the Institute) and Major Eriksen, of the Salvation Army, were also in attendance. After discussion it was decided on the motion of Mr. Crowther to ask the Tokyo headquarters of the army to postpone the closing of the institute until the foreign community had had time to consider the position, and on the suggestion of Mr. Parrott a rider was added to the effect that a Committee should be appointed to consider the means by which relief should be afforded to seamen in future. On the motion of Mr. Wm. Campbell the following gentlemen were nominated and elected as a Committee:—Bishop Foss (Chairman) Mr. C. Lange De la Camp, Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, the Rev. J. W. Platt, Mr. Crowther, and Mr. P. Fraser.

We note that the Salvation Army is taking similar steps with regard to the Home established by it in Yokohama. A circular from which we take the following has been issued:—

You will probably be aware that, ten years and a half ago, we purchased the business and furnishings of the old Pacific Hotel and turned the Hotel into a Home, with the object of providing for the naval and mercantile seamen who came to the Port. At that time a proportionately large number of these men required providing for and it was generally felt that, in spite of the existence of the Seamen's Mission, there was a good deal of work left for the Salvation Army to do among this class of men. During these past ten years we have done what we could to meet the need and we think that the work accomplished by Adjutant and Mrs. Harris, and the Officers who proceeded them, has met with the approval of the Community generally and we have been credited with very largely transforming the character of the old-time "Blood Town." We are thankful to God for any measure of success that has attended our labours and it has been a joy to us to do what we could for the men who needed it. It has also been a satisfaction to us that we have been able to do this work with hardly any necessity to appeal to the community for financial help in connection with the Home. As you will know, however, the conditions of shipping in Japan have changed considerably during the past few years and there are not now the number of foreign seamen to deal with that there used to be. Since the acquisition of Wei-hai-wei by the British and of the Philippines by America, too, the visits of the warships of these two nations have been very infrequent. It has, therefore, been a question with us for some time as to whether the work to be done amongst the seamen was sufficient to warrant our keeping an Officer set apart for this purpose, especially as there is in Yokohama a Seamen's Institute that could probably provide for the best part of the men that do come.

The matter has now been brought to a decision by the financial condition of the Home. For some time now, owing to the falling off of the boarding and re-shipping business, the financing of the Home has been a great anxiety. A few months ago we made an appeal to the community on behalf of the Home and have to thank those who kindly rallied to our help, but the response was not sufficient to justify us in keeping the Home open and getting into further financial difficulty. We have, therefore, with very much regret, to announce that the Home will be closed early next month. The question of doing what is necessary to help the few distressed seamen that need it, is under consideration, and we may be able to do this in connection with a proposal for other social work in Yokohama.

BASEBALL.

After all it was found possible to arrange a baseball game against a naval team on Saturday afternoon. The U. S. S. Pennsylvania contributed the nine and in a very fast game defeated the Y.C. and A.C. by five runs to nothing. Players:

GIRLS' CLUB EVENING FETE.

The weather was in a crabbed, tetchy mood on Wednesday evening and did its best to spoil the second garden fete organised in the Bluff Gardens by the Girls' Club of Yokohama. The moon was almost at the full and rose beautifully clear and resplendent, but soon after eight o'clock clouds began to gather and by a little after nine a sprinkling of rain fell. By this time the concert was well under way and between three and four hundred people must have been present in the gaily lighted gardens, and everyone hoped for the best. But the weather grew worse and worse. The first light drops changed gradually to a steady downpour and by the time that the "Star Spangled Banner" came along the rain was coming down in torrents. The Committee, however, stuck to their guns manfully and though many were drenched to the skin, they served refreshments to those that remained—and a very large number did remain to the very last—as though the Queen of the Night was smiling down tranquilly upon the scene. The President of the Club, Miss Strain, was ably assisted in the general arrangements by Miss Gorman and Mrs. Worden, while those who helped with the refreshments were the Misses Gordo, Russell (2), Stein, Winstanley and Woodruff (3), to whom hearty thanks are due.

Apart from the capital selections by the band of the U. S. Flagship West Virginia, the programme opened with a song by Mr. W. H. Lewis, "Son of Mine;" "The Bonnie Banks o' Loch Lomond," was sung by Mr. Randall Hargreaves, which, being encored he again obliged with the "Evening Song" from Tannhauser; "The Songs of Araby," followed by Mr. A. E. Cooper, was also encored vociferously and in reply he sang "Is Love a Dream;" while Mr. Lewis' closing songs were "Whether we live or die" and "A Man's Story." The accompaniments were capably played by Miss Blundell and Mr. Hargreaves. The band's selections were:—

March—"The Royal Dragoons" De Vine
Medley—"Popularity" Harris
Intermezzo—"Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Selection—"Mam'selle Napoleon" Luders
Caprice—"Awakening of the Lion" Kontski
Waltz—"L'estudiantina" Waldenfel
Opera—"Reminiscences of Verdi" Godfrey
Mazurka—"La Bella Napoletana" Maiuro
Characteristic—"My Kickapoo" Tilser
March—"American Patrol" Meacham

STAR SPANGLED BANNER.

FIRE ON THE "WIK."

Messrs. Runge and Thomas are in receipt of a telegram that the steamer Wik, (1,819 tons), which left Yokohama on the 15th inst. caught fire off Idzu prefecture and burnt to the water's edge. The crew, consisting of Capt. Carstens and 31 officers and men, landed safely at Matsuzaki, near Shimoda. Representatives of the firm have left Yokohama for the scene of the disaster.

Further details with regard to the accident to the German steamer Wik are given by a telegram from Shidzuoka. The ship left Yokohama at 5 a.m. on Aug. 15th for Kobe. While off Mikomoto-jima, Idzu peninsula, fire occurred on board. The Matsuzaki Police Office in the district of Kamo at once sent out three steamboats and a number of fishing junks to the scene. The efforts of the Japanese to put out the flames were unsuccessful. Later the Japanese towed the ship towards the land with a view to saving her from sinking. Meanwhile, two or three tremendous explosions occurred in the engine room, and the hull was broken in two. A German was killed and a Chinaman sustained injury. The others of the crew were all safely landed. A portion of the cargo was also saved.

Capt. Carstens, of the German steamer Wik, has sent the following report to the headman of Matsuzaki, Idzu, peninsula: The Wik (2,822 tons) chartered by the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, took fire about 6 p.m. on Aug. 15th while about forty miles off Mikomotojima, Idzu province. The outbreak originated in the engine room, and the flames spread quickly throughout the ship.

At 10 a.m. the following day, the vessel was in a serious state. In spite of the raging waves, many Japanese junks approached the Wik and gave every assistance to the German crew and subsequently saved them. Oscar Strauss, one of the seamen, was killed, and two others sustained injuries while struggling to put out the fire. The value of the ship is yen 420,030. The cargo consists of paper, iron, cement, sugar, drugs, etc., 1,500 tons in all.

It is said that the Wik was insured for yen 150,000. The value of the cargo is put down at about yen 300,000.

On Aug. 20th, the Captain of the Wik and his crew were examined at the German Consulate-General in Yokohama.

YOKOHAMA.

Mr. S. Yano, a lawyer of Yokohama; Messrs. H. Bekkey and Yamakawa of the Specie Bank; Messrs. L. Cotte, G. Gilbert, L. Mottet, and other Japanese and foreign gentlemen are promoting a shooting ground at Gonaeda, O-okagawa, Yokohama, about three miles from the Kencho. On Aug. 19th, the police of the Yokohama Central Station inspected the place at the request of the promoters. Permission to set up targets will shortly be given. The range extends for about three hundred and fifty yards. In the centre of the ground, a tunnel will be built through which the shooting will be directed so as to avoid danger from stray bullets.

As the term of Mr. Saito, the first alderman of the Yokohama City office, will expire at the end of this month, an election will take place in September. Mr. Saito has been elected twice to the post which he has filled for twelve years. He is now willing to retire but the citizens, it is said, intend to re-elect him.

The representatives of foreign and Japanese habutae traders in Yokohama, on Aug. 20th, presented a petition to the Department of Agriculture and Commerce asking for the establishment of a habutae conditioning house in this city. The petition stated that any disputes arising in habutae transactions have hitherto been principally due to inferior quality and weight. Not only the examination of quality, but also the fixing of the maximum and minimum grade of moisture should be officially stated after arranging the average of the various districts. Thus habutae silk should be classified in various grades. The same regulation should also apply to taffeta, crape, kaiki and other silk for export. The petition added that the foreign and Japanese silk traders are willing to bear the costs incurred in the establishment of the institution.

On the evening of August 19th, fire broke out in the office of Dr. F. O. Wolf, No. 50, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama. The flames were put out before severe damage was done. The cause seems to have been the fusing of an electric light wire.

Shigeru (19) the wife of S. Juyuhiro, an employee of Mr. B. C. Foster, No. 24, Bluff, at 1 a.m. on Aug. 20th, attempted to commit suicide by throwing herself into the sea at the front of the Club Hotel, No. 5, Yokohama. She was saved by a policeman. She stated at the Kagacho Police Office that her husband was always drinking and treated her cruelly.

While watering the road at the rear of the Kagacho Police Office at 9.30 a.m. on Aug. 20th, a coolie named Hashimoto sustained severe injuries on feet and head through collision with a goods waggon. He was at once removed to the Yokohama Hospital.

YACHTING.

Yachting on Saturday was conducted under moderately favourable conditions. The large boats sailed a cruising race to Uraga, in which, however, it is to be regretted, only two started, the prize being the Maid Marion Cup, and there does not seem to have been much racing. Reiner and Naniwa got away together, the former, crossing too soon, having to return. At the harbour entrance Naniwa, three and a half minutes ahead, stood right across to Daddy's Bluff where she tacked at 3 p.m. in a breeze of varying strength but still of good sailing weight. Reiner worked down in short tacks but manifestly lost except when the wind fell light. At Fort No. 2 Naniwa was quite a couple of miles ahead. The leader had the No. 3 Fort abeam to leeward about 4 p.m. and reached the Uraga Dock mooring buoy at 5.22.40, the Reiner mooring at 5.48.09, so that Naniwa wins the Cup. Sunday was a bright and clear day and a trip was made to Kanaya, whence the competing yachts returned to Yokohama early on Sunday afternoon.

The following are the times:—

	h.m.s.	h.m.	h.m.s.
Naniwa	1.0.33	5.22.40	4.37.40
Reiner	1.1.40	5.48.09	4.58.09

The Mosquito Club yachts had a race on Saturday, which resulted as follows:

	Start.	Finish.
	h.m.s.	h.m.s.
Winsome	2.15.15	3.47.02
Ple	2.15.05	3.41.00
Etna	2.15.16	3.41.33

A number of Larks also raced over one of their courses.

CHOLERA.

Six new cases of cholera appeared at Moji on August 15th and 16th.

It is reported by telegrams to Tokyo papers that a British gentleman of Nagasaki has been attacked by cholera and died.

A Kobe telegram says that on Aug. 17th a case of cholera was reported at Hyogo. The patient is an employee of a merchant named K. Tsunamoto, residing in Kamihashi-dori.

Seven new cases of cholera were reported on Aug. 17th at Moji. A case of the same disease appeared among the crew on the Russian steamer Mongolia, which arrived at Nagasaki on August 18th from Shanghai.

Two new cases of cholera were reported at Shimonoseki on Aug. 19th. On the previous day, seven fresh cases of the same disease appeared at Moji. Since the first appearance, which took place in July, up to the present there have been fifty patients. Five have recovered.

A case of suspected cholera appeared on Aug. 19th in Shiba, Tokyo. The patient is a woman thirty-six years old living at Atago-machi.

It is reported that the weather in Shanghai is very hot and cholera is prevalent. Some eighty cases are reported every day, principally in the native quarters. Small pox and measles are also prevalent.

A new case of cholera was reported on Aug. 19th in Fukagawa, Tokyo.

On Aug. 20th, a case of the same disease was found among the crew on a steamer at Wakamatsu.

Cholera is prevalent in Hiroshima and Ujina. A case was found among the passengers who arrived at Ujina from Moji on Aug. 19th by the Tonegawa Maru.

An Indian among the crew on the British steamer Monteagle, which arrived at Nagasaki on Aug. 20th from Shanghai, is suffering from dysentery. The ship was temporarily removed to the quarantine station. The sanitary authorities are examining the patient.

An official telegram says that a British gentleman has died at the Bluff Hotel, Nagasaki, suffering from cholera. He arrived there on Aug. 12th from Shanghai by the Hakui Maru. Twelve foreign guests at the hotel are undergoing disinfecting measures.

On Aug. 20th, eight new cases of cholera were reported at Moji. From the first appearance, which took place in July up to date, there have been seventy-three cases, forty of them fatal.

Four cases of cholera appeared in Yamaguchi prefecture on Aug. 21st. Two proved fatal.

THE "CITY OF CARTHAGE" CASUALTY.

The enquiry into the wreck of the steamer City of Carthage was resumed at the British Consulate, Kobe, on Aug. 20th. After taking further evidence the Court decided that the accident was due to the Master underestimating his distance from the Hinosaki light. Having no means of getting a cross-bearing, he should have stood close in to the light to make absolutely certain of his position. He should, therefore, between 2.30 and 3 a.m. have verified the position by bearings of the Hinosaki light, when he would have found that a strong set to the north-west had taken the ship six miles from the point where he expected to be. There were a number of fishing boats about, in trying to avoid which the Master appears to have completely lost the position of the ship. In trying to get on his course again the vessel struck a rock. For neglecting to verify his position the Master should be reprimanded, but in view of his long and creditable sea service the Court does not deal with his Certificate, which is returned to him. The Court also holds that the Second Officer limited himself to carrying out the Master's orders only, and did not make any observations personally. All the rest of the officers are exonerated. The Master is ordered to bear the cost of the Enquiry.

THE "MONTEAGLE" AFFAIR.

A Shanghai telegram under date of Aug. 20th says that the American who murdered a foreign woman and carried the corpse on board the steamer Monteagle is detained on the American cruiser Galveston at Chefoo. The Chinese Government ordered the American warship to leave the port on account of the detention of the culprit. In connexion with this order, the British Consul at Chefoo sent a telegram to Wei-hai-wei asking the commanding officer of the Naval station to despatch a warship to the port. A gun-boat arrived at Chefoo and subsequently the Chinese Government cancelled the order of departure given to the American ship. Later the British gun-boat returned to her station. The American, whose name is given by the Asahi as Adsett—is alleged to have committed the crime in British territory (Hongkong), consequently the British representative is conducting negotiations with the American Consul at Chefoo with a view to his transference.

CUSTOMS PROTEST.

Mr. Yamazaki, Director of the Yokohama Customs has delivered a decision on a protest instituted by Messrs. Gysin, Schoeninger and Co. No. 93, Yamashita-cho. The firm imported Tissus de laine, a kind of woollen cloth, on which the appraisers imposed duty at the rate of 9.3 per square yard in accordance with No. 55-A of the Anglo-Japanese Conventional tariff. The importers contended that the material is a kind of woollen tissue but not to be included in woollen cloth and that consequently the duty should be ad val. 10 per cent. under No. 61 of the same tariff. The protest was dismissed on the ground that the material is woollen cloth in the nature of its weaving and quality.

STORMS.

A thunderstorm was experienced on Aug. 20th in Nagano prefecture. Flooding occurred in the districts of Kamimidzu, Uchisuwa, Sarashina and Upper Takai. Some buildings were damaged and several persons were injured.

Owing to a heavy storm, on Aug. 19th, twelve houses collapsed, four were washed away, one person was killed and four were injured at Keibun, not far from Sapporo. On the following day, another storm visited the village of Shinoji, near Sapporo. A landslide occurred through which one person was killed and ten were more or less injured.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

In a seven innings game on Tuesday the U.S.S. Pennsylvania beat the Y.C. and A.C. for the third time at baseball by a score of seven runs to one.

It is reported by Japanese journals that the Great Northern Steamship Co. intend to purchase the British steamer Sharonut and employ her in place of the Dakota.

Another of the Russian gun-boats which were sunk at Port Arthur during the war has been floated. She left there on August 19th for Nagasaki being towed by the Yorilomo Maru.

It would seem that Miyanoshta is not exempt from the attacks of burglars. On Wednesday night rooms were entered and bags stolen, though, on the whole, actual valuables have been discarded.

The Okayama Orphanage Record for July gives a capital idea of the noble work being done for the orphans who enter its doors. From it we learn that 25 dollars supports one child one year; fifty dollars feeds the whole orphanage one day; one hundred dollars sustains the whole orphanage one day. These figures give an excellent indication of the scope of this deserving charity.

Mr. K. Okura, whose father is the head of the well-known firm of Messrs. Okura & Co., has purchased a six cylinder F.L.A.T. car. This car, which is to be shipped to Japan very shortly, is of exactly the same type as the Fiat which was recently supplied to the King of Spain, the first royal personage to take delivery of a 6-cylinder car. Mr. Okura, jun., who is frequently to be seen on the Brooklands motor track in one of his cars, is engaged to Miss Ida Lytton.—Anglo-Japanese Gazette.

A telegram dated Kobe August 20th, sent by one "Nishisaka," says:—"Competition between the American steamer Korea and the French steamer Amiral Oby is severe. Passage rates to Hawaii have been lowered to thirty yen per steerage passenger. Passengers by the French ship, which left on Aug. 20th, number four hundred. Mr. T. Hinata, M.P., the president of the Tokyo Immigration Co., has arrived from Tokyo. He is attending to the despatch of the labourers."

The Nagasaki Press announces the death of Mrs. Bedford, which took place early on the 14th inst. at Bishop's Lodge, Deshima, the residence of her son-in-law, the Rt. Rev. H. Evington, D.D., Bishop of Kyushu. The deceased lady had had been in failing health for many months past and the sad event was not unexpected. Although a great age, Mrs. Bedford was a regular attendant at the English Church services up to last year, when increasing feebleness made it impossible for her to undertake the journey except on rare occasions.

The following Imperial Decree was issued at Peking Aug. 10th:—"Decree in the name of the Empress Dowager stating that for over two hundred years there have never been any jealousies between Manchus and Chinese, and that of late Manchu posts have been freely given to Chinese, such as the posts of Tartar General, Assistant Military Governor and the like. In a word there have been no distinctions made by the Throne between the two races and men have been appointed according to abilities shown. This is known throughout the empire. At the present crisis, when the country is labouring under difficulties, it should be the manifest duty of one and all to work unanimously for the welfare of the empire to the exclusion of racial jealousies. In the circumstances their Majesties desire to know exactly the present day position between Manchus and Chinese, and the officials, both in Peking as well as in the provinces, are commanded each to make a report on the subject and to suggest the best way of doing away with the evils of racial jealousy."

CORRESPONDENCE.

ORTHODOXY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—If you will kindly request the business manager to instruct the foreman of the composing room to take the mallet for locking up the forms into the proof-readers den and hammer into his head gently but firmly the fact that in my previous letter on page 7 third column, the eighth line from the bottom he has not "sensed" the copy. The word should be "cursed," the meaning being that the Church is cursed by hypocrites. It was always so, even in the apostolic college "One of you is a devil."

To-day there are men who stand up in the Church's livery and lead the devotions of the people in the ancient formulas who then try to explain them away, and endeavor to make them mean in modern speech what they were never intended to mean when they were compiled. It has been the effort to eliminate such deceivers that has caused the Church to be the most powerful educational engine on earth; always defining the Faith to meet the sophistries of false teachers within the fold.

Japan owes very much to the free educational influences of Theological seminaries.

Just as the Sapporo Agricultural College failed to produce any modern up-to-date agriculturalists, but did succeed in producing some very brilliant teachers of English, so the theological seminaries have succeeded in turning out some very valuable instructors in many branches of secular instruction.

Clear apprehension of exact theological truth is not to be expected in the Japanese mind until the language is fixed a little more firmly. Even then the opinions of open port people will not "cut much ice."

QUARANTINE DETENTION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—We, the passengers on the steamer Kumano Maru, strongly protest against the delay in granting pratique to the passengers and crew of this boat, yesterday afternoon. We anchored just after 3, all ready for shore, and only awaited inspection and we were detained several hours.

We consider this unfair, as many of us have only a few days; and very unfair to captain, officers and crew, whose time in their homes has also been shortened to that extent.

We do not consider that the state of the weather was sufficient excuse for the delay.

CHRISTIANITY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The letters of "Agnostic" and "S.L.P.I." referring to what I wrote the other day, have been read with interest not unmingled with surprise. Both appear to think I have assayed to define Christianity, a task which I had no notion of undertaking. I simply indicated certain features which must receive consideration whenever the attempt is made. There was no intimation that there were no other elements in Christianity which might properly be called essential, as, of course, I believe there are. My purpose was simply to enter an emphatic protest against any definition which assumed that Christianity is merely, or even chiefly, a system of doctrine. This protest I would utter as strongly against "S.L.P.I." as against "Agnostic."

If I write frankly, I trust I may not be thought discourteous; but to my mind, the idea that even the Apostles' Creed, in spite of all its hallowed associations, can be called a definition of Christianity, is preposterous. The Nicene Creed, with its overestimate upon philosophy, is even more unsatisfactory, whatever may be its value in other directions.

Again, it is difficult for me to understand how "Agnostic" can claim that I reduce Christianity to a mere system of ethics. The emphasis which I laid on the spiritual side of Christianity, as well as upon religious experience, should have prevented any such strange misapprehension of my meaning. No, there is no need of my entering upon any argument to prove that Christian ethics are superior to the ethics of Confucius or Buddha. While, without doubt, I think they are superior, it is not upon that superiority that I base my claim to a hearing. My claim is that Christian faith opens the way to a new life. Those representatives of Buddhism who have come nearest to Christianity understand this. Their question is merely whether this claim can be made good. The Christian teacher believes that the spirit which is the life of Christianity has been proved, and is being proved afresh each day, to be the Power of God. But the faith which is the door to the new life is no purely intellectual acceptance of certain teachings; though of course, the intellectual factor in varying degrees is always present.

Now as to my fancy, shall I call it, that theology will hardly again be made the test of the genuineness of religious faith, though I am quite aware that there are those who hold like "S. I. P. I." that Christ provided for the establishment of a particular Church with its special organisation and regulations and that one who is not brought into that Church is outside the pale, I still think such persons are apt to underestimate the recognition which the truly representative men of their own bodies give to the faith of outsiders.

The philosophy by which such recognition is to be explained or defended, does not concern me. It may be, as with some at least of the Roman Catholics, the doctrine of invincible ignorance or some theory of uncoordinated mercies; but whatever the explanation is, there is implied in it an admission that the Divine mercy is not to be restricted to the technicalities of the law book.

However, I do not propose to enter upon any further argument, but before closing perhaps I may be pardoned if I recall an experience of mine which has left a happy memory and which has convinced me, possibly it may convince others, that the fences between the different branches of the one Church of Christ are not so high as "Agnostic" supposes.

Not so very long ago the revered Archbishop who presides over the branch of the Greek Church in Japan celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his consecration as Bishop. While the preparations were being made for this function, a delegation waited upon me with an invitation to be present, at the same time informing me that a similar invitation had been extended to two representatives of the Anglican Church, only one of whom, unfortunately, was able to attend.

The services were most impressive. After an interesting address, the venerable Archbishop turned to Bishop—and myself, called us by name, and in the presence of the large congregation thanked us in the most cordial manner for sharing in the services which meant so much to him.

Now is it not a fair inference from such an experience that, back of all the important variations of theological opinion which may at times appear to separate us from one another, there is a deep-seated conviction, on both sides, that we are bound together by a common purpose, born of a genuine Christian faith?

I had thought to close, but an incident occurs to me, which still farther illustrates this point. Perhaps a dozen years ago, a missionary of the American Board in Turkey died. He had spent forty years among the Armenians and had won their confidence and affection by his goodness of heart and self-forgetful sympathy. When the news of his death became known, the whole City was in mourning and the priests in charge of the Gregorian Church came to the friends and begged that the interment might be within the walls of their sanctuary. There were family reasons why the request could not be granted, but the sympathy of the Gregorian priests and their congregation was fully shown in other ways, and it is said that every shop in the City was closed on the day of the funeral.

Does not this also point to a test of faith quite apart from theology?

I remain, Sir, yours, etc.,

DANIEL CROSBY GREENE.

Nikko, August 16th, 1907.

(P. S.—Since writing the above, while reading an essay by J. Brierley, I ran across the following paragraph which bears upon certain statements in my former letter:—

"That seems a very daring statement of Augustine's in his 'Retractions': 'That which is now called the Christian religion existed among the ancients and in fact was with the human race from the beginning.' And yet it is plain what he means. It is the faith of Origen and the Greek fathers that the Logos, 'the light that lighteth every man,' was in the world from the first, guiding man upward from point to point of his spiritual career."

The Christ whose presence made holy the fields of Galilee spoke to human memory when he declared the heavenly kingdom, the Divine fatherhood and the soul's destiny. The soul leaped at the message because it found in it an echo of the Primal Voice."

THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Your comments in the issue of 12th inst. upon the Council of the principal instructors of Higher Schools throughout the Empire, which has lately been in session in Tokyo discussing the unsatisfactory results of language teaching in their institutions, lead me to express my opinion upon some of what I consider to be serious defects in the system followed. I speak from more than twenty years experience in trying to teach the English language in those Higher Schools, and from my own effort to impart some knowledge of our literature. The charge made "that the vast bulk of the students entering the University from high schools have such a defective knowledge of any foreign language that they can neither understand a foreign teacher when he lectures to them nor write an intelligible thesis in any foreign tongue," is undoubtedly justly made; my only surprise is that it has not been made before, and that something intelligent has not been done to remedy matters.

According to the organization of the Government's educational plan, we should have the right to expect all the students, who come up to us in the Higher Schools, which are supposed to be distinctly collegiate in their scope and work, from the Middle Schools, after at least five years instruction in the English language, to have a sufficient knowledge of our tongue at least to understand the meaning of simple words and ordinary phrases, after giving the newcomers a day or two to get accustomed to the voice of the strange teacher. I am perfectly well aware that it is absolutely unreasonable to expect students, who have been under the charge of teachers of English who are themselves quite unable to converse in that language, to understand us when we talk to them, much less to reply to us intelligently or even intelligibly. But we have a right to expect from our Freshmen a knowledge of the meaning of easy, common English words and of our simplest grammatical constructions. That we do not find this rudimentary knowledge in more than ten per cent. of our new students is, I think, a fact that all my colleagues will confirm. What, then, is the defect? I think it is to be found in the small amount of memorizing work which is required of pupils in the Middle Schools. You know that it is impossible to acquire a knowledge of any foreign language without a tremendous amount of memorizing: it is the "creeping" part of the language-life, and the Japanese youth is, as a rule, most strenuously opposed to doing anything of the sort; he wishes to run at once, and instead of "learning" a language, he expects to go at once to its study as a synthetic process; in other words to know it without working for it by the drudgery of memorizing.

From observation and from experience, I know that nothing like as much is done in this memorizing in the Middle Schools as should be. There is a pernicious habit existing in those schools of lecturing to the boys about English lessons, the teachers usually call it "explaining;" but how many years will my son take to learn Japanese so that he can understand a Japanese professor when he lectures to him or write an intelligible thesis in Japanese, if an English-speaking teacher "explains" in English the meaning of a story in the Japanese readers without requiring the lad to learn, actually commit to memory, the meaning of words and the simplest locutions?

With my first year classes in the Higher School course, I find myself compelled to descend to the most rudimentary work in trying to impart a knowledge of the meaning of words and of sentences which should be perfectly understood by young men who have really studied English for five years or more. The trouble is they do not "study" English in those lower schools as they should; they have not been required to put into their memory a sufficient stock of words and their meaning; and what is worse, the boys know that the teachers cannot be made to compel this necessary task of memorizing. I purposely refrain from all comment upon pronunciation, because that introduces a difficulty that wrings from every conscientious foreign teacher of language a torrent of sympathy for his Japanese associates, and which, as you say, cannot be overcome because "there is no money to remedy this state of affairs" by securing the assistance of competent teachers who have the ability to impart a correct knowledge of English conversation. Personally, I am led to suggest that the price of a battleship or two be turned over to the Department of Education to remedy this defect: there is little doubt in my mind that the ultimate result would be more permanently beneficial, even if the immediate show were not so dazzling to the eyes!

When, then, I find in a class of forty or fifty new students, that not more than four or five know the meaning of simple English words and how to use them, my first move was to ask them to learn a lesson, and by "learning" I meant to commit something to memory. I say "was," because I soon found that the students were naturally, and not altogether improperly, impressed with a sense of their own dignity as collegians, and objected to being sent back to what they called Middle School work; and what is more serious, they were upheld in this by the head of the English Department; so that lessons in memorizing, no matter how firmly convinced I was of their absolute necessity, had to be abandoned, and whatever was accomplished in the way I desired, had to be done during the fifty minutes of a "lecture." That ended, the books which I had been "explaining" were closed and put away, not to be opened until the next "lecture"; and with only two or at the most three of these a week, it is no see that really nothing much could be accomplished. I have always insisted upon the use of notebooks for recording special matters, the use of idioms, scraps of conversation, etc., but when it came to demanding that these should be memorized and used, I have invariably found myself against a wall of opposition which I could neither break down nor scale. There are always a few students in each class who are anxious to get a thoroughly good working knowledge of English, and these would do any amount of memorizing; but I am not permitted to set the pace for the rest of the class by what these will do.

I am convinced that if more attention were given to memorizing in the Middle Schools and to the use of simple idioms that any teacher in those schools, no matter how defective his pronunciation may be, can guide, the necessity for this rudimentary work in the Higher Schools would be eliminated; but until that elimination is accomplished, we teachers of English (and of other foreign languages, of course,) in the Higher Schools should be supported in our effort to repair a mistake in the lower course. When I have had an occasional private pupil with whom I was at liberty to follow my own method, and have insisted upon memorizing, I have always done more in three months than I can do with a whole class in the entire school year.

KOTOAGAKKO.

Karuiawa, Aug. 16, 1907.

THE LAST WORD.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—As it would be useless for me to continue a discussion in which my opponent maintains his opinion notwithstanding that all the greatest scholars and thinkers are against him, it may be as well for me to bring my part of it to a close by giving a brief resume of the facts elicited by the controversy.

1. The main truth for which I have been contending is that Christianity, being the highest and noblest ideal that has ever been revealed to the world, is the best life for a man to live, and that Agnosticism cannot morally justify itself in discouraging this attitude toward Christianity, as to do so would be to prefer the inferior to the superior, a negation to a positive good.

"Truth seeker," the only one that has ventured to question this truth, really evades the point by directing attention to the minor consideration of the historicity of the personal Christ. He denies, in the face of the highest modern scholarship, that Christ ever lived, and assumes that if his contention can be proved, men are justified in rejecting the Christ life.

2. I reply that this attitude toward truth is based on the false reasoning that confuses truth with the temporary, or historic, expression of it. The truth for which Christianity stands, like all truth, is independent, for its reality, of the historic or accidental forms by which it may have been revealed or illustrated; that gravitation, e.g., would still be true, though Newton could not be proved to have been a historical personage. The moral and spiritual facts for which Christianity stands would remain, even though they had not yet found an adequate manifestation in history. That the life of Christ was true in history, and was the best life for man to live then as now, that it was true before Christ appeared, is true now, and always will be true, no matter what course history may take. Man's duty to appropriate that life as his own, is not rendered nugatory by any question of history. To maintain the opposite, is to assume an attitude destructive of all moral obligation to follow the best. Moreover to deny the historicity of Christ in the face of the experience that the moral and spiritual life for which Christ lived and died, is a reality in millions of human lives in the world to-day, shows the absurdity to which unreason can descend in its effort to escape the truth, and avoid the moral obligation that truth always imposes.

I have endeavored to insist upon this important principle throughout the course of this discussion, because to deny, or ignore, it, is to destroy all reality in religion and moral life; to accept the form of truth for its essence, and either deceive oneself or become a hypocrite. I have, therefore, vainly, as it appears, tried to show "Truth seeker" that the value of a thing is determined, not by its empirical origin, or by any accident of its outward history, but by its own inherent nature. The question is not what Christianity was, or how it came to be what it is, but what it is now: is it good or bad? of heaven or hell? Is there any better way?

Naturally the revelation of truth to man is a growth, and as such it will manifest itself in history as man develops a capacity to receive it; nor have I said anything in this discussion that can be fairly used to change me with undervaluing the history of Christianity as a witness to its usefulness; neither can my reference to Locke be twisted to mean that I have tried to show that Locke set no value on history as a source of historic truth; but what I maintain is that the Criterion by which we judge the worth of a thing, e.g., the worth of what has grown from less to more in history, is not "how" it arose, but "what" it "is"; not what external conditions have contributed to its rise and progress, but what it has ultimately become. If Christianity is the noblest life for men to live now, nothing that has happened in the past can change this fact.

Is man any the less man, and his greatness any the less real, because it may be shown that his history is uncertain and even dark, or even that he originated with the lower animals? "Reason and thought in man are what they are even though it were proved that the rational were slowly emerged out of the animal nature; nor does mind or intelligence become other than it is, whether we think of them as made out of nothing, or out of the dust of the earth, or as developed by infinitesimal transitions out of the anthropoid ape." So says one of the greatest thinkers of modern times; and that which is true of man and his mind, is also true of the religion that has brought him to the highest that his moral and spiritual nature has yet reached.

3. But "Truth seeker" will not listen to the truth that the moral and spiritual obligations that Christianity lays upon man, are independent of history; he will be governed by history itself or nothing; he has more confidence in his intellectual than in his moral and spiritual nature; yet he assumes the utterly irrational position that it is not sufficient that all which Christianity stands for in the domain of spiritual superiority, shall stand the test of reason: it must be made dependent on history. Like Thomas of old, he has no faith in moral and spiritual reality, apart from material proof he must plunge in his fingers and reopen the wounds of the crucified, before he will believe in the reality and eternity of goodness; in other words, moral, love, immortality, righteousness, all must be proved historic to be acceptable. But to him, as to the doubter of old, the greatest among men still says: "Blessed are those that have not seen and yet have believed." He that cannot believe in moral and spiritual reality, without historic proof, is defective in those potentialities that go to make a man.

"Truth seeker," therefore, demands history or nothing; and yet he furnishes one more sad illustration of the old truth that the man who cannot believe in the best without historic proof, will not believe, with it, for he rejects all the history that there is in relation to the matter under discussion. It is the old story: "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one rose from the dead." If the highest moral and spiritual truth does not appeal to a man, nothing else will. Thus your readers will have noticed that "Truth seeker" spurns the highest authorities and constitutes himself the supreme interpreter of history.

Of course it must be understood that when it comes to matters of history the opinions of neither "Truth seeker" nor myself, are of the slightest value; the discussion then becomes an appeal to the highest scholarship. Accordingly, in this connection, I have shown that in the opinion of the greatest Biblical scholars, that Paul, Clement of Rome, Pliny, the younger, Josephus, all refer to Christ as a historic personage; and I maintain that no scholar of the first rank as a historical authority doubts the authenticity of these witnesses. To despise the greatest in a matter like this, is to justly lay oneself open to the implication of cheating motives that would pervert history to help an untenable theory. Against the great biblical critics of to-day "Truth seeker" does not hesitate to place the opinion of a second rate German rationalist who discredits the genuineness of Paul's four Epistles to which I have referred. Whereas one of the greatest of even the agnostic school is against him. In his work entitled "The Apostle Paul," vol. I, p. 276, Ferdinand Christian Bauer says: "Against these four epistles not even the slightest suspicion of spuriousness has ever been raised." Against scholars like Dr. Lightfoot, of Durham, "Truth seeker" offers his opinion that Clement of Rome was a credulous dupe, whose writings are unworthy of confidence. I have not read the Epistles of Clement, in the original, since I was a student at College, but I can remember seeing nothing that would show him to be anything less than fit to be a historian as well as bishop of the metropolis of the world; and the use made of his reference to the "Phoenix" story, is as much as to imply that no one can tell a curious story to illustrate a truth or make a parable, without being accused of believing it as history. The quotation from Josephus XX 91, is challenged by "Truth seeker" as an interpolation; but he can furnish no first class authority to justify this assumption. He would also have your readers believe that the letters of Pliny are open to suspicion as reliable history, and that the great Roman never referred to Christ as a person; all of which is without any reliable authority. No scholar doubts the authenticity of these letters; and Pliny does refer to Christ as a real person "whom the Christians worshipped as God," (Pliny 96, 97). It is clearly no use to discuss matters of history with one who rejects the best authorities, and takes refuge in third rate German and English controversialists to whose authority no scholar of importance would ever defer. Concerning J. M. Robertson, to whose authority "Truth seeker" so constantly and confidently appeals, as a reliable interpreter of Christian history, one of the leading agnostic writers of to-day says that he (Robertson) greatly prejudices his value as a historian by writing as a mere controversialist "with a theory to prove;" at any rate no university professor of importance would ever recommend the writings of Robertson or the author of Supernatural Religion, to students as the best historical authorities on their respective subjects; and it is only by nullifying our reason that we can do so in this discussion.

Does it not seem strange that the critic who cannot believe the plain testimony of history, and the verdict of the greatest scholars, concerning the rise and growth of Christianity, can yet be credulous enough to believe the far more impossible probability that the Gospels were the concoction of deceivers who entered into collusion to bolster up a hopeless superstition. But the very fact that the New Testament does not agree in every detail, and that discrepancies exist, proves that these writings could not have been the work of the collaborators of an after age; they show every evidence of a truthful record of facts. To say that the New Testament is a fiction is to cast an aspersion on the characters and general motives of its writers, that history lends no evidence to support, and that the books themselves do nothing to justify. The authors of the New Testament were either honest men telling what they knew to be true, or they were liars trying to deceive the public: to decide which is the greater probability may safely be left to those who have faith in the moral history of mankind. To believe that deceivers could be capable of producing a book that has exceeded all others in its ennobling influence over the human race, and that the best of mankind increasingly admire and read, in every land from age to age, is only possible to those whom perversity in time, leads to believe a lie.

I cannot close this discussion without thanking you and your readers for forbearance in treating this subject with the patience and consideration it deserves; and I would ask to be given the credit of having been content to treat the subject in relation to its fundamental essence, without accepting the invitation to deluge your pages for months with dissertations on Christian history that any one may read for himself in any authoritative history of the Christian Church.

Yours, etc., J. INGRAM BRYAN.

TOO ADHESIVE STAMPS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—When adhesive stamps were invented it was considered a great convenience, and so it is at most times and in most places, but in this country in the summer if the Post Offices had on sale stamps without any adhesive properties as well as the ordinary kind probably many purchasers would prefer the former and they might buy a larger quantity at a time than they care to do now when, even if the stamps are kept in the little books with oiled paper leaves provided by the Post Office Department, the result is apt to be that the stamps adhere to the wrong thing. The folding letter sheets (fukan hogaki) are at this season of the year usually already sealed when they are sold at the offices. If the Post Office Department would make an experiment at a few post offices they might discover considerable demand for non-adhesive stamps.

I am, Sir, Yours, etc., SPECTATOR.

THE TIDES AT HONMOKU.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Can any of your readers inform me why the a.m. tides at present should be so much lower than the p.m. tides, as for several days past there has been a difference of fully two feet; the p.m. or afternoon tide being at least that much higher than the morning one at their relative stages.

Yours truly, HONMOKU.

MR. KEIR HARDIE, M.P.

By the Empress on Sunday arrived Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., in search of health and rest. Here is what the New York Commercial has to say of him:—

His health is seriously impaired. The most picturesque member of the British labour party, himself an undisguised socialist, he has broken down in the 15-year struggle to persuade his countrymen that they should adopt the dual principle of the communization of the products of labour and the means of production. To this mistaken creed his faith is pinned; to the propagation of it he has devoted himself with unceasing diligence; and, now that he has come to a parting of the ways so far as his physical condition is concerned, he caps the climax by announcing that he will resign the leadership of the parliamentary labourites in order to found a new party of out-and-out socialism.

This means that the long-expected split in the ranks of British labour is imminent. It means also that the majority of the labourites, although respecting the earnestness of Keir Hardie, have discovered that his programme of antagonizing the trades unions is not the best for labour. In the new labour organization, from which Hardie is excluded by his own choice, less will be heard of abstract socialism, and an attempt will be made to co-solidate the forces of trades unionism. Hardie's idea has been to place socialism first and trades unionism last.

There is always something pathetic in the spectacle of a good man who is on the roadway of a bad system. Hardie is the most notable illustration in British politics. William Morris, the poet and decorator, was not animated by a purer motive in his advocacy of socialism—the passion of his closing years—than the motive actuating Hardie. The latter's constituents, even those who denounce his theories of society and government, concede the man's private virtues and disinterestedness.

If there is any British politician who is an altruist, surely Hardie is he. Probably he would say that true socialism spells altruism, but the history of socialist movements in Europe—however it may be with their history in the United States—has not been illuminated by numerous instances of the practical embodiment of this view among the leaders. Hardie is genuinely altruistic. He would divide his last loaf with his neighbour, and would be apt to give the neighbour the whole thing. One of his most relentless political foes, a Tory of the old hide-bound school, has admitted as much publicly of late in almost so many words.

But the martyr's courage and devotion are not proof of the soundness of his faith. Hardie belongs in the category with the good men who have believed in ghosts and witches, who have been ready to die for the belief that the sun goes around the earth and that the earth is flat. The more his personal virtues are examined the more his political delusions are deplored. Delusions always seem greater against the background of virtues.

If he recovers his health in the tour of the world, he will remain a man to be reckoned with. He is a fiery, fearless orator, an able journalist—somewhat in the style of Henry Watterson—and an organizer of exceptional skill and astuteness. Years ago the London press ceased to call him "Queer" Hardie, with a jibe at his middle name. He has met and talked with the King.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS SOURCES.

The planet Mars has recently been in close neighbourhood to the earth; in fact, nearer than it has been at any time since 1892, and splendid results are expected from the observations in North and South America. M. Camille Flammarion, the French astronomer, is of opinion, with Mr. Lowell, that the canals in Mars are artificial, and that they are regulated by living beings, who are probably much further advanced than we are scientifically and intellectually. He says that Mars must be a pleasant planet to live in, as its weather is always fine and the sky always cloudless. The winds are never high, there are no rains or storms. Martian life is probably far ahead of ours, as the planet is older.

A New York correspondent states that several valuable American cows have been shipped to Tokyo, to the order of the Government of Japan. One of the animals is valued at £3,000. Another correspondent writes:—This is evidently a step towards a much needed improvement in the quality of Japanese cattle, both from the dairyman's and the butcher's point of view. At present there are only a few thousand head of cattle

In Japan, and these are largely devoted to the supply of the wants of the foreign population. Japan, however, is likely to become far more a meat-eating nation than she has been.

In conjunction with the Japanese railways and steamship companies, the International Sleeping Car Company is organising through passenger communication between Europe to Siberia, and thence by the Eastern China Railway to Dalny and Japan. Express trains will be run between Tokyo and Shimonoseki, and the return journey to Siberia and Europe will be made by way of Fusan, Mukden and Harbin.

The hearing was commenced at Liverpool Assizes on July 15th of the libel action brought by Messrs. Lever Bros., Ltd., the well-known soap manufacturers of Port Sunlight, against the Associated Newspapers, Ltd., publishers of the Daily Mail and Evening News. The case arose out of a series of newspaper articles dealing with the soap manufacturers' combination which was formed and subsequently dissolved at the end of last year. The defendants pleaded that the alleged libels were true, that the conduct of the plaintiffs was fraudulent and dishonest, and that the articles complained of were fair comment. Sir E. Carson, in opening the case, characterised the methods of the Daily Mail as those of the assassin, and said that no matter what Levers did the defendants were determined to ruin them by telling lies. The action concluded in a dramatic fashion on the third day, when, chiefly as the result of a long cross-examination of Mr. W. H. Lever, M.P., Mr. Rufus Isaacs, on behalf of the defendants, unreservedly withdrew all the charges, apologised for their publication, and agreed to pay £50,000 damages. The jury returned a verdict for this amount, with costs. So far as actions of libel are concerned the settlement arrived at creates a record.

For the last few days, said a London paper of July 19th, there have been rumours to the effect that Dreyfus was about to retire from the Army, in disappointment and disgust. No official announcement of any kind has yet been made. But it looks as if Dreyfus's resignation had been tendered, and virtually accepted. The Commandant complains that many officers have been promoted over him, who would have been his equals and his inferiors in rank if the "Affaire" had never happened; that, in a word, he is still victimised because he is a Jew, and because the charge of treachery, disproved before the highest court in the land, was once generally believed.

The Navy, the official organ of the American Naval League, raises a doubt whether the United States can be considered to rank as a second naval Power in view of the faulty construction of several of its heaviest battleships. Dealing specifically and technically with the Kearsarge and Kentucky, the Navy holds that they would be an easy prey to hostile vessels because their enormous turret ports expose the gun mechanism to instant wreck by even a one-pound rapid-fire gun. The Navy also attacks the new ships as being deficient in water-line armour protection and speed. The Navy Department admits that mistakes were made in the construction of the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, but these have been corrected in later designs, and, all things considered, the Department holds American battleships equal to those of any other Power.

General Baron Nishi, Inspector-General of Military Instruction in Japan, gave a dinner at Berlin on July 18th to which many Japanese and German officers were invited. General Nishi said that 40 years ago when Japan desired to adopt modern methods she had sought a model among European States, and had finally decided to follow the lead of Germany, to whose teaching she had been faithful for the last 20 years. Since those early days Japan had had occasion several times to test the edge of her sword, and it could be said without exaggeration that that sword had been a credit to its German teachers, to whom Japan offered her sincere thanks. General Nishi expressed the hope that in the future, too, his country would take lessons from Europe, and notably from Germany, and thus grow from youth to manhood. The speaker concluded by calling for cheers for the Emperor and the German Army.

The Russian newspaper Retch was confiscated on July 18th for publishing an article by M. Klimkoff, the well-known war correspondent. M. Klimkoff says that China is awakening, and by organising her army and fleet is preparing for war; she is, too, improving her ways and communications, and Japanese officers are swarming throughout Manchuria. The article further says that the relations between the Russians and Chinese are extremely hostile.

At Kingston on 18th July Mr. Kishichiro Okura, a Japanese gentleman, who was second in the First Montague Cup race at the opening meeting of the Brooklands Motor Track on July 6, was summoned for exceeding the 20-mile limit as he was returning from the races in the evening. Fined £5, and 8s. 6d. costs.

King Edward's toast at Wilhelmshoehe, which was couched in remarkably friendly terms, has given the greatest satisfaction in Germany and is regarded as evidence of the happy relations existing between the Monarchs and their peoples.

PROPOSED GIFT TO THE KING.

At the meeting of the Transvaal assembly General Botha moved to acquire the famous Cullinan diamond for the purpose of presenting it to King Edward as a token of loyalty from the Transvaal and to commemorate the granting of self-government.

ILL-FEELING AT CASABLANCA.

Later.

About five hundred Spanish troops have landed at Casablanca and caused much friction with the French, who have complained of breaches of etiquette, lack of discipline and an indisposition to co-operate.

The Franco-Spanish Governments have now arrived at a complete agreement on the subject. Meanwhile all the correspondents agree that General Driede needs large reinforcements to effect the restoration of peace.

MOROCCO.

London, August 18.

A courier from the tribesmen has arrived at Casablanca and presented to General Driede demanding the surrender of the French positions. Otherwise it is suggested that a large force of Kabyles will destroy the French forces. General Driede has sent no reply, regarding his position as impregnable.

PLAGUE.

London, August 19.

Plague has broken out in San Francisco and in Southern Manchuria.

BRITAIN AND VENEZUELA.

Reuter's correspondent at Georgetown (Demerara) states that Captain Calder, commanding a frontier force, had entered Venezuela and demanded at the point of the revolver a quantity of gum which it is alleged has been collected in British forests. The Venezuelan Commissioner, unable to resist, surrendered but appealed to the President of Venezuela.

CRICKET.

London, August 19.

Kent beat Surrey by an innings and 103 runs; Lancashire beat Middlesex by 115 runs; Gloucester beat Hampshire by 83 runs; the South Africans beat Essex by 104 runs; Middlesex beat Yorkshire by one innings and 28 runs; Surrey against Yorkshire and Sussex against Worcester had drawn matches. Notts beat the South Africans by 9 wickets.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

A letter from the King to the Earl of Minto, Viceroy of India, has been published in which His Majesty expresses his anxious solicitude about the plague in India, and his earnest hope that the measures now being prepared will be successful.

JAPAN AND THE PHILIPPINES.

London, August 19.

The New York Herald has interviewed the Hon. W. H. Taft, Secretary for War, regarding reports that Japan might purchase the Philippines. Mr. Taft said that he knew perfectly well that Japan did not want to purchase, while America never would sell the Philippines.

ADMIRAL IJUN'S SQUADRON.

The Tsukuba and Chitose have arrived at Lisbon. The King of Portugal and Vice-Admiral Ijuni exchanged the most cordial toasts at the banquet.

CHOLERA.

London, August 20.

Cholera has broken out in Russian Poland.

THE TRANSVAAL.

General Botha's motion on the diamond question has been adopted by 420 to 19.

AFFAIRS IN MOROCCO.

The Moors attacked Casablanca last morning, when the French forces assumed the aggressive under cover of shell-fire from the warships. The Kabyles lacked ammunition but charged home with the sword. Two of the French force were killed and three wounded; the tribesmen have probably sustained heavy loss.

THE THIRD TEST MATCH.

Later.

The third test match at the Oval between England and South Africa produced very close play, the scores being 226 and 227. Rain interrupted the play.

SHIPPING CASUALTY.

The ship Forth has arrived at Port Louis (Mauritius) with the crew and passengers of the steamer Fortunatus, which was bound from Calcutta to Melbourne and was burned at sea on July 31st. The boats were picked up 600 miles south of Sumatra. One of the stokers was lost.

MR. TAFT ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

Later.

Mr. Taft, speaking at Columbia in Ohio, referred to the quickening of the public conscience with regard to business abuses. He said this foreshadowed a limitation of the railway rate in interstate commerce.

ROOSEVELT ON AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

London, August 21.

President Roosevelt, speaking at Provincetown (Mass.), advocated a national incorporation law for corporations engaged in interstate business. He said the Government should control the railroads as it controlled the national banks. He added that the Government wanted to do something effective to secure the conviction of trust managers in criminal prosecutions but so as not to inflict unmerited suffering on innocent stock-holders.

THE CULLINAN DIAMOND.

London, Aug. 21.

The Progressives of Pretoria opposed the presentation of the Cullinan diamond to King Edward on the ground that such an outlay was inopportune. Mr. Smuts stigmatised the opposition as unworthy and churlish.

MOROCCO.

The French at Tangier attach importance to the fact that Muley Hafid has been proclaimed Sultan at Marakesh. It is believed that this means the creation of an organized Moorish army. The Consuls at Fez have been instructed to advise Europeans to leave if necessary.

CRICKET.

Later.

Heavy rain and thunderstorms are delaying cricket. In the Third Test Match, played at the Oval, England were all out for 295. Fry made 129. The play was very close. The South Africans have made 149 for five wickets in their second innings. Notts have beaten Lancashire at Liverpool by five wickets.

KIPLING A NOBEL PRIZE WINNER.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has been designated for the Nobel prize for Literature.

DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.

The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill having passed the House of Commons has been read a second time in the House of Lords.

PRINCE KUNI AND THE GERMAN ARMY.

London, August 22.

H.I.H. Prince Kuni has been gazetted for service with the Second Regiment of the German Guards from October 1st.

MOROCCO.

It is reported from Mogador that twenty thousand horsemen, under Muley Hafid, are marching on Casablanca to fight the European forces. It is reported that dissensions exist in the Arab camp at Casablanca.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND ORIENTAL LABOUR.

Owing to the constant influx of Japanese, Chinese, and Hindoos, Mr. Macpherson, the member for Vancouver, has wired to Sir Wilfrid Laurier that unless the Canadian Government does something trouble will ensue, as matters are reaching a crisis.

CRICKET.

Later.

The South Africans were out for 178. England scored in the second innings 138. The South Africans scored in their second innings 159 for 5 wickets. The game was then abandoned owing to the bad light. Worcester has won from Yorkshire by 30 runs; Gloucester from Surrey by an innings and 44 runs; Hampshire from Somerset by 106 runs; Warwick from Derby by 6 wickets.

CANADA'S WHEAT CROP.

The official estimate of the wheat crop in Western Canada is 95 million bushels.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "TOKYO ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

RUSSO JAPANESE AGREEMENT.

London, August 16.

The publication of the text of the Russo-Japanese Entente has been received with interest here. The Times pays a tribute to the success of Japanese diplomacy. It expresses confidence that Japan having publicly and emphatically adhered to the principle of an equal opportunity will now take measures to remove all causes of complaint on the part of the foreign merchants with reference to Manchuria.

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

The signing of the Anglo-Russian Convention is expected to take place within the next few weeks.

KING EDWARD.

King Edward met the Kaiser at Wilhelmshoe. There were cordial greetings. Prince von Buelow and Sir Charles Hardinge were present. In the evening the King passed on towards Ischl. Continental opinion generally regards the meeting of the two monarchs as a natural link between the Swinemunde and Ischl visits.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

The plenary committee at the Hague has considered the amendment of the Rule of Land Warfare adopted in 1899. The Japanese amendment was adopted stipulating that prisoners must receive proper pay for work done and defining the duty for the information of the Bureau concerned with prisoners. The Dutch amendment was carried by 23 votes to 2, prohibiting the employment of the inhabitants of occupied territory. The Committee of Examination accepted the Japanese proposal to place in a special category merchantmen obviously designed for conversion into fast cruisers.

AMERICAN NEWS.

San Francisco, August 16.

Owing to hesitation in the payment of twenty-three million dollars by a prominent steel foundry of New York, a serious panic has been felt on the stock exchange. Most of the best known shares went down by six or ten dollars, and there were no enquiries for other shares. There was also a rumour that a leather manufacturing company was about to stop payments, consequently anxiety continues.

According to a steamer which arrived at Seattle from Alaska, Japanese seal poachers are active in the neighbourhood of Pribiloff. They are all armed. The American Government authorities contemplate taking a decisive step on this point.

Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, will arrive here on August 18th. The American Chamber of Commerce will give a dinner party in his honour.

THE HAGUE.

London, August 16.
The Hague Committee by a vote of 13 to 3 have decided that mines laid outside territorial waters must be innocuous within two hours after their abandonment. The minority consisted of Germany, Austria and Russia. Thirteen delegates carried a proposal prohibiting the blockade of commercial ports by means of mines. Germany, Austria, Russia and France opposed.

RUSSO-JAPANESE "ENTENTE."

The St. Petersburg press uniformly welcomes the Japanese agreement as removing all mutual distrust and enabling fruitful co-operation in the Far East.

MOROCCO.

From Tangier it is wired that the religious chiefs are urging a holy war. The Sultan fears he must comply otherwise he will be deposed and assassinated.

KING EDWARD'S TOUR.

King Edward met the Austrian Emperor at Ischl and engaged in a long political conversation. The respective Foreign Office officials discussed Macedonia and demonstrated the unity of views prevailing between Great Britain and Austria.

It is authoritatively stated that the English officials are entirely satisfied as to the results of the Wilhelmshohe meeting and the wish expressed in King Edward's toast that the best and pleasantest relations may prevail between the two countries sums up the aspirations of the meeting.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

London, August 17.
It appears that America also voted in the minority on Thursday in reference to the innocuousness of mines.

Admiral Shimamura made a powerful speech protesting against the proposal to defer action for a long period pending the study of appliances securing innocuousness. He urged the need of immediately ending the intolerable dangers to international shipping as demonstrated by the Russo-Japanese war experiences.

RUSSO-JAPANESE ENTENTE.

The French press welcomes the Russo-Japanese convention and notes that the "yellow peril" has completely vanished and that confidence is replacing distrust.

AMERICAN NEWS.

San Francisco, August 18.
The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, on August 17th, held a dinner party in honour of Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, who recently arrived there. Mr. Strauss, American Secretary of State for Commerce; Mr. Taylor, Mayor of the city; Mr. Develin, City Attorney; seventy other Americans, and some thirty Japanese were present. Mr. Ishii delivered a speech in which he said that the measures adopted with regard to the Japanese residing in the City were not regarded as the feeling entertained by the citizens in general. The address was received with enthusiastic applause. Mr. Strauss also made a speech. He said that he had recently visited Hawaii and found that the Japanese and others on the island were on the most cordial relations and that they were making efforts for the improvement of the various industries. Mr. Taylor and other prominent Americans and Japanese spoke in the same cordial terms.

Mr. Hayes, a member of Congress, has had an interview with Professor Jenks who, under the special instructions of President Roosevelt, has arrived here to investigate the Japanese immigration affair. Mr. Hayes is reported to have said to the professor that the expulsion of the Japanese must be enforced. If the Central Government does not issue a law relating to expulsion he will introduce a proposal at the next session of Congress.

Professor Jenks, and Dr. Wheeler, president of the California University, are drafting a report as the result of their investigations with regard to the Japanese immigrants. The result of their investigations is believed to be favourable towards the Japanese.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, August 18.
Mr. Taft, American Secretary of State for War, will start to-day on his world tour. With regard to the report that Japan intends to purchase the Philippines, he said that America will not sell the islands. The American Government is making efforts to restore order in the islands.

Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, who recently arrived in San Francisco, said that the report regarding war between Japan and America is quite senseless. The Japanese will never try to test the bravery of the Americans or question whether a fleet is to be despatched to the Pacific. He further said that the Japanese could not understand why the Americans ignored the special friendly relations existing between the two countries for so long a time past and why the Americans discriminate Japanese from the Europeans and refuse them admission to America. This statement was published by all the journals of this city and it made a profound impression upon the Americans.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

London, August 20.
At the plenary sitting of the Peace Conference at the Hague, Sir Edward Fry on behalf of Great Britain moved a resolution confirming the resolution adopted in 1899 with regard to the limitation of military expenditure, declaring it to be highly desirable in view of the considerable increase since 1899 that Governments should resume serious study of the question. He pointed out that the expenditure by Europe, America and Japan had increased by sixty-nine million pounds since 1898 and he announced that the British Government was prepared to do the same its programme of new warship construction, together with a statement of probable cost, in order to facilitate the exchange of views with reference to reductions that might be effected by mutual agreement.

After declarations supporting the proposal by America, France, Spain, Argentina and Chile, M. Nelidoff reviewed the various events that have taken place since 1899, showing how the Powers had been compelled to increase instead of limiting their expenditure owing to great wars, including the South African and Far Eastern conflicts. The subject was therefore unripe for discussion in 1907 and was only likely to accentuate disagreement among the Powers by giving rise to irritating debates. It was held that the British proposal reformulating the aspirations of 1899 corresponded best with the present state of the question, and M. Nelidoff therefore invited the delegates to adopt it by acclamation. It was agreed to.

The conference adopted a new article prohibiting the application of compulsion to the people of an occupied territory to make them give information to an enemy, Japan and six other Powers opposing. Despite the opposition of Great Britain and Japan the Conference approved of the provision that anchored mines should not constitute defence of a town.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION INTO CANADA.

London, August 20.
It is telegraphed from Ottawa that protests against the influx of Japanese into British Columbia continue to reach the Government. Legislator Macpherson has telegraphed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier that trouble will arise unless something is done.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce and prominent Japanese have banquetted Mr. Ishii and Mr. Strauss, Secretary for Commerce. The speakers unanimously declared that there was no reason why American and Japanese relations should not remain most cordial. Mr. Ishii said the idea of war on account of sporadic disturbances due to local conditions was unthinkable.

This banquet indicates that the respectable element in San Francisco is beginning to try and end the anti-Japanese campaign.

AMERICAN STOCK EXCHANGES.

New York, August 20.
It is alleged on the American stock markets with reference to the recent serious falls that the panic is principally attributable to the enormous amount of the fine imposed upon the Standard Oil Company and also to the steps taken by President Roosevelt toward the Railway King, Mr. Harriman, and various trusts. The Government denies that the panic originated in the policy of the President. On Aug. 19th, Mr. Taft, Secretary for War, in the course of a speech said that the recent extraordinary falls in the stock markets are generally alleged to have arisen from the strong policy adopted and further to be enforced by the President upon the Standard Oil Company, several railway companies, and various trusts. The allegation is quite groundless. The actual cause is a result of the state of the money market. He added that the President merely carried out a necessary policy with regard to a certain section of millionaires who are always acting unjustly in accordance with their monetary power, and that it is a proper step to be taken by President Roosevelt as the supreme governor of the country.

According to reports up to date, agricultural prospects this year seem to be favourable.

The fall on the stock exchanges appeared a few days ago to have reached its worst. There is no prospect of a rise at present. No bank has closed its doors.

AMERICAN NEWS.

San Francisco, August 20.
The Supreme Court of California has declared that Mr. Taylor is Mayor of San Francisco. Eugene Schmidt, now in jail has acknowledged the judgment. The dispute which arose in connection with the appointment of a new Mayor and Board of Supervisors is thus settled. The new Mayor, Mr. Taylor, intends to appoint a new police superintendent and a committee to discharge police affairs. It is said that as the result of this police reorganization, the question of Japanese employment agencies will be resolved.

Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, has inspected the agricultural developments of this district, after which he said that there have hitherto been misleading notions in the immigration policy of Japan. He was astonished at the considerable development of Japanese enterprises on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Taft, Secretary for War, the presidential candidate of the Republicans in the forthcoming presidential election, has published his political views in an address at Columbus, Ohio. He said that he would pursue in general the policy of President Roosevelt. He added that he will earnestly support the proposed revision of the tariff and will oppose any proposal with regard to railway nationalization.

MOROCCO.

London, August 22.

It is reported from Tangier that Muley Hafid, the Sultan's brother, has been proclaimed Sultan at Marrakesh and has requested the Consuls and other Europeans to leave Fez. The Viziers fear disturbances and do not feel strong enough to guarantee protection.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

The prospects of some form of obligatory arbitration are improved. The British delegates, in response to instructions from London, have announced that they support many of the Portuguese proposals regarding the subjects which the Powers have agreed to submit invariably to arbitration without invoking the reservation clause.

(SPECIAL TO THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

TYPHOON AT KARUIZAWA.

Karuizawa, 10.10 a.m., Aug. 16.

After eighteen hours of heavy rain a typhoon raged here from three to nine p.m. on Thursday. Much damage has been caused to tunnel No. 26 on the Usui Railway. Traffic is suspended until to-morrow. Much small damage has been caused to houses, roads, and trees.

(RECEIVED IN TOKYO.)

RUSSO-JAPANESE AGREEMENT.

It is stated that according to the new Russo-Japanese Treaty of Commerce, Russia will station consuls at Otaru and Tsuruga; while Japan will have consulates at Vladivostok and Nikolaiefsk.

This Treaty and the Fishery Convention ought to reach Tokyo on the 8th instant. They will be made public after the exchange of ratifications.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

THE TELEGRAPH STRIKE.

The strike of telegraph operators which has spread to various places in America has now affected San Francisco. On the 12th instant the men of the Western Union went on strike, and the Postal Union shows signs of following their example.

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Court for adjudicating on the qualifications of the Mayor of San Francisco was opened on the 12th inst.

ADMIRAL IJIN.

The Tsukuba and the Chitose arrived at Lisbon yesterday. On the 17th instant the King of Portugal is to visit the Tsukuba and take lunch on board. The intention is that the squadron will leave for Naples on the 18th.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE "ENTENTE."

The Novoye Vremya says that the fishing industry along the shores of the Maritime Province is a life-and-death question for Japan, and so far as it is not a vital problem for Russia, concessions should be made to Japan. * * * An Entente has now been concluded between the two Empires, and it is to be earnestly hoped that their pacific relations will increase steadily in the future.

The Slav says:—After the war there were conjectures that the military party in Japan harboured a desire to make aggression, against Russia, taking advantage of her weakness, and that an alliance would be formed with China for that purpose. Further, among the military party in Russia there were some who insisted that Japan must be driven from the continent of Asia. But the present Entente disposes finally of such rumour and opinions, and opens a new era for the two countries.

The Bourse Gazette says that there were some questions which the Peace Treaty did not settle between Russia and Japan, but they have been now clearly disposed of. The Entente aims simply at maintaining the status quo. In other words, the Russo-Japanese Entente and an Anglo-Russian Entente would combine to make the situation perfect. This Entente does not merely show the desire of the two countries for concord. It does not indeed go so far as an alliance but it is to be earnestly hoped that sooner or later the two countries will become allies.

The Petersburg Gazette says that the ugly rumours which circulated about the two countries after the War have now been completely dispelled. All dangers have been removed and the High Contracting Parties' love of peace has been demonstrated. The Entente must be regarded as a great diplomatic achievement. It has the advantage, too, of supplementing the Peace Treaty and bringing the two Powers' views into accord. Only an Anglo-Russian Entente is now needed to complete the situation. Then the three great States would unite to organize themselves as allies.

Another Russian paper remarks that if the Entente makes no allusion to the Korean question, it is because Japan's rights in Korea were definitely settled by the Peace Treaty. Korea does not exist any longer as a State: she is nothing more than a Japanese Colony. * * * The Entente prepares the way for an Anglo-Russo-Franco-Japanese alliance.

ADMIRAL IJIN IN PORTUGAL.

On the 16th instant the Portuguese Minister of the Navy, representing his Government, gave a sumptuous banquet to the officers of the Japanese Flying Squadron. On the 17th instant at 3 p.m. the King of Portugal gave audience on his yacht Amelia, to Mr. Inagaki, Vice-Admiral Ijin, 11 officers of the Tsukuba and Chitose, and Mr. Secretary Ichiki. At 5.30 p.m. on the same day his Majesty proceeded to the Tsukuba, and after inspecting the ship, witnessed a performance of fujitsu, wrestling and fencing. At 7.20 dinner was served. Admiral Ijin proposed the toast of the King, and his Majesty replying in the name of the Portuguese nation, drank to the health of the Mikado and to the renown and prosperity of the Japanese Navy. Afterwards in another room the King conferred high orders on Admiral Ijin and Mr. Inagaki, and orders of lesser grades on the other officers. At 9.30 p.m. his Majesty left the ship. On the 18th the King and Queen gave a luncheon in honour of Mr. and Mrs. Inagaki, Admiral Ijin and 5 officers of the Squadron. He presented his photograph to Mr. Inagaki and Admiral Ijin. The Squadron left for Naples at 7 p.m.

GENERAL NEWS.

On the 19th instant the California State Court gave judgment in the sense that his salary must be paid to the Secretary appointed by the new Mayor of San Francisco. (This judgment means that the former Mayor—now in prison—has lost his legal qualification to hold office.—Ed. J.M.)

A Japanese druggist, by name Hoshino Sobei, was murdered in Harbin by some person or persons on the night of the 8th inst. The assassin has not yet been apprehended. The Japanese Authorities have made to the Russian Authorities a request that rigorous search should be carried out.

GENERAL NEWS.

The steamer Canton, which belongs to the Far Eastern S.S. Company of Sweden, had a great send off on the 20th instant when she started for Japan, her first voyage.

The Governor of Hawaii has resigned and has been succeeded by Mr. Freyer (?). The ex-Governor has addressed to the United States Government a representation urging that Hawaii should be excepted from the cabotage regulations of the United States coast, and that ships calling there should be allowed to carry passengers of any non-American nationality.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

JAPANESE IMMIGRANTS.

London, August 20.

It is reported by telegram from Ottawa that many Japanese are entering British Columbia. During July, Japanese who arrived there numbered 158. Those who arrived since January totalled over four thousand. Anxiety is being entertained lest some trouble arise between the Japanese and the white population.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 31ST, 1907.

DEATHS.

At Karuzawa, Japan, on August 26th, 1907, from heart complaint, FREDERICK WILLIAM HAMMOND, (late R.N.) for many years in the employ of the Imperial Japanese Government, in his 66th year.

At 4.10 p.m. on August 28, CARL FLAIG, General Manager of the Imperial Hotels, Ltd.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

EAST CENTRAL Japan has been devastated by floods unprecedented for ninety years.

At 8.55 a.m. on August 26th a slight earthquake shock was felt at Hiroshima.

It is reported by telegram that the British squadron left Vladivostok on Aug. 24th for Nagasaki.

YOKOHAMA is suffering from a water famine owing to enormous floods having injured the main delivery pipes.

MAJOR HARA died in Berlin on Aug. 16th. He had been suffering from lung disease for some weeks past.

THE Tsukuba and Chitose, which arrived at Naples on Aug. 24th, will leave there on the 31st of the same month for Trieste.

SEVEN-TENTHS of Hakodate have been destroyed by fire. Three hundred lives were lost and the damage exceeds four million yen.

MR. S. KATAYAMA and about two hundred other Japanese socialists on the afternoon of Aug. 22nd welcomed Mr. K. Hardie, M.P., the representative of the British labourers, at the Kinki-kwan, in Tokyo. Mr. Hardie spoke on the present condition of socialism in Great Britain.

THE steamer Koun Maru, on Aug. 24 collided with a lighter in Moji Strait. The latter was sunk and a woman was drowned.

MR. C. KIKUCHI, a member of the Upper House representing Tokyo, has resigned. Mr. K. Hamaguchi is nominated as his successor.

COUNT GIOVANNI GALLINA has been appointed Italian Consul-General in Tokyo. On Aug. 12th, the Foreign Office issued his exequatur.

A FREIGHT train on Aug. 2nd, was derailed at Gotemba station causing severe damage to the road bed. Traffic was stopped for several hours.

FIRE broke out on Aug. 26th in the compound of the Tokyo Gas works. Three buildings were destroyed. Kerosene oil is reported to have been the cause.

VERY large hail stones were experienced in the district of Sannohe, Aomori prefecture, on Aug. 21st for about fifteen minutes. Severe damage was caused to crops.

GENERAL BARON NISHI arrived in Berlin on Aug. 26th. He will inspect the training and organization of the German army. He will leave at the end of September for home.

It is reported by Japanese contemporaries that Mr. Thomas O'Brien, new American Ambassador to the Imperial Japanese Court, will leave his home on October 15th for Tokyo.

At 11.49 a.m. on August 24th, a slight shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama, the duration being one minute and forty-two seconds. The direction was from north to south.

THE construction of the railway between Ochiai and Obiliro has been completed. Traffic will be opened in Sept. 8th. Thus through traffic between Asahigawa and Koshiro is now completed.

A LARGE number of Russian and Chinese workmen are employed on the construction of the Amur Railway. The parties are discordant. The Russian police are taking precautions with regard to them.

A RUSSIAN gun-boat which was recently floated at Port Arthur was brought to Nagasaki on Aug. 26th, being towed there by the Yoritomo Maru. The ship has been purchased by a Japanese merchant of Nagasaki.

ACCORDING to an official telegram, Mr. Taft, American Secretary of State for the Army, will arrive in Japan at the end of September on his way to the Philippines. Mr. Taft will spend about four days in Japan.

THE Asahi says that Mr. Danthiel, Russian official of Vladivostok, who had stolen yen 1,700 belonging to his office and absconded and who recently arrived at Nagasaki is reported to have proceeded to Arima via Kobe.

MR. SOYEDA, President of the Industrial Bank, who recently left London, is now on his way home by the Siberian Railway. He will arrive at Changchung on Sept. 2nd, and will meet Baron Goto, President of the South Manchurian Railway, at Port Arthur.

THE Russian newspaper Retch was confiscated on July 18th for publishing an article by M. Klinkoff, the well-known war correspondent. M. Klinkoff says that China is awakening, and by organising her army and fleet is preparing for war; she is, too, improving her ways and communications, and Japanese officers are swarming throughout Manchuria. The article further says that the relations between the Russians and Chinese are extremely hostile.

LI YUEN (36), a Chinese merchant residing at No. 136, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, who was charged with having smoked opium, was sentenced in the District Court on Aug. 23rd to two years' imprisonment with hard labour in accordance with Art. 241 of the Criminal Code.

It is announced from the Chancery of the Royal Victorian Order that His Majesty King Edward has made the following amongst other appointments:—To be Honorary Knight Grand Cross—Michinori Seigo Nagasaki, Councillor of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

AN Advertiser special telegram from New York says that the Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary of State, is suffering from a nervous breakdown and has been sent to a sanitarium for treatment for a period of three weeks. The location of the sanitarium has been kept from the knowledge of the public.

T. KAITO, Director of the Yamanokuchi, Kago-shima, was arrested on Aug. 22nd on a charge of fraud. It is alleged by Japanese papers that he forged 130 money orders, the amount of which is put at four thousand yen in all, and attempted to draw the sums at various post offices in Nara prefecture.

TELEGRAMS from Vladivostok say that the welcome of the British squadron by the Russians at Vladivostok was specially enthusiastic. The entertainment by the commander-in-chief of the naval station was on a brilliant scale. No special feeling is being entertained as to the Russo-Japanese entente.

ON the morning of Aug. 24th, an explosion occurred in the shop of a drug and photographic apparatus merchant named C. Uyeda, Ando-cho, Osaka. Two young employees were severely injured. It is said that the youths were mixing magnesium and hydrochloride potassium for photographic use.

AT Kingston, England, on 18th July Mr. Kishichiro Okura, a Japanese gentleman, who was second in the First Montague Cup race at the opening meeting of the Brooklands Motor Track on July 6, was summoned for exceeding the 20-mile limit as he was returning from the races in the evening. Fined £5, and 8s. 6d. costs.

A KYOTO telegram to Tokyo papers says that Paymaster S. Sakamoto of the Army, in reserve, was arrested on Aug. 23rd by the Fushimi Gendarmes. The charge is reported to be in connexion with the case of Lieutenant T. Urakami who is undergoing trial at the office of the Gendarmes, on a certain disgraceful charge.

DECORATIONS have been granted to the following officials of Kanagawa Prefectural Office for services during the war; Messrs. T. Taniguchi, E. Tsukamoto, H. Horinchi, and K. Sakata, all of the Kencho; Messrs. K. Inouye, M. Mune, S. Ikariyama, H. Yuasa, T. Takahashi and K. Kato, police inspectors; Messrs. A. Yato and N. Yokoyama, of the Harbour Office; and Messrs. Ishikawa, Matsuo, Shirane, Araki, Harada, Higuchi, Kunimatsu, Yoshida, Kitamura and Niiyama, the headmen of the rural divisional offices. The Orders range between the fourth and the sixth classes of the Rising Sun or Sacred Treasure. Presents of money were also given them varying from a thousand yen to three hundred yen.

KOREA.

Friday, August 23.

There is not much important news from Korea this morning. The telegrams speak of the blowing up of powder magazines at Kwangju (?) in accordance with the Japanese programme, and of a mob of a thousand insurgents who are said to be threatening Ansong. A rather serious affair occurred on the 21st inst. between Yangchi and Suwon. Eleven Japanese, who were escaping from the former place to the latter, fell in with a body of armed insurgents. Two of the fugitives were shot, three are missing and the remainder effected their escape.

The Japanese Commander-in-Chief in Korea has issued instructions for dealing with mutinous soldiers and insurgent civilians. The processes provided by Korean law are to be followed; that is to say, the followers will be bamboozled and released, and the leaders will be bamboozled and held for further instructions.

The Court of Justice which has been for some time engaged trying the case of Pak Yongho, Yi Dochai and Kang Chongchol, has found that there is not sufficient evidence to convict the prisoners of treason, but that they have been guilty of a breach of law. The sentence passed is 80 strokes of the bamboo each, but it is thought probable that a fine will be substituted.

A plot has been discovered having its centre at Songju, a place 17 or 18 miles west of Taiku, which is a station on the Seoul-Fusan Railway. The object of the plot was to bring about a general rising of the anti-Japanese sections throughout the country in the middle of September. It is said that the ex-Emperor had given his support to the scheme and that some foreigner on the staff of the Dai han Mai-il Shinpo assisted in the despatch of circulars so that they reached the hands of many of the elder statesmen. One of these documents came into Japanese possession, and thus the whole plot will doubtless prove abortive.

Two Korean officers who, having left Wonju, which is now the headquarters of the Kwangwondo insurgents, reached Seoul on the 18th inst., are reported as saying that the mutinous troops have been greatly perturbed by news of the Japanese encircling movement. Nearly all the officers and non-commissioned officers have absconded and the men are now practically leaderless.

Saturday, August 24.

A number of the soldiers under Colonel Adachi on the night of Aug. 22nd left Chhungju for Chonhwan and Chingchong.

A society which has been organized by Korea re-actionaries in the district of Pyongyang has been ordered by the Home Office to disband.

Traffic on the railway between Pyongyang and Wiju was opened on Aug. 23rd.

Japanese soldiers in North Korea number 3,500. The Japanese military authorities intend to build barracks at Lanang and Hoinin in Hamgyong at a cost of seven million and three million yen respectively. The materials are being sent to those places and the construction is being pressed forward.

Recently an interesting telegram was received in Tokyo to the effect that a number of Koreans in California have organized a union under the appellation of the Korea Protection Society and have held a meeting with a view to opposing the Japanese and to instigating anti-Japanese feeling in Korea. They decided to oppose the Korean Cabinet under Mr. Yi Hwan-yong, as a first step, and subsequently to drive out the whole of the Japanese from the Peninsular Empire. To enforce the decision, the president of the union will shortly leave San Francisco for his own country. The Jiji says that the union was organized by political refugees and other Koreans who are opposing the Japanese, of which society On-Hanchong is president. They are struggling to achieve their purpose through the assistance of Americans and also by joining the Christianized Koreans at home. The Jiji adds that there will be no Americans who will soberly support the movements of such Koreans.

As the seven leaders of the Kanghwa Insurrection were being escorted by the police to embark for the mainland, they made a desperate attempt to escape, and had resort to such violence that the police were ultimately obliged to shoot them.

From here and there in southern Korea accounts come of collisions between Japanese troops and Korean insurgents, but the gist of the matter is that the process of restoring order is going on steadily. The province of Chungchong-do appears to be the principal stronghold of the insurgents. It is believed that some 12,000 fugitive soldiers with officers and non-commissioned officers are collected there, and that they have been joined by a considerable number of the people. The trouble is that being kept well informed of all the Japanese movements, these insurgents can take advantage of every opportunity to commit depredations, and can fly to the mountains at the approach of the Japanese. Some time may therefore be needed to fully restore order.

Four Korean literati have addressed the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce in Seoul saying that neither in ancient or modern history can they find another person so peculiar as he is.

Tokyo newspapers report that during the banquet given by the House of Representatives to Marquis Ito on the 23rd inst., his Excellency in the course of conversation, made some interesting statements. He said that according to the press the Residency General was inundated with applications for official appointments in Korea under the terms of the new Convention, but in point of fact the opposite was the truth. Surprisingly few people had applied. About 500 in all will be wanted. These of course could easily be taken from the present ranks of officialdom in Japan but that would hamper the working of the executive machine. The Marquis proposed to choose men from three classes; first, from graduates of the Imperial University; secondly, from persons who have passed the examinations for high-class and medium-class officials; and thirdly, from men who have had some experience of administration. As for the enactment of laws Korean manners and customs must be carefully kept in sight, but so far as the legislative spirit was concerned, Japanese laws would be taken for models. The organization of the judiciary, having some connection with consular courts, demanded very careful manipulation, and Professor Ume, of the Imperial University, was now engaged at the work. The new civil code would be largely on the lines of the Japanese Code but would be made as short and simple as possible. If the salaries and retiring allowances of the Japanese officials who would be appointed to posts in Korea, were added up, a considerable total would be reached. To expect the Japanese Treasury to disburse this money was an untenable idea. The Korean revenue must be expanded as far as possible for the purpose, but if even then a deficit remained, recourse would have to be had to the Treasury in Tokyo. As for industrial and commercial undertakings of a nature calculated to enrich the country, the method of loans would be resorted to. The Marquis concluded by emphatically denying the reports that he was in any degree proud of his work in Korea. On the contrary he said that it was a source of the deepest solicitude to him, but he took the occasion to remind his hearers that this Korean problem was in no sense a party question and that to drag it into the arena of petty party politics would be a national calamity.

Sunday, August 25th.

The insurgents seem to have behaved with considerable resolution on the 23rd inst. at Chunju and Chongphung. At the former place there was a fight of two hours before the rioters were finally broken and dispersed. Rumour alleges that 800 men divided into four parties are about to make an essay against Seoul itself. These Korean rioters seem to be behaving with the utmost brutality. Japanese fugitives, men and women, even though they be carrying children, are deemed fair marks for the rifles of these savages. A small party of men and women attempting to escape from Yaguchi to Suwon, were fired on repeatedly and one of the men was killed while one of the women barely escaped with her life. It is evident that some time must elapse before order is completely restored in Korea, and it is also evident that any of these insurgents taken with arms in their hands deserve the most drastic treatment.

It is alleged that a Council of State will be held on the 25th inst. for the purpose of discussing the method of financing the various enterprises which will be undertaken under the new regimen in Korea. There is of course no truth in the recently circulated rumour that the Japanese Treasury would be asked to disburse a sum of 100 million yen in a period of five years, but that there will be some call on the Treasury seems inevitable. The Hochi Shinbun confidently affirms that Marquis Ito contemplates a foreign loan of 120 million yen for railway building and other works of development. It is said that this money will be sought through the Franco-Belgian Syndicate represented by Mr. Loonen.

Monday, August 26.

Mr. Pak Yongho, as we anticipated, has commuted his sentence of bamboozing by paying a fine of yen 350 for each stroke. This having been accomplished, he emerged from prison, and was foolish enough to place himself immediately in communication with the Chakang-hoi and the Doyu-kai. He was therefore again apprehended and is now undergoing temporary detention. It is expected that he will be ultimately banished.

There are no conclusive reports from the disturbed districts with one exception, namely Chunju, where the Korean troops seem to have fought with considerable desperation. They twice endeavoured to make head against the Japanese and on each occasion were dispersed, their total casualties being estimated at 200.

Tuesday, August 27.

The principal body of Japanese troops operating against the insurgents in Korea is under the command of Lieut.-Col. Adachi. Its chief objective point was Chechong, where the insurgents were said to have massed a force of 600 men, regularly organized and under the command of officers. Another but much smaller corps, not exceeding a company in strength, was moving against the same place from a different direction under the command of Capt. Nishimura. The latter force, probably because it was the smaller, seems to have encountered considerable but ineffective resistance at various points. The two forces joined hands at Chechong on the 23rd inst., having driven out the insurgents without much difficulty. The Koreans in retreating left 30 dead and a number of wounded, whereas the total casualties on the Japanese side were one wounded. The village of Chechong, having been found to have consisted entirely of an insurgents stronghold was burned to the ground.

Marquis Ito, speaking at the meeting of the Toyo Kyokai, given in his honour on the 26th inst., under the presidency of Count Katsura, said that for the past thirty years the relations between Japan and Korea had not been at all of a cordial character. Quite recently they had improved, but the improvement was not due to any earnest wish on the part of the Koreans themselves: it was rather the result of the demonstration of Japanese strength that resulted from a war with Russia. Since then Japan had occupied the position of Korea's protector, but it must be confessed that those charged with the duties of the protectorate had constantly experienced the feelings of a man who tries to scratch his foot with his boot on. Giving advice when the taking or leaving of it is at the option of its recipient can not possibly be a very successful enterprise in a country like Korea, where the nation is practically divided into two sections, one consisting of bigotted and desperate conservatives, the other of men with little or any knowledge. The situation had been greatly cleared up by the abdication of the Emperor, though the Residency-General had neither hand, act nor part in that incident. One result, however, had been the Convention which greatly ameliorated the situation from the Japanese point of view. It would henceforth be possible to insure the practical observance of advice, and not merely its academical discussion. The problem now to be solved in order to give real effect to the new Convention was one of men and money, and it was with a view to its solution that the Marquis had now returned to Japan. In connection with this question of men there was one disquieting feature, namely, that a large part of the educated class in Korea regarded official appointments as the only gentlemanlike means of earning a livelihood. These men would be deprived of their object in life and indeed even of the means of sustaining life if many of the executive posts were filled with Japanese. There were many other obstacles in the path but so far as his poor abilities went he promised that no effort should be spared to achieve success.

Wednesday, August 28.

The coronation of the Emperor of Korea took place on the 27th inst. and is described as having been an exceptionally impressive ceremony—exceptional from a Korean point of view. The signal incident of the affair was the cutting off of their top-knots by the Emperor, the ex-Emperor and the Crown Prince. It is stated that some of the eunuchs weepingly entreated the Sovereign to abstain from this step but their remonstrances were futile. Of course the Japanese are credited with having inspired this change of coiffure and they are correspondingly criticised. The fact is interesting as showing that whatever happens in Korea will henceforth be laid at Japan's door. We do not believe for an instant that Marquis Ito suggested the expediency of anything like a sumptuary law dealing peremptorily with men's manner of dressing their hair or with the garments they wear, but he may very well have approved of the Palace setting the example in such matters. It was through the Palace in Japan that the Marquis sought to popularize western habiliments for women, but no attempt was ever made to interfere with the liberty of the subject in this question, and we undertake to affirm that the part acted by the Residency-General in Korea has been similarly free from any arbitrary feature. Reverting to the coronation ceremony, we read that the Emperor made his appearance in the first place in Korean costume, which he changed for the uniform of a foreign field-marshal after the actual ceremony of enthronement had been accomplished. General Hasegawa had been appointed special envoy for the occasion and in that capacity he presented a letter of congratulation from the Emperor of Japan and also read a similar document from the Residency-General. The latter document has been transmitted to Tokyo in full by telegraph. Apart from the phraseology usual on such occasions it made notable allusion to the fact that although the realm over which the new Emperor is called to preside has existed for centuries and although his Majesty's dynasty is very old, the era inaugurated by his accession to the Throne is new, being an era of sweeping reforms and signal progress. The document goes on to express a fervent hope that the Sovereign will wisely direct this new order of things into paths conducing to the welfare of his people and to the prosperity of his Empire. The Belgian Consul, as doyen of the Consular corps, read an address of congratulation, and the ceremony concluded with three cheers for the Sovereign proposed by the Foreign Minister. We do not know whether this idea of cheering has been a custom in Korea but we may mention here that Chinese history shows it to have been practised in the Middle Kingdom at least as far back as the Sung dynasty. Probably it dates from a much earlier period, but even allowing it no greater antiquity than the Sung Era, we arrive at the result that long before the Saracens and the Crusaders had evolved their cry of "Hip, Hip, Hurray," the solemn and ceremonious Chinese had learned to shout "Wansui" (Banzai). Seoul was beflagged for the occasion, the Il Chinghoi, whose star is certainly now in the ascendant in spite of the abuse constantly levelled at them, gave a congratulatory entertainment, and everything passed off quietly, though whether this feature of the affair was due to police precautions or to the goodwill of the people themselves we can not undertake to say. Apropos of police precautions, it may be mentioned that throughout all the trouble in Seoul connected with the abdication of the former Sovereign, the number of constables at the disposal of Mr. Maruyama for the purpose of preserving peace and good order was only 450. It is a memorable feat that he made such success with such scanty means.

The composition of the army that is to remain to Korea has been fixed by Imperial decree. The figures are, one battalion of 4 companies, its personnel being sixteen commissioned officers from the Colonel downwards and 628 rank and file.

Mr. Pak Yongho has finally been sentenced to one year's banishment. He is required to take up his residence in the island of Quelpart and not to leave its limits on any pretext.

The three principal smokeless-coal mines are to be worked under official auspices, and a Japanese engineer, Mr. Kochibei, has been employed by the Korean Government for the purpose.

It has been decided at the instance of the Prime Minister to send special delegates to each of the provinces in Korea for the purpose of explaining to the people the Government's new policy of reform. The ultimate object of this step is to assist the peaceful and law abiding section of the population from being misled by the misrepresentations of seditious folks.

Thursday, August 29.

The Jiji Shimpō's Seoul correspondent remarks on the almost total absence of any kind of popular demonstration in connection with the coronation of the Emperor of Korea. An entertainment given by the Il Chinghoi and the beflagging of a few houses was the sum of the citizens' participation. Of course the plain inference is that the people are still perplexed. They are still asking themselves "under which king, Bezonian?", the ex-Emperor bulking in their mental vista almost as largely as the new Sovereign.

Mr. Pak Yongho was to leave Chumulpo for his place of exile on the 29th inst.

From the 24th to the 26th instant the Korean insurgents in the Yangkeun district of Kyongkwido, which is in the vicinity of Seoul, were subjected to several attacks by the Japanese troops under the command of Captain Akashi, and were routed so completely as to be almost exterminated. About fifty of their number were killed or wounded. These insurgents are said to have consisted mainly of farmers with a sprinkling of soldiers. Their weapons were limited for the most part to old fashioned fusils. It is very pitiable that armed and disciplined troops should have to be employed against such a rabble, and that men ordinarily law-abiding and industrious should have to be subjected to such measures of repression. From all other quarters, with one or two exceptions, comes news that the process of disbandment and confiscation of arms has been quietly accomplished.

The Mainichi Dempo's Seoul correspondent wires that although the upper-class missionaries in Korea appreciate Japan's intentions and are even in avowed sympathy with them, some of the lower-class members of the church militant,—especially the Roman Catholics who in this respect seem to be following the example set by some of their confreres in China—are abusing their privileges by employing politics in the cause of propagandism. These missionaries win converts by promising protection against Japanese interference, a promise which of course has the effect of suggesting foreign sympathy with the anti-Japanese cause. It may be argued that the best way to deal with such an abuse is to leave it severely alone, since the powerlessness of these missionaries to fulfil their promises must be exposed sooner or later. But how much sooner or how much later? That is the problem. Pending the full dawn of this improved intelligence among the Koreans, many catastrophes may occur, and the Resident-General may well feel constrained to adopt some preventive measure. Two courses are said to be under consideration by him. One is to organise some system of stricter surveillance over the native converts so that they shall be beyond the reach of political interference by the missionaries; the other is to open some friendly pour parlers with foreign governments for the purpose of controlling the missionaries.

themselves. It is at once interesting and regrettable that this question should have been extended from China to Korea. Japan herself furnishes a striking illustration of religious propagandism carried on in such a manner as to be almost completely beyond the reach of reproof, but other Far Eastern countries have not been equally fortunate.

AMERICA AND CHINA.

Recently, when it was announced that the United States Government had resolved to return to China 13 million dollars (gold) out of the 25 millions which had been originally demanded as the sum due on account of expenses incurred by the former Power in connexion with the Boxer campaign, we ventured to suggest that if the United States' estimate of its outlays on that occasion was really more than the double of what had really been spent, either an enormous margin must have been left for contingencies or the accountants who drew up the statement of expenditure must have been singularly inaccurate. That feature of the affair is now explained by The Tribune which writes thus:—

"We have said that the United States, for diplomatic reasons, at first accepted more than twice as much as it was entitled to or meant to take. That was in order to save that sum for China. For had this country at the outset refused to accept more than $11,000,000, the other $13,000,000 would probably have been divided among the other Powers, and China would have been mulcted in the same lump sum originally proposed. It was only by accepting the full share until all other Powers had finally settled the amounts they were to receive, and then reducing it, that this country was able to effect the benevolent and which Secretary Hay had from the first in view. It may be too much to expect that other Powers will follow this American example, though it would be creditable to them to do so, but in any case the example is good enough to stand alone without the support of imitation."

That it at least ingenious, but what shall we say of the light in which it depicts the conduct of the other Powers, and what of the good faith of the American Government itself? We must assume that the editor of The Tribune is remarkably deficient in historical knowledge. Evidently he does not know that when the Powers concerned in the Boxer campaign were about to sit down and write their bills, they agreed to proceed upon the principle that each should charge as nearly as possible only the amount actually out of pocket. That being the compact, had the United States Government any right to do as The Tribune exultingly claims that it did, namely, to disregard the agreement in toto, and set down an exorbitant sum in order to serve a diplomatic purpose? On the other hand, The Tribune does not merely exhibit the United States Government under a very double-faced aspect, but further it represents that Government as entertaining a curiously low opinion of the morality of the partners and allies in the Boxer business. So slender was Washington's confidence in the integrity of all the other Powers that it saw no hope of circumventing their rapacity except by itself 'fobbing a large sum under false pretences. We are bound to say that whatever part diplomacy may have had in all these doings, the diplomacy of The Tribune's revelations belongs to a special branch of that art. As admirers of America's methods, however, and as firm believers in her international morality, we decline altogether to accept The Tribune's version. What happened, we are persuaded, was simply that the American accountants estimated their country's outlays on an exceedingly liberal scale, and subsequently when it came to making the actual payments, a large surplus was found. Then Washington, recalling the original basis of calculation, namely, money out of pocket and nothing more or less, rightly concluded that the surplus did not belong to the United States and must go back to China. That is the explanation which lies on the surface and it will be accepted by those who know America too well to discredit her with trickiness such as The Tribune attributes to her.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

The Prime Minister, Marquis Saionji, has thought it expedient to issue to the various Ministers of State an instruction which is evidently prompted by the recent commotion about Russian spies. His Excellency speaks of the neighbourly friendship which has existed between Russia and Japan during the past fifty years. Unfortunately this friendship suffered brief interruption in recent times, but it has now been re cemented on a firmer foundation than ever. The Governments of the two Powers have agreed to join hands in frank amity for the preservation of the peace of the East and differences have been disposed of. It is impossible to guard against individual misapprehensions, but if these are suffered to grow they may not be confined to personal relations but may even mar the international Entente and may thus defeat the prime object of the agreement now concluded between the two Empires.

The above document is very carefully worded, but no one reading between the lines can fail to recognise that it is intended as an admonition to the foolish people who have allowed themselves to become hysterical over the question of Russian spies.

It is a great pity that some regulation can not be enforced for checking the circulation of newspaper rumours about spies. Owing to the recent assassination of Mayeda, who was suspected of being a Russian spy, and owing to the sensational talk inspired by the event, something like a mania about spies seems to have invaded a section of the minds of the Japanese, so that several perfectly innocent Russian residents found themselves the objects of most irksome scrutiny. It is alleged that a number of them are compelled for this reason to leave Japan since further residence in this country would be intolerable, but very likely this rumour is a worthy sequel to the exaggerations that have marked the whole affair. Japan has no monopoly of the excitement about spies. Certain Western nations have shown that they can be equally perturbed about the pettiest events of this nature. None the less it is extremely regretful that just as Japan and Russia had joined hands, this shock should be given to their friendship.

THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA.

This big steamship company is evidently regarded by the Japanese public as a kind of ever-present help in time of need. The fact was well illustrated in connexion with the recent rains and floods. People appeared to think that the Nippon Yusen Kaisha had a considerable fleet of spare steamers ready to be put on any line in the event of necessity, and that since what was ordinarily dry land had been in many cases replaced by water so that a sudden need had been created for aquatic transport, the Yusen Kaisha would be found duly equipped against such an emergency. The first to give practical effect to this idea was a group of some twenty Tokyo journals which, being cut off from their usual source of paper-supply, and having only enough paper in stock to carry them to the end of the month, hastened hat in hand to the S.S. Company, and declared that unless the aid of a steamer could be immediately made available, disaster stared them in the face. Their application was complied with, and the threatened calamity was averted. Then came the Communications Department with a request that the Yusen Kaisha would organize a daily service of steamers between Kobe and Yokohama, a feat which would have required the immediate provision of a fleet of 14 or 15 vessels. The Yusen Kaisha not being so very uneconomical as to keep 14 or 15 steamers lying idle by way of provision against a contingency which does not occur once in a cycle, and having already a daily service between the two places named—when the vessels on all their lines calling there are reckoned—had to declare itself unable to satisfy this request. It was possible, however, to divert two vessels—the Eijo Maru and the Hyogo Maru—from other services, and with them to open a daily line between Yokohama and Ejiri, so as to bridge the Gulf created by the flood on the Yamakita-Oyama section of the Tokaido Railway. We may mention in this context that the recent fire at Hakodate destroyed all the lighters, and consequently cargo traffic with that place is suspended.

FATHER BROU ON THE FAILURE OF CATHOLIC MISSIONS.

Father Alexandre Brou deplores the lack of success of Catholic missionary efforts in the current issue of the Etudes, the official organ of the Society of Jesus. He points out that India, with a population of 300 millions, counts only a million and a half Catholics; China, with 330 millions, has barely a million Catholics; and Japan, with 48 millions, has but 60,000 Catholics. There has been no essential difference, says Father Brou, in the conditions of the apostolate since the institution of Christianity. According to this authority, the failure of the Roman Catholic missionaries abroad is due to the fact that they forget to place their sacred calling before all and any other consideration. "For the past three centuries," says Father Brou, "notwithstanding an undeniable personal heroism in their work, the missionaries have been heaping up faults. They have secularised the apostolate. They have shown too much confidence in human methods and too little intrinsic power of the Gospel. Even to-day they are too prone to forget their calling in order to become teachers of French, to undertake antiquarian researches, and to win literary distinction. They mark themselves agents of European conquest, and this fault goes back almost to the outset of the apostolate. And when there are massacres the missionaries obtain indemnities through diplomatic channels, thus degrading martyrdom by setting a price on it." Father Brou rather understates the figures of Japanese converts we imagine, neither is he quite fair in his comments on the motives which actuate the lives of the scholarly members of the Catholic Church who are devoting themselves so wholeheartedly to the work to which they have set their hands.

MANCHURIA.

It is alleged that the veto on grain traffic into and out of the leased territory of Kwantung was issued by the head of the customs in Peking without reference to any of his colleagues. Sir Robert Hart received the order and merely transmitted it. On the other hand it appears that the Chinese authorities had made all arrangements to give effect to this edict before it was actually published, for the large fleet of junks which had been previously in the habit of plying between Chefoo and Tairen, suddenly abandoned that route and transferred themselves to the Yingkow line. Of course it has not been possible to enforce the veto with equal strictness on the land side, but even then the situation is intolerable and a very strong protest is said to have been made by the Japanese Government to Peking.

There are conflicting accounts about the negotiations in Mukden. One story has it that Viceroy Hsu's hands are so tied by the complaints of Censors in Peking that he has been obliged to adopt an unyielding attitude towards Japan and, in consequence no progress whatever has been made with the negotiations. A wholly different account comes, however, from the Fiji Shimpō's correspondent. This authority alleges that with the exception of the salt problem all outstanding questions have been virtually settled, though the necessary documents have not yet actually been signed, sealed, or delivered. With regard to the terms of settlement, it is alleged that all mines, alike those already opened and those that may be hereafter opened, along the line of the Mukden Antung Railway are to be jointly worked by a combined company of Japanese and Chinese, each side putting up an equal amount of capital and enjoying equal rights. This of course assumes that both parties are willing to join in the work, but it is provided that, if either side be unwilling, the other may undertake the work alone. Nothing is said by this correspondent as to the other mines in Manchuria, the principal of which are the Fushun and the Yentai. But it may be mentioned here that the Asahi Shimbun has sought and obtained an official statement in reply to the charge of injustice preferred by a foreign resident of Tientsin against the Japanese Government's method of treating these mines. This official statement affirms that great misconceptions exist with regard to the mines. The Fushun mine was originally granted explicitly by China to Russia for the purpose of supplying coal to the East Chinese Railway, and was formally transferred to Japan by Russia through the Portsmouth Treaty, which transfer subsequently received the conventional assent of China by the Peking Treaty of 1905. It is quite true, however, that a Chinese subject named Wang had commenced to work a certain remote portion of the mine in conjunction with a Russian subject, the Chinaman putting up a capital of 70,000 yen and the Russian 30,000. But that circumstance cannot possibly be construed as conflicting with Japan's treaty rights. The limit of its significance is that the Chinaman is entitled to some compensation on account of the capital invested by him, and such compensation the South Manchuria Railway Company is prepared to grant whenever the man advances his claim in a formal manner. Mr. Wang acquired from Russia any title that he possessed, and Russia having surrendered all right to grant titles, Wang's position is not tenable.

The Peking Government estimates the expenditure on the construction of the proposed railway to the north of the Liao on the Hsinmingtung Mukden road, to be eight hundred thousand yen. The Chinese Government intends to complete the work by raising a loan of four hundred thousand yen from the South Manchuria Railway Company. It is said that the president of the Mukden Railway Office will shortly leave Peking for Port Arthur where he intends to conduct negotiations with the Japanese railway authorities as to the proposed loan.

Renewed accounts come from Kwanchentsz of riotous conduct on the part of Chinese troops stationed there. On the 23rd inst. 50 of them broke into a Japanese restaurant and wrought much damage.

In connection with the often reported project of building a main line between Mukden and Antung not along the present route of the military railway but through the more northerly districts which were traversed by General Kawamura's army before the battle of Mukden, it is alleged that the military railway will not be removed, but will be kept as it is with a view to future agricultural development.

It is upon the South Manchuria Railway that the main injury will be inflicted unless the Japanese Government can procure the abolition of the veto upon the export of grain through the leased territory of Kwantung. The veto does not touch the principal articles of export to Japan, namely, beans and bean cake, which are largely used as manure in this country, so that any stoppage of the supply would be a serious matter, but it does affect millet and similar cereals, large quantities of which are now carried by the railway for shipment at Tai an. During the month of April last the gross earnings of the Railway were 881,722 yen, to which the Mukden-Antung line contributed only some 20,000 yen. In fact this latter road involves at present a considerable loss. The above figures, if worked out by mileage, signify 51½ yen per mile daily on the principal line, but only 4¾ yen on the Mukden-Antung branch. It has always been understood that if the gross earnings of the line reached the neighbourhood of 80 yen per mile daily, expenses would be covered, and therefore the returns for April must be considered very satisfactory. But if this grain veto be persisted in, the line will suffer a heavy setback. The Fiji Shimpō, from which we take these details, notes that in 1902, when a similar veto was applied throughout the Three Eastern Provinces, the export of wheat from Newchwang fell to 3,500 yen, and when the veto was removed they rose immediately to about 1¼ millions.

News has been received that the authorities of the South Manchuria Railway have just reduced the staff of the line by 230 men and that another reduction of some 350 is contemplated. This Company, when it received the line from the hands of the military, took over a total staff of 9000, who were all under agreement for one year, so that to dismiss any of these now means that seven months' salary must be paid up. It is said that the sum disbursed by the Company monthly on account of wages is 360,000 yen and that there will be a saving of 25,000 owing to the changes now contemplated.

It is stated by telegrams received in Tokyo that the Russian Government has paid over from the Russo-Chinese Bank to the Specie Bank the sum of over 560,000 roubles, due on account of the Kwanchentsz station.

A silly censor has memorialized the Throne, and his memorial is said to have obtained the approval of the Minister of War, in the sense that if men-of-war are ordered in Japan, she will pass off some of the old vessels captured from Russia after refurbishing and refitting them. It is said that this memorial has led to the issue of instructions enjoining caution on the part of viceroys and governors. We did not imagine that even among the 56 censors anyone could have been found so credulous and ill-informed as to pen such a memorial. One would suppose that when a country orders a warship abroad, the dimensions and details are left to the discretion of the recipient of the order.

"THE INDEPENDENT."

The Independent is always painstaking and generally well informed even when it makes excursions into the realm of Far-Eastern affairs. We beg, therefore, to call the editor's attention to certain statements which appear in his recent epitome of the latest phase of the Korean problem. One of the statements is this:

When the Resident-General, the Marquis Ito, charged the Emperor with duplicity, he repudiated the delegation to the Hague and denied having authorized it. This brought matters to a crisis, and the Japanese Foreign Minister, Viscount Hayashi, came in person from Tokyo to Seoul to assist or overrule Marquis Ito.

This conveys more than one very false impression. It suggests that Marquis Ito approached the Korean Sovereign with some complaint about the Hague delegates, whereas that is precisely what the Marquis did not do. He preferred no charge whatever against the Emperor but left him severely alone. Is it not strange that this, the most remarkable feature of the Resident-General's whole policy, should be so greatly misunderstood? The paragraph we have quoted suggests further that Viscount Hayashi went to Seoul for the purpose of supervising Marquis Ito. If that version of his functions comes under the notice of Viscount Hayashi, it will cause him some amusement.

The second statement to which The Independent's attention is invited is this:

The new Emperor, Yi-Syek, who was born in 1874, is the son of Queen Min, who was murdered and burned on a pile of straw mats in the court of the Palace by a Japanese mob in 1895.

This is a most unwarrantable libel. There has never been produced any tittle of trustworthy evidence that the murder of the Queen of Korea was perpetrated by Japanese. It has been proved that among her slayers were some men wearing foreign costume, and it has been inferred that they were Japanese, but to say that the crime was perpetrated by a "Japanese mob" is altogether misleading. There was no Japanese mob. It is not to be denied, we think, that the Japanese Legation, under its then most ill-advised Minister, had cognisance of the plot to remove the Queen from the Palace and to drive her clansfolk from the seats of power, but it has never been proved that the Japanese Minister or any of his staff contemplated the assassination of the Queen or imagined that the coup d'état would be carried to such a shocking denouement. At all events that was the view taken by the judicial tribunal convoked to try the Japanese Minister and his staff, and no one has any right to lay upon the shoulders of these officials a crime of which they were judicially acquitted.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IN TOKYO.

A great deal of interest has been excited by the granting of a charter for electric lighting purposes to the Tokyo Railway Company. The citizens of the capital, who have long been obliged to submit to the high charges and inefficient service of the Tokyo Electric Light Company, are anxiously asking whether they may now look for competition such as will better their condition. The general opinion appears to be, however, that there is ample room for the two enterprises to work side by side without clashing, at all events for the next three or four years. The directors of the Electric Light Company profess to be undisturbed by the prospect of rivalry. They say that by the middle of September they will be able to substitute water power for the present system, which will mean that they can supply light at a greatly reduced rate. It appears very questionable whether this calculation will be borne out by facts. In the first place the company assumes that the Katsuragawa will furnish a constant supply of 34,000 kilowatts, which forecast is based on the assumption that the Katsura works will remain always in good order and that only 15 per cent of power will be lost in transit, but the Katsura works are by no means ideal from an engineering point of view. On the contrary they are exposed to dangers against which a different but more expensive method of construction would have secured them; dangers which are believed to be capable of interrupting the whole supply at any moment. Apart from this, however, it has to be remembered that the Tokyo Railway Company is already able to generate at its power stations electricity capable of supplying 200,000 lights, which represents the total now carried on the books of the Electric Light Company. It has also to be remembered that whereas the Electric Light Company is receiving applications for about 10,000 lights monthly, it is not in a position to furnish more than 6,000 and thus even supposing that the Tokyo Railway Company does not offer a better service at cheaper rates—and that is precisely what it does offer—it is evident that there is room for two companies without serious clashing. Moreover it appears that Tokyo is not at all progressive in the matter of electric lighting. In Osaka the number of lights supplied per interval between two poles is from 30 to 35, whereas in Tokyo it is only 20, and doubtless this comparative smallness of consumption in Tokyo is due to the high price charged by the Electric Light Company and to the inferior nature of its service. The fact is that the Company has been working with its original plant through all these years and naturally it cannot furnish light of the best quality. It will be remembered that the Railway Company originally proposed to pay to the Municipality a certain fraction of its earnings over and above a fixed profit if this charter for electric lighting were granted. The Home Department, however, has dispensed with this provision, but has stipulated that the electric light accounts must be kept separate from the electric railway accounts. The general belief is, that speaking broadly, the charges of the Railway Company for electric lights will be 20 per cent. less than the charges of the Electric Light Company in the case of private lights, and 40 per cent. less in the case of public lights. It may be mentioned here that there was one weak point in the Tokyo Railway's programme; namely, that it proposed to charge the same figure (1.20 yen) per month for a whole-night ten-candle light as the Tokyo Electric Light Company now charges for half a night. People do not, however, use their electric lights after midnight, and even if they do, the Company supplying the light has no method of discovering the fact. In general, therefore, a half-night-light is practically equivalent to a whole-night, and thus nothing special could be gained in this particular field by recourse to the Railway Company. The latter, however, has now decided to charge only 60 sen for its half-night lights and 80 sen for its whole-night.

There continues to be a great deal of talk in the newspapers about the pending competition between the Tokyo Electric Light Company and the Tokyo Electric Railway Company. The newspapers take different sides according to the direction from which they receive their inspiration. One thing is certain, namely that if the Electric Light Company is to continue its prosperous career, it must reduce its rates, and its directors are said to be quite prepared to do so, so soon as they receive their supply of water power, which will be, they say, by the end of September, though nobody expects that prediction to be exactly verified. Besides the Company's engineers have had recourse to the system of open canals for carrying their water, and it is plain that such a plan exposes the works to many dangers which may at any moment entail an interruption of several days. Altogether the question is very interesting. As illustrating the difference between the charges of the two companies, we may mention the case of one house in Tokyo which is now supplied by the Tokyo Electric Light Company. The minimum monthly charge is nearly 29 yen, whereas the Tokyo Railway's estimate for the same service shows a minimum of less than 16 yen. It may be added here that the Home Department has now definitely adopted the policy of requiring that electric light wires shall be carried under ground. The Railway Company has agreed to carry out this programme immediately with regard to its new lines, and within a certain limit of time with regard to its old, which are still comparatively few. Of course the underground method is much more expensive than the over-head, and it will be a somewhat serious matter for the Electric Light Company to carry out this system in the case of the numerous wires that it has erected.

MARQUIS ITO.

The members of the House of Representatives gave a banquet in honour of Marquis Ito at the Seiyō-ken in Ueno on the 22nd inst. at half-past seven in the evening. Mr. Sugita, President of the House, delivered the welcoming address. He spoke in most eulogistic terms of the great services rendered by Marquis Ito in solving the problem of Korea, which country he described as the prime factor of Far Eastern tranquillity. It would have been impossible for any statesman to manipulate this problem with greater tact and wisdom than Marquis Ito had shown, and his country was fully sensible of the debt of gratitude it owes to him. Much, however, remained to be done before Korea could assimilate the essential features of the new civilization, and as the nation looked to Marquis Ito to conclude the task he had so well begun, they sincerely hoped that he would take care of his health and not exhaust himself by excessive labour.

Marquis Ito, in replying, dwelt on the fact that this was the first time in Japanese history when the duly elected representatives of the Japanese nation had combined to publicly approve the action of one of the country's officials, and he therefore fully appreciated the high honour accorded to him. He admitted that he had laboured hard to discharge his duties as Resident-General, but as to the measure of success achieved he could of course say nothing. He had come to Japan to submit and concert plans for dealing with the situation in Korea, and it would be for the Imperial Diet to take an important part in this consultation. He had been the recipient of a gracious expression of approval from his Majesty the Emperor on the preceding day, and he could not find words to express his appreciation of the fact that all political parties in the State had laid aside their habitual differences in order to unite, as they had done that evening, in approving his work. He interpreted this consensus as showing that they all fully appreciated the importance of the Korean problem and he knew well what value attached to that fact. Nothing would please him better than to speak frankly of the relations between Japan and Korea, but they must see that the occasion was not quite suitable for such candour. He had brought home with him the framework of many plans for the administration and development of Korea, and he trusted to get these filled in and approved in the main before he returned to his post. Foreigners were in the habit of saying that the strength of the gun lies in the nation behind it. He fully believed in that aphorism, not alone in the field of practical enterprise but also in that of diplomacy. He did not mean to say, however, that the Korean problem was necessarily to be solved by diplomacy. It was to be handled rather by an exercise of Japan's sovereign power, which had been extended to the Peninsula in the sequel of the past decade's events. For the proper exercise of that power what was essentially necessary was the aid not merely of the Japanese Executive but also of the Legislature. He himself was growing very old, and he felt that his strength scarcely sufficed for the discharge of duties which ought to devolve upon younger men. But having put his hand to the plough he must continue at the task without flinching, and he trusted to lay foundations upon which his able successors could build a shapely edifice.

It is remarked by Tokyo newspapers that whereas Marquis Ito had doubtless proposed for himself the important duty of winning the approval of the Lower House for his financial schemes with regard to Korea, the Lower House itself has taken the lead in virtually passing a unanimous vote of confidence. After this the financial difficulty may be said to be solved, for the House of Peers, where Marquis Yamagata's influence is paramount, will certainly not raise any difficulty. Nevertheless it is to be noticed that the House of Peers refrains from any congratulatory demonstration such as that organised by the Lower Chamber. This is explained, however, not as in any sense due to a lack of appreciation, but solely because the Peers consider that in view of the magnitude of the task still lying before Marquis Ito in Korea, the time has not yet come for throwing hats into the air, and any premature ovation would only embarrass the Marquis himself.

On the evening of Aug. 26th, fire broke out in Hirosaki, burning down eight houses. A woman was killed and a man injured.

CHINA

Friday, August 23.

A singular decree has been promulgated in Peking. Its apparent object is to induce Chinese subjects who have settled in Manila, the Straits Settlements, and elsewhere in the Southern Seas, to return to China and carry on their industrial or commercial enterprises at home. The edict promises titles of nobility to those that obey and assures them of Government support. Thus briefly stated, the document sounds very impractical, for the Chinese communities in the South Seas have acquired enormous local vested interests which they are not in the least degree likely to abandon in deference to an Imperial decree of such a vague character. There is therefore something underlying this measure, and that something is said to be an effort on the part of the Throne to awaken feelings of loyalty among these Chinese communities, which are generally regarded as honeycombed with anti-dynastic sedition. It was with that purpose that Mr. Yang, Vice-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, was recently sent to the southern settlements with two warships to demonstrate the power of the Chinese Government. That was immediately before the assassination of the Governor of Anhui, and the latter event has made the Chinese Government more than ever anxious to quench the embers of sedition that are smouldering chiefly in the south.

Saturday, August 24.

It is stated that the Chinese Government has expressed its desire to borrow from Japan one half of the sum of 800,000 yen needed for the reconstruction of the Hsin-mintun-Mukden railway. This is in accordance with the convention concluded when the line was handed over. On the other hand the convention stipulates that the chief engineer of the line and the treasurer shall be Japanese subjects and that the construction fund should be lodged in a Japanese bank.

A telegram to the Hochi seems to indicate that some attempt is being made by China to compromise the grain-veto problem. She has issued instructions that the fees hitherto paid by junks entering Tairen shall be reduced by one-half. One fails to appreciate the utility of this concession in the face of a veto which deprives the junks of any cargo.

A telegram to the Mainichi Shunpo says that orders have been suddenly issued from Peking in the sense that one-half of the students destined for study abroad shall be sent to Germany. If this be true it means a considerable reduction of the number likely to come to Japan.

Telegrams to the Tokyo press say that the proposed loan of 40 million taels for the construction of the above railway has been taken up by British and German financiers. The price paid is 5 per cent. for 90 yen net, but the telegrams are conflicting with regard to the period of repayment.

Wednesday, August 28.

Some little excitement has been caused in Peking by a sentence of suspension pronounced upon the Kimpao, a newspaper which has always been supposed to be under the patronage of very high officials, among them being Chu Hungchi and Chou, ex-Governor-General of Mukden. There are various conjectures as to the reason of this suspension, some attributing it to the fact that the Kimpao had revealed the Government's intention of summoning Viceroy Yuan to the capital, and others alleging that the paper was held to have seriously transgressed in its wilful efforts to impair the relations between China and Japan. The editor, Mr. Wang, who is a strong advocate of progress, says that a wish to suppress this journal had long existed in high places, but he is not described as assigning any particular reason for this mood.

It is alleged that in spite of the secrecy in which the movements of Viceroy Chang are enveloped, his Excellency will set out for Peking on the 3rd of September. Viceroy Yuan has also been summoned to the capital, but rumour alleges that earnest efforts are now being made and will probably be successful to reconcile the views of these two prominent men before they meet in the capital. If they can be brought into line there will be a genuine prospect of the inauguration of a progressive regimen, but if they remain at variance the wheels of reform will certainly not move appreciably. Viceroy Yuan, of course, sees that quite clearly and will recognise the expediency of sacrificing a part of the loaf for the purpose of saving the remainder.

Thursday, August 29.

The latest news from Peking is that the suppression of the Kimpao—not the suspension as we had originally supposed—is due to the anger of Prince Chih's party. It was the Kimpao which originally published the wholly false rumour about a Tientsin dancing girl who was said to have been bought out and presented to Prince Chih Jr. and about an equally apocryphal sum of money said to have been similarly offered. These slanders, as they appear to have certainly been, led to the disgrace of a very high official, Chu Hungchi, who was the principal supporter of the newspaper, and have now culminated in the suppression of the journal itself. We need hardly say that the editor announces his intention of starting another journal under a different name.

A lady missionary of the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society, who recently returned to China after furlough, writes:—"Yesterday a party of us went to see the new College of Western learning in Foochow city. I wish I could adequately picture to you the contrast that college represents with the state of learning in 1899, when I first came to China! Then I was taken to see the great examination buildings in Foochow city. To these buildings, once a year flocked the students from all over the Foochow prefecture. All the year they had studied at home, committing to their prodigious memories the Confucian books. The hall of examination consisted of rows on rows of small cells, where the students, one in each cell, wrote their papers for days together, feeding and sleeping in their cells to prevent communication with each other. And to-day what do we find? The cells are gone; large airy class rooms and lecture halls take their place. Three hundred resident students are taught Western learning! We visited three or four large classes learning English from the first and second standard reading books used in English Board schools. This College is the largest of over a hundred new schools started, under the Chinese Government, in this one city of Foochow. It is a new China I have come back to. Almost pathetic it seems to me, this longing for Western ways."

The appointment of Chang Jen-Chun to the Viceroyalty of the Two Kuang provinces, was due, says the writer of Notes on Native Affairs in the N. C. Daily News, to the policy of smoothing away racial jealousies. As soon as it became known that Viceroy T'en Ch'un-hsen was to be allowed to resign that Viceroyalty, it is reported that the Manchu party at once began wire-pulling for the post. Had the race question not cropped up at the time the chances were that either Viceroy Hsi Liang of the Yun-kwei provinces or some other Manchu would have been appointed by the Manchu clique in Peking to the post without an instant's delay. The Empress Dowager's commands were, however, to be obeyed and the choice therefore fell upon a Chinese. The appointed Governor Chang Jen-chun of Homan, was first governor of Kuangtung, but had to resign owing to the abolition of that post in 1905. Properly speaking, therefore, his Excellency was the right man to be appointed Viceroy T'en's successor at Canton. This, it is freely stated in the Capital, would, however, never have been the case, had not the Empress Dowager's decree put a stop to the suicidal policy of filling all the Viceroyalties and as many Governorships and Provincial Treasurerships as possible with Manchus to the exclusion of Chinese. It is needless to state that what is called the Manchu policy is also the policy of the Reactionary Party.

The Ministry of the Interior at Peking has obtained the sanction of the Throne to give the Electric Light Company of Peking the contract for constructing an electric tram service in the Capital.

The first meeting of the Tientsin Municipal Assembly was held on Aug. 18th. Mr. Li Shih-min was elected Chairman, and Mr. Wang Shao-lien, Vice-Chairman. Everything was carried out under Parliamentary rules and with perfect decorum. Mr. Lu, the Literary Chancellor of Chihli, was present at the proceedings as the representative of H.E. Viceroy Yuan Shih-k'ai.

According to the Peking correspondent of the N. C. Daily News, the Viceroy of the Minché provinces has again telegraphed to the Waiwupu complaining of the appearance of Japanese Buddhist missionaries in Foochow and other districts of Fukien province. The Buddhist doctrine was imported into the island Empire from China several hundred years ago and it is difficult to know why Japanese Buddhists should preach now to the Chinese masses, whose forefathers were their teachers for several generations. These Buddhist missionaries claim similar privileges to those which the Roman Catholic and Protestant missionaries enjoy in China; but as this was not stipulated for in existing Treaties between China and Japan, the Waiwupu has rejected it on the ground that the Chinese do not want foreigners to teach them Buddhism, which has been one of the principal religions in China since the Tang Dynasty.

Their Excellencies Yuan Shih-kai and Tuan Fang have both memorialized the Throne advising the abolition of Manchu garrisons in the provinces. In this connexion the Ministry of War has also recommended that the members of these Manchu garrisons be placed under the jurisdiction of the Viceroys or Governors of their respective provinces, and not as hitherto under special Tartar Generals and Manchu Brigadier-Generals.

We note from the North China Daily News that John Machado, who escaped from the British Consular Gaol at Shanghai on Sunday morning, the 18th August was rearrested on the morning of the 22nd by a native detective in a tea shop in Woosung Road. When arrested he was wearing a queue and Chinese clothes, and had had the fore part of his head shaved in Chinese fashion. He was taken before Mr. O. G. Potier, Consul for Portugal, and on the charge of gaoi-breaking was sentenced to six days' solitary confinement in the punishment cells of the gaol.

By the ordination of Edward Monier Bickersteth at Trinity, writes a correspondent, four generations of the same name have served in the ministry of the Church in ninety years.

1815—Edward Bickersteth (great-grandfather), Rector of Watton.

1848—Edward Henry Bickersteth (grandfather), Bishop of Exeter.

1873—Edward Bickersteth (uncle), Bishop in Japan.

DISASTROUS FLOODS IN EAST-CENTRAL JAPAN.

Sunday, August 25.

Our readers are aware that from the 22nd inst. Japan was threatened with an assault by two typhoons. One of these had its origin to the south of the Riukiu Archipelago, and thence made its way steadily to the northwest, reaching the Kii Channel on the 24th inst. and thence striking across the Main Island in the direction of Noto where it probably emerged on the 25th into the Sea of Japan. The other made its appearance almost simultaneously at the Bonin Islands and moved slowly to the north-west. It was hoped that this latter depression would take a northerly trend and pass out into the Pacific without producing much effect in Japan, but although this forecast was partially fulfilled, the storm did not turn northward until it had reached within striking distance of the east coast of Japan. It will thus be seen that the country was sandwiched between two centres of depression, one in the west and one in the east, and it resulted that every part of the Empire, with the exception of a small region in Kyushu, was deluged on the 24th inst. The storm and rain experienced in Tokyo and Yokohama were due to the Ogasawara depression. One of the worst incidents seems to have been the bursting of the Tonbeji dyke on the Rokugo River, which resulted in the flooding of a large district right up to Omori. It is reported that there has been no such flood in this region for 97 years. The water rose above the floor of the railway bridge at Kawasaki and traffic was interrupted. The Oigawa, the Sagami-gawa and the Baniugawa also rose to an extraordinary height and it is thought that much damage to the crops will be found to have resulted. To the north of Tokyo also there were heavy floods and railway communication was suspended. In fact from all parts of the country comes news of the interruption of traffic. Floods were the principal factor of mischief, wind being comparatively absent.

Monday, August 26.

The two centres of depression which were advancing from the Riukiu Islands and the Bonins respectively lost much of their force before striking the mainland of Japan. The Riukiu invader, which at one moment seemed likely to prove the more formidable of the two, virtually exhausted itself in the sea of Shikoku and the invader from the Bonin Islands took its way northward through the Pacific with rapidly diminishing force. The Riukiu depression, however, developed a reflex phenomenon in the sea off Oki Island, whence it probably proceeded up the Sea of Japan, striking Hokkaido on the 25th inst. The Bonin Islands storm approached nearest to the land in the districts surrounding Tokyo Bay and those lying northward of the capital. There was not any heavy wind, but great deluges of rain fell, producing disastrous floods in many places. The Meteorological Department reports that in the absence of any fresh development, the weather should clear up during the course of the 26th and in all probability the 27th day will pass quietly. The records show, however, that on the average from three to four of these storms travel northward yearly from the south seas, and therefore another disturbance may be expected in the course of September. As for the rice crop, the prospect can not yet be said to have been seriously affected. The recent storm of rain was too early to injure the flowers of the crop, and if now a spell of fine weather succeeds, a very plentiful yield may be expected. Breaking of river banks and consequent inundations belong of course to a different category. This kind of catastrophe seems to have been plentiful in the districts touched by the Ogasawara depression. Kawasaki is one of the worst places. The whole region between that town and Tsurumi is flooded owing to a large break in the embankment of the Tamagawa, and northward nearly as far as Omori there is a lesser sheet of water. The flood having risen above the level of the railway bridge at Kawasaki, traffic had to be suspended, and is not yet restored at this moment of writing. In these regions 2,977 houses are said to be more or less under water. The bridge of the Keihin Electric Railway over the Rokugo was partly washed away, as was also a considerable quantity of the ballasting of this road and of the Government railway. In Sagami Prefecture also the rivers were heavily flooded and all the region about Hakone has suffered more or less. The Arakawa in Saitama Prefecture, which forms the head waters of the Sumidagawa, is said to have flooded large regions and there has been in that region a landslide which caused 18 deaths. Tokyo, however, did not suffer much and unless the floods continue does not seem in any danger. The Arakawa, celebrated for its unruliness, burst its banks through a space of several hundred yards and spread its waters over the country between Kumagaye and Takasaki, inundating 3,000 houses. Tochigi Prefecture also suffered severely; the Daiyagawa has brought its usual quota of injury to Nikko and has segregated Chusenji. This list is by no means exhausted but we have not space to enter into all the details. Briefly stated the fact is that all the region from Hakone to Nikko has been more or less devastated. As yet we have no particulars of the damage wrought in western Japan, but this absence of news may be interpreted in a favourable sense as all the telegraphs are working.

In consequence of stormy weather, combined with the threatening indication of a falling barometer, considerable retardation of work on the shipping in Yokohama harbour was experienced on Saturday. The M. M. steamer Polynesia, which should have left at 9 a.m. on Saturday did not get away till 8 a.m. on Sunday. On Saturday there were no fewer than nine steamers lying outside the breakwaters.

News from Karuizawa, both by letter and telegram, shows that the residents of that usually favoured locality have again been afflicted by heavy rains. Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday were beautiful days but rain began on Thursday and increased in violence on Friday so that according to a telegram sent off on Saturday communication between East and West Karuizawa has again been suspended.

Further details with regard to the storm and consequent inundations are reported from the interior. In Shizuoka, the districts along the rivers Oi and Fuji sustained damage owing to the floods. Railway bridges were for some time in a dangerous condition but not so as to impede traffic. In the district of East Katsushika, Chiba prefecture, destructive floods were experienced. Nearly all the houses in the locality collapsed or were washed away. The ravages of the storm at Nikko are reported to have been serious. The bridges on the Sori Road, (Chuzenji) were all destroyed, and landslides followed. No damage was caused to the Imperial villa.

In Kanagawa prefecture, the damage has been very heavy. Telegraphic and telephonic reports, received at the Yokohama Central Police Office later than those already published in these columns, say that the bridge over the Rokugo (of the Tokyo-Yokohama Electric Railway) has been damaged by the swollen river, and was subsequently washed away. Owing to the destruction of the river embankment at Yaguchi in the district of Ebara, the floods were extensive and as the result, a large area including Kabata, Kawasaki, and Tsurumi was submerged. The electric depot of the Tokyo Yokohama Electric Railway was flooded with the result that damage was caused to the engine department and that consequently traffic on the whole line was suspended. The factory of the Yokohama Sugar Refining Co. at Kawasaki was swamped by the rising water, and heavy loss was sustained. It is needless to say that all the other buildings in this district were flooded and that some collapsed. Many of the inhabitants took refuge on the high lands near by, where they are suffering from scarcity of food and the continuous heavy rains. The police are making efforts to relieve the distressed people, but these are largely ineffective as the floods still prevail. Fortunately, however, the waters are gradually subsiding.

At Totsuka, Fujisawa, and Chigasaki, inundations were also experienced. All the villagers escaped to the hills in the vicinity. At Ofuna similar conditions prevailed. At Hiratsuka, eight hundred and thirty houses were flooded to a depth of about five feet above the floor. High waves visited the sea coast at Odawara. No special damage was sustained. The people, who are reminded of the tidal waves experienced some years ago, are apprehensive of a revisitation.

In the Hakone district, after the Tonosawa Hotel was washed away as already reported, the Ichino-ya, Tamano-yu and some other hot-spring houses met with similar disaster. The new building of the Suikwan-ro, a tea house, partially collapsed. The stone-wall of the Fujiya Hotel, at Miyano-shita, was destroyed at 4 p.m. on Sunday. All the poles of the electric railway between Yumoto and Odawara were thrown down.

Loss of life and various damage were reported from several places, but there is not yet any definite statement to hand.

It is stated by the Yokohama Post Office that all postal matter, which was received at the office on or after Aug. 24th, for western points by the Tokaido Railway are detained in consequence of the inundations, by which traffic has been stopped.

Tuesday, August 27.

The promise of fine weather which presented itself briefly on the 26th inst. was marred by the appearance of another centre of depression which had its origin in the sea off Idzu promontory. This phenomenon declared itself on the afternoon of the 26th and its direction indicated that it would pass across the main island towards Echigo. Tokyo and Yokohama would therefore be upon its outskirts. Rain began to fall soon after sunset and continued without intermission throughout the whole of the 27th.

The Tokyo Bay Steamship Company is exerting itself to restore communications between Yokohama and the capital. From the 26th inst., it organised a service with six steamers, leaving Tokyo at 3, 4, and 11 a.m., and 3 and 5 p.m. There is naturally some uncertainty as to when the railway will be usable between Omori and Tsurumi. The 28th is the earliest date spoken of, and this new centre of depression may have the effect of deferring the time still longer. The inundation diminished visibly on the 26th but it can not be expected that this process will continue fast in existing circumstances.

The meteorological authorities say that the two centres of depression which produced these floods were of an exceptional character, for instead of moving forward and carrying their devastations to a great distance, they were dissipated locally and wrought comparatively little havoc. But they produced exceedingly heavy rainfalls in the mountains. Tokushima, in the province of Awa, had the highest record. No less than 257 m.m. of rain fell there in 24 hours, and Nikko came next on the list with 233 m.m.

It is not yet known whether the rice crop has suffered severely, but of course if this inclement weather continues, the prospect of a fine yield will be disappointed.

From Chusenji comes news that the storm has passed but not without producing a great rise in the level of the lake, so that several roads were buried in water and communications were consequently severed. Some 40 foreigners residing at Yumoto are said to be cut off, but considering that there is a mountain road from Yumoto to Chusenji, this statement must be received with reserve. It is stated that the residence of the British Ambassador was invaded by the flood and that his Excellency had to move elsewhere. The line from Ueno northward to Utsunomiya is impassable in the neighbourhood of Kurihashi, but the notorious Gogendo embankment on the Tone river has withstood the attack of the flood. The breaking of this embankment means inundation of some of the suburbs of Tokyo. Saitama Prefecture seems to have suffered most owing to several breaks in the embankments of the Arakawa. No less than 10,000 houses are said to be more or less inundated. A village called Kawaguchi seems to have been the centre of injury in this province. Virtually the whole of its inhabitants were driven to take refuge on the heights or in buildings on elevated places. Great damage was also done between Hachioji and Kofu in Yamanashi Prefecture. Embankments were carried away and the railway service was interrupted. From Osaka and Hiogo Prefectures also come more or less lugubrious accounts, but that part of the country seems to have escaped with comparatively little suffering.

Further details of the floods come from the interior. At Nakajo, in Saitama prefecture, 350 buildings were swamped. Even a larger number of houses were flooded at Kawabe and forty were washed away. Many persons were killed or injured.

The whole city of Maizuru was flooded on the night of Aug. 25th.

A Takamatsu telegram says that all the rivers of that district broke their embankments causing much damage to fields and buildings. At 9 a.m. on Aug. 26th, a severe shock of earthquake was felt in the district.

At 9.40 p.m. on Aug. 25th, says a Mito telegram, the embankment of the Watarase river was destroyed and 120 houses were damaged.

The damage sustained at Numadzu consists of 1,003 houses flooded and 15 washed away, the latter including a Shinto temple. A large area of fields was submerged.

At places along the rivers Kitsu and Yodo (Kyoto), inundations were experienced. About 1,200 houses were swamped.

According to an official telegram, about ten thousand buildings have been flooded in Saitama prefecture. Forty-two persons have been killed or injured.

At Nikko eleven houses were washed away, twelve collapsed, and many bridges were destroyed. The foreigners at Nikko and Chusenji are all safe.

The section between Yamakita and Gotemba of the Tokaido Railway is still under repair. The damage is reported to have been more severe than was at first thought. The repairs will still take two or three days. Traffic on the North-East Line (formerly the Nippon Railway) is still suspended on several sections owing to inundations, viz. Warabi-Urawa, 3 miles, Koga-Kurihashi, etc. Traffic on the Shin-etsu Line is still stopped between Karuizawa and Komuro on account of the floods. It is not possible to say when the water will subside or when service on the railway can be resumed. Serious damage was caused to the Central Line, at Sasako tunnel, Shiroyama, Yose, and other places in Yamanashi prefecture.

In consequence of the storm, telegraph and telephone wires throughout the Empire have been damaged. Communication between Tokyo and several Central, North-eastern, and Tokaido provinces is impeded.

A foreign resident of Yokohama who has returned from Gotemba reports that the obstruction between Oyama and Yamakita has been caused by a wash-out of the road hard by the river. Some two hundred yards appear to have been thus destroyed, and passengers (who have to walk down from Oyama, but are taken up by train from Yamakita) have to walk round this gap over the hill side.

Three ladies who returned to Yokohama from Miyashita on Tuesday had to cross the river at Yumoto by means of a cable. Provisions at the Miyashita hotel are scarce. To avoid the cable method of transportation many hills have to be surmounted.

Wednesday, August 28.

The fresh torrent of rain which attacked Tokyo on the 27th inst. was due, as we have already stated, to a centre of depression which made its appearance off the Idzu promontory on the 26th inst., and from thence behaved in a somewhat unusual way for it took a westerly course which brought it into Sagami Prefecture and it then turned northeast, invading Awa, Kadsusa and the Mayebashi district, finally emerging seaward in the Choshi Bay. It was not accompanied by any wind, and its effects were very circumscribed, Nagoya for example, remaining entirely beyond the reach of the rain. As for the centre of depression which had travelled up from the Riukiu Archipelago, it was expected to have completely dissipated itself by the 28th inst. The other centre of depression which made its appearance off Noto moved up the Sea of Japan towards Hokkaido, attacking the west coast of the latter more or less but not invading the main island of Japan.

Summing up the doings of these recent centres of depression we find that the south and west portions of Japan were not touched at all, that the centre escaped with cloudy weather and that the injury was confined to the Kwanto and the regions west of Oshiu and the Hokkaido. The rivers which were most signally swollen by the rains were the Arakawa and the Tonegawa. The region between these two big rivers was almost completely inundated. Sixty-one people were killed or injured, 18,000 houses are said to have been invaded by the floods and 58,000 people are in need of relief. The bursting of the Ayase embankment on the Arakawa river resulted in the inundation of the Asakusa, Honjo and Fukugawa regions of Tokyo, and a large part of Mukojima was under water. Of course if the fine weather which set in on the morning of the 28th continues for a very few days, a great part of the trouble will be remedied. Tokyo newspapers are full of photographs depicting the flooded districts.

Telegrams have been received from the interior giving further details with regard to the storm and the resulting damage. In Yamanashi prefecture the effects seem to have been very severe. The districts of East Yatsushiro and Naka-koma were swamped and many buildings were washed away or collapsed. Twenty-eight persons were drowned and eleven were injured. The superintendent of the Ishiwa-machi Tax Office and his wife are missing. About a thousand villagers who took refuge on high ground near their homes have had to pass three days without food. Similar distress seems to have been felt in other districts of the same prefecture, but information is lacking on account of the interruptions of communications.

In Tochigi prefecture, similar conditions were experienced at points along the Watarase and other rivers. The villages of Ishikawa and Tachi were totally ruined by the floods. About two hundred villagers escaped with their lives but the remainder are still missing. The inhabitants of Tochigi prefecture who are being relieved by the local government number 3,400.

In Saitama prefecture, 18,000 houses were flooded. Fifteen collapsed and twenty-five were washed away. Sixty-one persons were killed or injured. Fifty-eight thousand persons are being relieved by the local government.

Reports from Gumma, Chiba, Shizuoka and other prefectures in Central Japan are similar to the foregoing.

A telegram from the Commander-in-Chief of Maizuru Naval Station says that several landslides have occurred since August 23rd and six buildings were destroyed. The water works also sustained serious damage.

Owing to the suspension of traffic on various railways—Tokaido, Nakasendo, Shin-etsu, Chuo, Sobu, and Tobu Lines,—Tokyo and Yokohama are practically isolated from the interior, and the prices of daily necessities have gone up considerably. So long as the railway service remains interrupted, prices are expected to rise further. In Tokyo, inundations were experienced in the urban districts of Fukaga, Honjo, Shitaya and Asakusa as well as at Senju. Damage was sustained by many buildings. The Tokyo Electric Light Co. buildings at Senju were so injured that business had to be temporarily stopped.

Traffic on the Tokyo-Yokohama Railway was resumed on Aug. 28th, a train from Tokyo arriving at Yokohama at 9 a.m. As the road bed of the railway between Tsurumi and Kabata is still undermined, the trains run slowly so that the journey each way takes about one and a half hours. Further one of the two lines between Kawasaki and Tsurumi was unavailable having been displaced from the original position by the water. It is said that the service of the regular trains will not be observed to-day.

Traffic on the Tokyo-Yokohama Electric Railway is still suspended on account of the severe damage sustained by the line and the engine department. The repairs are expected to take a few days.

Thursday, August 29.

Further telegrams with regard to the destructive storm and its results have been received from the interior. Tajima province seems to have suffered greatly. Owing to floods from the river Maruyama, the districts between Wadayama and Shirotsaki, covering an area of about twenty-five miles, were inundated. The railway which was in course of construction was greatly damaged. At Toyooka, 3,600 houses were washed away or collapsed and most of the moveable property was lost. Many of the villagers took refuge on the high land near by and have been without food and shelter since the evening of Aug. 26th. The fields were severely damaged.

At Fukuchiyama, 224 houses were washed away and 170 destroyed. Many persons were killed and eleven corpses were found on Aug. 28th.

At Himeji, a building belonging to the Fourteenth Army Division was washed away. A soldier was drowned and a non-commissioned officer is missing.

According to telegrams from the Yamanashi Prefectural Office the effects of the storm seem to have been more severe than at first reported. At Ishiwa-machi, in East Yatsushiro, six persons were killed or are missing. At Miyamura, eighty-five houses were washed away and fifty or more destroyed. All the villagers took refuge at the various Buddhist temples on high-ground near by. The damage sustained by the Kōbu Railway between Otsuki and Sasako was specially severe. The repairs are expected to take about two months. The tunnel at Sasako was entirely destroyed. Forty-four persons were killed at Sasako and eight at Hatsukari. Many buildings were damaged or destroyed at both those villages. At the village of Takara, eighty houses were washed away together with eighteen of the occupants. Twenty-one persons were injured. Three hundred villagers of Inuma, who took refuge on a hill, are almost in a starving condition, owing to the interruption of communication with other places. The prefectural government authorities are trying to relieve them.

Traffic on the following railways has been resumed:—Karuzawa-Komuro, Hankaku Line, Kameoka-Yagi near Kyoto, and Matsukawa-Fukushima on the North-East Line.

The floods in Asakusa, Honjo, and other places of Tokyo have nearly subsided. The supply of daily necessities from the surrounding districts has been resumed. Anxiety as to the further rise of prices is now subsiding.

It is said that in the district of North Senju, Tokyo, 18,500 houses were inundated and twenty-six persons were drowned.

FINANCIAL.

The long expected official sanction has at length been given to the Tokyo Railway Company to undertake the business of electric lighting in addition to that of electric trams. The concession is larger too than was at first anticipated, for it extends the Company's right of supply to the whole city instead of to a belt of fixed dimensions on either side of the track. We gather from the charter, however, that the Home Department contemplates the gradual transfer of over-head lines to underground. This part of the charter is somewhat involved, but it may be assumed that the Company has not accepted any responsibility which it will not find its account in satisfying. Some time must elapse before this concession bears any financial fruit, but we may expect to see almost immediately that competition will arise between the new and the old Companies.

The Treasury has seven and a half million yen worth of outstanding bills which ought to be paid on the 24th inst. They are to be renewed, however, and a further issue of similar securities to the extent of 700,000 yen will be made, to be paid off on the 22nd of November. The rate of interest is 1.6 sen daily, which works out at 5.85 per cent annually.

On the 22nd inst. the Stock Exchange showed a tendency to steadiness and even to a slight rise. Out of 20 stocks in which transactions were recorded 15 moved a little upwards and five made a correspondingly small descent. On the 23rd, however a generally weak tone prevailed. As usual, explanations are given of this continued stagnancy, the principal being connected with the country's foreign trade. Last year the excess of imports up to the end of July was 50 million yen, but from August onwards the balance was steadily redressed so that the year ended with a surplus of nearly 5 millions on the side of exports. This season, however, the excess of imports up to the end of July totalled 70 million yen, and although the balance swung in the other direction from the beginning of August, the change has not been sufficiently marked to promise complete redress. Thus there is some anxiety about an exodus of specie, though the record of silk and the prospects of the rice crop tend to dispel uneasiness.

The representatives of the Franco-Belgian Syndicate, to the number of 17, including six experts, arrived in Tokyo on the morning of the 24th, under the guidance of Mr. Loonen, who has shown remarkable energy and enterprise in connection with this matter. The coming of so many eminent French financiers and the very practical nature of their procedure naturally attract much attention in Japan, especially as Mr. Loonen speaks of the probability that Japan may become a second Russia as a place for the investment of French capital. Of course nothing very explicit is yet published as to the intentions of the syndicate, but, speaking broadly, its purpose is to invest capital.

The weather has, of course, produced the most depressing effect upon the Tokyo Stock Exchange. It is not believed that the rice crop has yet suffered any serious damage but the climatic conditions during the next few days are all important, and in the meanwhile sellers are encouraged and buyers deterred. The price of rice too shows a tendency to rise rapidly. The quotation on the 26th inst., was 18.40 yen per koku, whereas it stood at 17.92 yen before the atmospheric disturbances of the past few days.

It appears that the Treasury bonds which the Government is about to issue on the 28th inst., will total 15 million yen, and that their proceeds are to be applied to the Tobacco Monopoly.

In the columns of the Kokumin we find an interesting note which purports to embody an official opinion about the foreign trade of the country for the current year. Up to the end of July the trade aggregated 543,110,000 yen, being 80 millions in round figures greater than the corresponding total for last year. Among the exports which went to make up this sum, it is noticeable that silk and copper were responsible for an increase of 20 millions. Turning to imports their total for the period under review was 305,000,000 yen being an increase of 52 millions as compared with last year, which increase was mainly due to large purchases of raw cotton, iron and machinery. It appears from the above that the excess of imports during the first seven months of the year was 68 million yen. Last year the same period showed an excess of 46 millions. This, however, was not only balanced by the excess of exports in the concluding five months of the year but also the final showing was a surplus of 5 millions on the side of exports. It is not thought probable that the balance of trade will be quite so favourable this year, but even supposing that exports and imports are equal the record will be unprecedentedly prosperous.

The Government announced a new issue of 15 million worth of Treasury bonds in the Official Gazette of the 29th inst. at the rate of 1.6 rin daily. These obligations are dischargeable on the 26th of November. It is stated that practically no applications as yet have been received. Of course this failure must be largely attributed to the extraordinary catastrophes of the past week, namely the floods and the Hakodate conflagration. These incidents have given a setback to the share market also just as it was beginning to show some signs of recovering from the recent minor panic. There can be no doubt also that people are waiting to see what kind of weather the next ten days or fortnight produces. The fate of the rice crop depends largely on that.

THE RICE CROP.

The immediate proximity of the recent rains to the centre of universal observation naturally created an impression that the favourable prospects hitherto entertained of this year's rice crop had been marred. Such is not thought to be the case. In the first place the localities which were inundated are not large rice producing districts, and even in their case as the rainfall was not accompanied by any violent wind, the injury done is by no means irremediable. Of course if the plants are doomed to remain for 5 or 6 days under water, they must suffer badly, but if the present fine weather holds, the floods will subside speedily—in fact they have already subsided to a considerable extent—and the ultimate injury will be small. Our readers are probably aware that three kinds of rice are cultivated in Japan, namely, the Wase-te, the Naka-te and the Oke-te. Of these three the first named is already fully in ear and will soon be reaped, so that it can not have suffered much unless in cases where the plants were absolutely uprooted. The Naka-te constitutes the bulk of the crop, and this it is which is now in a tender condition. Foreigners are apt to laugh at the Japanese agricultural calendar on account of its extreme accuracy, and certainly when we find a whole nation anxiously watching the weather on two particular days of the year, things seem to be somewhat meticulous. But there is reason on the side of the Japanese. The rice plant gets through its operation of flowering in the short space of 24 hours, and those hours generally coincide with the 210th day from the opening of the year. The process of filling the ear takes place ten days later and is almost equally rapid, so that we have here an explanation of the anxiety felt about the 220th day. Up to the recent rains it was reckoned that the rice crop this season would be the best that has been harvested in the past 36 or 37 years, and it is thought that in spite of these rains, that estimate will not be belied if the weather remains favourable for the next fortnight.

BIG FIRE AT HAKODATE.

Some details with regard to the fire which has nearly wiped-out seven-tenths of Hakodate are furnished in a telegram received by the Department of Communications. The flames broke out at 10.25 on Aug. 25th in Higashikawamachi. Owing to a strong wind, the fire spread rapidly throughout the adjoining streets, with the result that about 70 per cent. in extent of the city was destroyed, including all the foreign consulates (except the American), the Post Office, the telephone exchange, a government warehouse (in which a large quantity of postal and revenue stamps and other material was stored) the local marine office, the police station, the Hokkaido Government office, the regimental headquarters, warehouses belonging to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the Hakodate Hospital, and various banks. Seventy bags of postal parcels were also lost.

The loss to insurance companies is the heaviest yet recorded in Japan. The figures given are:—

	Yen.
Tokyo Fire Insurance.....	1,000,000
Meiji do	700,000
Osaka do	350,000
Nippon do	750,000
Kyodo do	270,000
Nisshu do	400,000
	3,470,000

The figures are not yet complete, but the total is expected to reach 4 millions.

We understand that Mr. Consul-General Miller and Mr. and Mrs. Bagnall, of Yokohama, arrived in Hakodate the day before the fire, and happily all are safe.

It is now stated that the number of houses burned in Hakodate was 13,000 and that 300 persons lost their lives.

The obligations incurred by the Insurance Companies in connection with this catastrophe are spoken of in a very pessimistic strain by the Tokyo press. Some of these Companies are represented as being liable for payments which exceed the total of their paid-up capital, and the least that can happen to them is to be deprived of power to pay dividends for a considerable time. In order to meet their obligations it is expected that they will have to sell a large quantity of the shares in which their reserves are invested and as these shares consist mostly of the stock of the Tanko Steamship Company and some spinning companies, the latter were more or less affected on the 27th inst. The Spinning Companies are supposed to have suffered heavy losses on account of the inundations and their shares also suffered depreciation. Of course the shares of the Insurance Companies suffered most of all.

The total amount of insurance liabilities in connection with the Hakodate fire is now put at 4,390,000 yen. Nine companies are involved and of these five will certainly pay up, but of the remainder three, representing a total of 450,000 yen, are said to have no means of meeting their liability, and one, the Osaka Company, which has policies aggregating 300,000 yen, is an affair of quite recent establishment and its action is not predicted.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Miss Constance Smedley contributes to the Fortnightly an interesting study on the perennial problem, the relations of husband and wife, under the title of "The Hedda Gabler of To-day." The writer laments that the man fixes his ideal of wifehood on any woman whom he fancies, and expects the wife to live up to that ideal, however incongruous her temperament and disposition may be; while he never for a moment thinks of striving to discover and live up to his wife's ideal of husbandhood. The wife philosophically and patiently renounces her ideal of husbandhood, realising that it doesn't fit. The man is less accommodating. The writer proceeds: The fact is, all men, wed or unwed, are universally accorded full range of the field of impersonal interests, however uninterested their wives may be in their hobbies or careers, lack of interest being indeed counted as a fault in the wife; and to restrain such energies or turn them aside on account of the wife's indifference or aversion to such interests would be held unmanly and weak-minded in the extreme. Abandonment of a career on account of the wife's counter-tastes would be considered a pity; a wife's abandonment of hobbies or pursuits disliked by the husband would be termed devotion. Husbands, in short, are granted individuality, and a possessive ideal of husbandhood would suppress his individuality. So the young wife's first ideal of husbandhood crumples cobwebwise and vanishes, and she accepts the natural manhood of her husband with a more or less degree of content, according to her temperament, but always with a certain amount of resignation. The way out of this impasse is held by the writer to lie in the outlet that is opening for woman's energy in the working world, out of the half-lights and perfumed confines of her drawing-room. There she learns discipline and begins to understand without despising the work of man. And in this better understanding of her fellows, life becomes better for the Hedda Gabler of to-day.

Mr. Kawakami, formerly Japanese Commercial Agent in Vladivostok and now Consul General in Harbin, is said to have been ordered by the Japanese Government to make an expedition up the Sungari River for the purpose of accurately investigating the state of affairs in the district drained by that great stream. Evidently the opening of the Sungari has much to do with the material development of North Manchuria and it is from that point of view that Mr. Kawakami's expedition is planned.

On the morning of the 24th inst., Mr. Wijin (?) was discovered to be living with his wife in a cottage near Omori. This person is a Siberian Post Office official who some time ago absconded carrying with him 100,000 roubles of public money. The Russian Government took measures to search for him in various countries and it was at last found that he had fled to Japan. A difficulty arose, however, owing to the fact that no extradition treaty exists between Japan and Russia. This obstacle was got over by the Japanese Government agreeing to hand over the accused as a matter of friendship, on condition that this should not be regarded as a precedent, and further on condition that Russia would show similar courtesy to Japan. The fugitive official with his wife, two children and a maid servant were all apprehended.

We read in the Jiji Shimpō that the new Commercial Treaty between Russia and Japan and the Fishery Convention were signed on the 27th of July in St. Petersburg, were ratified on the 28th, and were despatched to Tokyo on the 29th, reaching the latter city on the 24th of August. This remarkable expedition of procedure is to be regarded as another instance of Russia's friendly mood towards Japan, and our contemporary expresses a hope that there will not be a day's unnecessary delay on Japan's side. We are now in the summer vacation, but the Jiji would nevertheless have the Privy Council immediately to meet so that ratification may take place in Tokyo forthwith and the documents may be promulgated before the end of the month.

New regulations have been published with reference to the use of telephones by newspapers. We can not discover, however, that any considerable concession is made. The gist of the matter is that if a newspaper contemplates sending or receiving two or more long-distance messages per diem, and if it is prepared to fix beforehand the hour of their despatch, special arrangements will be made for quick accessibility to the wire. In the case of any newspaper which pledges itself to send five messages or upwards daily a special receiver will be established in the exchange office at the expense of the latter. We do not find that there is anything in the way of a reduction of rates. It will be understood that by the term message here used we refer to the period of five minutes allowed for one long-distance conversation.

There is renewed talk of constructing a canal from Tsuruga on the north-west coast of Japan to Osaka. The tempting feature of this scheme is that the large water-way furnished by Lake Biwa would be utilized, and thus much labour would be saved. Were this canal an accomplished fact the distance from Vladivostok to Osaka would be shortened by 600 miles, so far as the water-route is concerned. From Vladivostok to Tsuruga is 400 miles and the proposed canal would be 500 miles, the total journey being thus 900, whereas if a vessel goes round by Baku, she has to perform a voyage of 1500 miles in all to reach Osaka. Of course such a canal would have great strategical value, since it would represent a path right across the waist of the main island, thus bringing the Sea of Japan and the Pacific Ocean into direct communication. The canal would also facilitate travel to and from Europe via Siberia, though so long as the railway to Tsuruga is available, it is probable that travellers would prefer the latter to the comparatively slow and uninteresting journey on the canal. From a commercial point of view, however, it is hard to see how such an enterprise could pay. A very large traffic would be necessary, and whence is such a traffic to come? Nevertheless the scheme may be considered to have entered the field of practical contingencies.

With regard to the question of teaching foreign languages in Japan there has been some mutual recrimination between the Department of Education, the High Schools and the Middle Schools, each endeavouring to place the responsibility on one of the other two. The upshot of the discussion is that the method of instruction pursued at the Middle Schools are condemned as insufficient. They are required henceforth to pay more attention to spelling, in the first place; to contrive, in the second, that each student shall become familiar with at least 4,000 words of the language he studies; with regard to pronunciation, in the third place, since perfection in this matter can not be hoped for the avoidance of flagrant errors should be deemed a sufficient achievement; and in the fourth place, in the matter of grammar, a general understanding of the meaning and application of the rule should be aimed at rather than the manner of employing them in special cases. These views come from the professors and teachers in the High Schools, and it is expected that Middle Schools will be invited to express their opinion on them before they are translated in a departmental instruction.

The publication has commenced of a periodical called the London Shimpō (London News). It is entirely in the Japanese language, with the exception of certain advertisements, and though the type is small, it is beautifully clear. There are 9 pages of reading matter out of a total of 20, from which figures it will be seen that the periodical has already succeeded in obtaining a fair number of advertisements. This first number has, of course, an article setting forth the raison d'être of the paper, as also an interesting and wholesome article on commercial integrity, but on the whole we gather that the prime object is to discuss industrial and commercial matters, and to collect news in London for the purpose of conveying it to the Japanese nation. We should not have thought that there was very much room for such an enterprise, but as the editor states, in his opening article, that he is quite indifferent to considerations of profit and loss, the number of his readers is a secondary question. The London Shimpō is published at No. 77, New Oxford Street, and may be obtained from the Keiseisha, Ginza, Nichome, Tokyo. We wish our new contemporary every success.

Mr. Uchida, Japanese Representative in Vienna, recently repatriated to Rome and was received in audience by the Pope on the 12th inst. by way of returning the visit paid by Monseigneur O'Connor to Tokyo last year. His Holiness, after desiring Mr. Uchida to convey to his Government sincere thanks for this visit of Mr. Uchida himself and for the reception given to the Archbishop, spoke with gratitude of the protection extended to the followers of the Catholic religion in Japan. In consideration of the kindness shown to his beloved children in the Far Eastern Empire the Pope said that he habitually made it a subject of prayer to the Almighty to give prosperity and happiness to the Imperial Household of Japan and to the Japanese nation.

A Council of State was to have been held on the 18th inst., but owing to the fact that some of the principal members are unable to reach Tokyo on account of the floods, the meeting has been postponed till the 30th. It is believed that the chief subject of discussion will be the Korean problem and the matter of dealing with Korean progress as proposed by Marquis Ito.

THE SILK QUESTION.

We have received the following communication from Mr. H. Abegg, Chairman of the Association of Foreign Raw and Waste Silk Merchants of Yokohama, dated Aug. 24th:—

As you on several occasions have alluded to the present controversy between three Reereels factories in Joshiu and the Association of Foreign Raw and Waste Silk Merchants of Yokohama, you will oblige us by publishing the following correct statement of the case.

Almost the whole production of the three factories, amounting for the season 1906/07 to about 7000 Piculs, finds its way to the United States.

Until quite recently all these goods were entrusted to the Japanese Commission Merchants in Yokohama to be sold here to both Japanese and Foreign exporters alike, as is the custom with every other kind of silk shipped from Japan. In order to compare the relative amounts of these Reereels purchased by Japanese and Foreign buyers we append the following list:

Season.	Purch. by Jap. firms.	Purch. by For. firms.
1904/05	2,906 Pic.	4,926 Pic.
1906/07	4,988 "	2,049 "

From this you will see that the purchases for account of the Japanese Exporters have gradually increased, especially so during the last season, a fact which in itself is certainly no matter for congratulation to the Foreign buyers, who see their operations in an important article hampered considerably. However, as long as Japanese and Foreign exporters were treated alike, viz., had to buy through the same established channels, they had no reason to complain and did not complain.

But now things seem on the point of changing as the three companies have made arrangements with the Kiito Gomei Kaisha and the Mitsui to sell to them directly (without the intervention of the Yokohama Japanese middlemen) a certain part of their production, which part may of course be increased as time goes on.

It is thus a matter of fact, that the two Japanese firms obtain a good part of their silk cheaper than Foreigners do, as they, the Japanese, save the commission which in the regular course of trade has to be paid by the producer in the interior to the Japanese middleman in Yokohama. In days of close competition and small profits this commission makes all the difference to the Foreign buyer, who therefore has good cause to feel alarmed, the more so, as he is not allowed to deal directly with the producer, but has to make his purchases through the "toi-ya" in Yokohama. Moreover, through their action of consigning part of their produce directly to the consuming markets, the three factories make themselves direct competitors against their Foreign customers, and may take advantage of useful information they get from them by offering the other part of their silk in the Yokohama market.

Taking into account all this, the members of the Association of Foreign Raw and Waste Silk Merchants, in defence of what they considered their right to fair and equal treatment and also to the benefit of Japan's Raw Silk Trade generally, therefore unanimously adopted and signed a resolution to the effect, that they would abstain from buying the chops of the factories of Utsuhashi, Kanrasha and Shinonita until further notice.

Thus the matter stands for the present.

We may, however, mention, that so far no symptoms of ill-feeling on account of this Reereel question have disturbed the relations of the parties concerned; on the contrary, all negotiations between Japanese and Foreigners have been conducted in a perfectly calm and friendly spirit, which ought to pave the way for a speedy solution of the problem to the satisfaction of everybody interested.

In connection with the above we would like to say a few words on another matter.

We notice that in writing of Foreign Merchants interested in the Raw Silk trade of this country you are constantly using the expression "Foreign Middlemen." Although we are certainly middlemen in a wider sense of the word, standing as we do between the producer in Japan and the consumer of the silk abroad, the definition, as you put it, seems to us to be an unhappy one, being apt to convey erroneous ideas. Why not say "Foreign buyers" or "Foreign exporters?" This would be much more to the point, as even the Japanese, in speaking of us, call us shokusan, which simply means a merchant.

In reality Foreigners carrying on the silk trade here are almost entirely independent merchants, representing their own individual firms established at home, who buy silk whenever they think fit and pay for their purchases with cash down, disposing afterwards of the goods to the best of their abilities.

If in doing so, they have sometimes to suffer heavy losses through the failure of their consignees or by unfortunate market fluctuations (with the foolish gambling now going on in the local Silk Exchange the latter case happens much oftener than in former years when the market was mostly governed by inquiry and offer) they have to esteem it as special privileges inherent to their profession, privileges which they certainly will be glad to bequeath likewise to their Japanese successors should, as some would have it, these days be past.

WEIHAIWEI SCHOOL.

The fifth annual prize distribution of the above school was held at the new School House on Friday, July 26th. Mr. J. H. Stewart Lockhart, C.M.G., took the chair, and distributed the prizes, handsomely bound volumes stamped with the school coat-of-arms and motto. The weather happened to be particularly cool and fine, and a considerable number of residents and visitors were present. The function in the schoolroom was followed by aquatic and other sports, and Mrs. Stewart Lockhart presented the winners in these events with their prizes.

The school report was read by the headmaster, Mr. H. L. Beer, after which,

The Chairman in the course of some remarks contrasted the present excellent premises with those in which four years before he had distributed the prizes. He commented on the health record of the school (one case of sickness during the year and that only a bilious attack) which he said was one to be proud of. He attributed it to the excellent climate of Weihaiwei and to the school diet. Referring to the success of the institution in the Cambridge Local Examinations (four out of five candidates passing) he said it was understood that the best candidate was ploughed in spelling, but added that the latter might console himself with the reflection that he had erred in good company, for even famous authors had never been able to acquire the art. Finally he asked all present to join him in congratulating Mr. and Mrs. Beer and the staff on the general success of the school.

On the motion of Rev. A. E. Burne a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to the Chairman.

YOKOHAMA.

Mr. A. Nishikawa, an appraiser of the Yokohama Customs, has been appointed to investigate Customs business in Europe and America. He will shortly leave for abroad.

Mr. Uyeno, station-master of the Yokohama Railway Station, has been appointed to the Railway Business Office in Ryogoku, Tokyo. His successor will be Mr. K. Takatsuji, station-master of Shinjuku Station, Tokyo.

According to an official report which was received on Aug. 28th at the Yokohama Central Police Office, a foreigner named Jules Kerach, about fifty years old, who was staying at the Kaihin-in, Kamakura, has been missing since Aug. 25th, when he went out in a Japanese hinono, which he had obtained at the hotel. His hotel bill amounting to forty yen is unpaid.

At 8.20 a.m. on Aug. 28th, a young coolie employed on the steamer Kawachi Maru, which is undergoing repairs at the yard of the Yokohama Dock Co., fell to the bottom. He sustaining fatal injuries on the head and died instantly.

The damage on the Tokyo-Yokohama Railway between Kawasaki and Tsurumi is all but repaired. Traffic on the first and second lines has been resumed. The road bed of the railway is still soft. The running of the trains is being made very slowly so that in each direction the service takes one and half hours or more.

In reply to Mr. Yuasa, Chief of Police of Kanagawa Prefecture, who was instructed to make investigation as to the real circumstances of the complaints that appeared in the correspondence columns of the Japan Mail under the heading "Night Noises in Yokohama" Mr. Ikariyama, the Superintendent of the Kaga-cho Police, says in a letter dated August 28th, that on the night of August 25th, a number of sailors from the foreign warships and merchantmen were drinking at six "grog-shops" at No. 106, Yamashita-cho. As usual after being intoxicated, they were singing or playing musical instruments, but not after midnight. There were no such serious noises as to disturb the sleep of the public.

THE QUESTION OF KOREAN FINANCE.

THIS question is evidently destined to provoke some controversy in Japan. To what extent is the Japanese nation prepared to put its hand into its pocket for the purpose of completing the work which it has commenced in Korea? With the exception of the Seiyun kai, it can not be said that any of the political parties has yet assumed a definite attitude towards this problem. The Seiyun kai have identified themselves with Marquis Ito and have made it quite clear that they intend to follow him along any route he may take. The Daido Club, however, seem to be sitting on the fence, but some of them have clearly stated that Japan, considering her financial condition, ought not to involve herself in any pecuniary obligations towards a country of which she is merely the protector. As for the Progressists, they show a want of unanimity which unhappily has become an ever-present feature of their political camp. The section led by Mr. OISHI MASAMI appear to be in favour of what the Japanese call the "thick and short policy" towards Korea: that is to say, they are willing to advance a considerable sum of money at brief notice provided that it be used so as to secure commensurate political results, which means doubtless that the peninsula should become an adjunct of Japan. The other section, under the leadership of Mr. INUKAI and with the support of Count OKUMA, appear to think that while everything hitherto done by Marquis Ito has been beyond praise, his record would be greatly blotted if he attempted to insist upon Japan granting financial aid to a country whose income has such a large margin of potential increase.

So far as we can judge from journalistic indications, the attitude of the Japanese public towards this problem is likely to be divided. One section, headed by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, is for making Korea pay her own way except in the case of capital required for productive enterprises. Such capital, they think, might very well be obtained by floating bonds on terms calculated to tempt Japanese investors, but, for the rest, they would have their country follow England's policy towards her colonies; that is to say, the policy which requires that they should be self-supporting except in Imperial matters such as the building of fortifications and the supply of military and naval protection. The other section, represented by the Kokumin Shinbun, maintains that although the English Colonies are now self-supporting, their present position has been obtained in the sequel of liberal assistance from the mother country. Therefore although for purposes of industrial and commercial expansion Korea should not rely upon Japanese public money, her administrative expenses belong to a different category, and ought to be partially paid by Japan considering the position assumed by the latter towards Korea.

Meanwhile it is understood that the amount in question is not large, and that it will not exceed $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions annually, or 5 millions in all when the expenditures of the Residency-General are included. The fact is that Japan has put her hand to the plough, and that though the horses are pulling rather rapidly, she must not look back. She has to face her destiny. There can not, we venture to think, be the smallest doubt that the extraordinarily small sum now put up by the Korean nation for the purposes of the State's exchequer can be expanded to comparatively considerable dimensions. But, on the other hand, there is even less room for doubt that it would be extremely unwise on Japan's part to inaugurate her new regimen in Korea by a sensible increase of the people's fiscal burdens. She must "labour and wait"—a kind of procedure in which she has hitherto shown herself proficient.

We may mention here that according to Tokyo newspapers, Marquis Ito visited Count OKUMA on the 28th inst., and passed a large part of the day in the company of the Waseda statesman. We may also mention that Marquis Ito has declined the entertainment which the Business Men of Tokyo proposed to give in his honour. This entertainment had been postponed in consequence of the weather, and Marquis Ito now explains that in view of the damage wrought by the floods in Tokyo he is unwilling to subject the Business-Men of Tokyo to any needless expense.

THE SPY QUESTION.

WE entirely endorse the remarks of the Japan Times with regard to the Russian spy incident. In fact a very similar comment had already appeared in our own columns. No one can deny that such incidents are most regrettable, and no one can fail to sympathise with the innocent sufferers who, though no valid ground of suspicion exists against them, are subjected to inconvenience if not actual persecution. But, on the other hand, it may fairly be said that if there dwells in the breast of the Japanese any tendency to regard aliens as spies, that tendency has been largely educated by aliens themselves. Any one who can carry his memory back thirty or forty years will vividly recall the fact that, in the early days of foreign settlements in Japan, a large majority of the foreign residents believed themselves to be objects of constant espionage by agents of the Japanese Government. Many of the persons tormented by this conviction seemed to have lost all sense of proportion. It failed to occur to them that their own complete insignificance from a political or international point of view constituted the most efficient possible guarantee against anything like official espionage. Taking no account of that obvious fact, they imagined themselves surrounded by detectives, and thought that all the events of their daily career were carefully recorded in official annals. Coming down to later times, we find curiously exaggerated theories about an almost miraculously organized system of Japanese espionage which kept this country in constant possession of information most useful in time of emergency. Then we have to remember many recent examples of similar suspicions widely credited and sensationally fomented. Australia, the Philippines, Indo-China, the United States, Siberia—all these places have been the imaginary area of Japanese spying exploits, and the nations concerned have been correspondingly flustered. Is there, then, any just cause for surprise if a few Russian residents in Japan have fallen under the suspicion of the ignorant masses in the sequel of a sanguinary and shocking incident? It seems to us that sufficient account is not taken of this other side of the picture. If the Japanese sin in such matters, they have been sinned against at least as much and as frequently, and if they regard espionage as among the not very abnormal pursuits of foreigners, may we not say that they merely follow the old rule of applying to foreigners the standard by which foreigners themselves have shown a disposition to measure others? It is simply another instance of a psychical tendency which experience has rendered quite familiar, the tendency to require from Japan the constant practice of ethics which her critics themselves are only too prone to neglect. We should all be a great deal happier and the nations would enjoy much fuller assurance of peace if unreasonable and hysterical suspicions could be abolished from our moral equipment, but in the meanwhile let us at least try to remember that no one people has the monopoly of that mania.

CHOLERA.

Owing to cholera the Nippon Yusen Kaisha has decided not to take steerage passengers at Moji on any steamer.

Fourteen new cases of cholera were reported at Moji on Aug. 23rd. Since the first appearance of the disease in July, the patients numbered 128. Two of them recovered, seventy died and the remainder are still in hospital.

On Aug. 22nd, a case of cholera was reported at Hiroshima. The patient died the same day.

An official telegram says that the cholera patients who died in Shanghai during the week ending Aug. 18th numbered 384, including four Americans and Europeans and two Japanese. Cholera is also prevalent at 'uchow, where about a hundred cases are being reported every day. Eight Japanese were attacked by the disease and five died.

On Aug. 22nd, twenty-four cases of cholera were reported at Maji. On the same day, four cases of the same disease were reported in the village of East Yoshitomi, Fukuoka prefecture.

During three days ending August 26th, fourteen cases of cholera were reported at Fukuoka and thirty cases in Yamaguchi prefecture, including five at Shimonoseki.

Three cases of cholera are reported among the crew of the P. & O. steamer Namur, which arrived at Moji on Aug. 27th from Shanghai. One of the patients, who are all Indian firemen, has died. The ship has been sent to Hikoshima for the usual disinfection. The Bandmann Opera Company is aboard this ship.

THE BOOKSHELF.

As the Hague Ordains. Journal of a Russian Prisoner's Wife in Japan. New York, Henry Holt and Company; Tokyo, the Methodist Publishing House. Price yen 3.

THERE are two ways of looking at this book. One is to accept it as a genuine human document, as it, indeed, professes to be; the other is to put it down as an exceedingly smart piece of journalistic bookwork. Either viewpoint discloses to the reader a tremendously dramatic story, and particularly for any one interested in discovering the real truth regarding the private and public relations existing between Japan and Russia both before and after the outbreak of war. Ostensibly the book is made up from the journal of Madame von Theill, whose husband was captured soon after the battle of the Yalu and taken to Matsuyama, where she was allowed to join him, living in the town and going up to the military hospital every day. Twenty years before, Madame von Theill had lived in Tokyo, being the wife of a Secretary of the Russian Legation, and on the death of this gentleman she left the country never to see it again until after the declaration of war. In the interval she had married again, a Finnish nobleman, and had spent most of her time in Rome, Spain, England, the Riviera—anywhere, almost, but Russia. Her outlook on life was therefore more cosmopolitan than Russian. To such a person the Japan of the present day presented some notable contrasts to the Japan of twenty years ago, and not the least interesting parts of her journal are those passages in which she compares the present with the past. She has, too, a decided penchant for the Japanese, especially for those still pursuing the traditions of the ancien régime in the ordering of their lives and actions. Madame von Theill has nothing but words of praise for these, and her womanly intuition soon enabled her to grasp the truly magnanimous chivalry which underlay all Japan's actions in her treatment of prisoners of war. She was able from her wide experience of men and things to make many a path smooth for the prisoners which had been roughened through the over-bearing of some ill-educated petty official, and to render more easy some little restriction which an equally small-minded martinet had decreed out of pure desire to assert his brief authority. When the prisoners grumbled at their food and their surroundings she was able to contrast their happy lot with what the French prisoners suffered in Germany in 1870, or the Turks at the hands of the Russians after the fall of Plevna. All these things make up the human side of the book, but one's faith in its genuineness is rudely shaken when Lieut.-General Baron Kodama is gravely introduced as Lieut.-General Baron Higuchi; when the British Minister in Tokyo is masqueraded as a bachelor of athletic proclivities, blessed by a sister much given to hospital visiting among the Japanese and the rolling of lint bandages, and who comes upon the scene accompanied by a fair niece, a Canadian, the widow of an Italian nobleman. This young lady discovers in one of the Russian prisoners at Matsuyama an old flame of jappier years and eventually she marries him in Kyoto before the days of the Portsmouth peace arrive. If the writer of the book considered it necessary to introduce the love-interest of an ordinary novel into her work, surely it could have been done less clumsily. Besides, to our way of thinking, it was quite unnecessary. The story of the Russian prisoners at Matsuyama was sufficiently thrilling in itself. By the aid of Madame von Theill's lively journal, with its outspoken comments on everything and everybody, one can follow the course of the war from the Yalu to Mukden, can understand somewhat of the feelings of the Russian prisoners amid their totally unexpected and strange surroundings in Japan; can understand their misunderstandings, their hopes and fears as the days wore on and companion after companion from among the armies and the navy of the Tsar joined them only to tell the same miserable tale of mismanagement, unpreparedness, jealousy of commanders, retreat and defeat. All the thousand and one stories which floated about Japan at the time regarding the Russian prisoners, their ways of thought, habits of living, occasional outbreaks against discipline, etc., are all crystallised in these pages: set out in proper perspective and due correlation; also their free opinions upon their leaders from the Tsar and his immediate entourage to Alexieff, Stoessel and Rojestvensky, may be read at leisure. The occasional Japanese phrases and the Russian scattered about the book are also a rarity of the soil, so that one is almost persuaded to take the work as wholly genuine: but there is that love story of Lyov and the Canadian Contessa, and the bachelor British Minister transferred to Tokyo when the war commenced; the use of the American phrases "New Years," and "anyway" to conclude a sentence now and again; these things tend to incredulity. All the same the book is worth perusing and we are glad to hear that a Japanese translation is well under way for the Asahi Shinbun.

The Crimson Azaleas, by H. DE VERE STACPOOLE: London, Mr. Fisher Unwin.

THIS novel is slightly above the average of works dealing with Japan. The local colour is most deftly applied and there is little or no stress laid on those things which the average globe-trotter finds it necessary to commit to paper when unburdening his soul of recollections of Japan. The story deals with two strongly contrasted types of Scotsmen, Richard Leslie, a dear-do well, and Sandy M'Gourley, the very embodiment of Glasgow canniness, who somehow or other pick up a little Japanese foundling girl near Nikko and thereafter superintend her education and bringing up at Nagasaki. Leslie, before coming to Japan, had been "a remittance man," loafing about the bars of Sydney, but the entry into his life of the child Campanula brings about a great change for the good in him. M'Gourley and he enter into partnership with a Japanese curio dealer to fleece the unwary globe-trotter, but from what we can gather Leslie's share in the business is merely to put up the capital and draw the profits, M'Gourley and Danjuro attending to the sordid details, while Leslie dreams his life away in a Japanese house above the pretty fiord-like harbour of Nagasaki. The years fly quickly by and Campanula is finished with the missionary school and begins to take a hand in the ordering of Leslie's household. Insensibly a change also takes place in her feelings towards her protectors, and in their feelings towards her. M'Gourley, whom she treats as a father, falls in love with her, but being one of those inarticulate souls, never betrays his passion understandingly; while Campanula's feelings towards Leslie are those of the average maid for a man. But Leslie is too lazy and self-centred to see that Campanula is pining for his love and continues to treat her as a younger sister or pretty childish plaything. Then upon the scene appears Mrs. George du Telle, a handsome Scotswoman, who in her girlhood had been the daily companion of Richard Leslie. Indeed, he had, on reaching man's estate, proposed to her and been accepted, but parents on both sides objected and Richard "went to the devil" in Sydney. Mrs. du Telle, though married to a vulgar little man who delights in attiring his tubby figure in the loosest of checks and tweeds, is quite content with her lot, but Richard Leslie on renewing her acquaintance thinks otherwise and endeavours to make her forsake her marital vows. The rest of the story we need not disclose, for the reader should be left to find it out for himself. It is a story of conflicting temperaments, the lazy, neurotic, and unrestrained clashing with the placid, well-balanced and assured, and of course disaster comes to one of the party. Unfortunately the innocent are also involved and the tale closes with M'Gourley attending the Feast of Lanterns—the Festival of the Dead—and having a personal interest in two of the boats launched upon the evening tide. Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole wields a fluent pen and has decided gifts in characterization. He has also discovered a new way of spelling samisen—to wit chamcen, while gekkin comes out as gekko.

The Red Sphinx, by EDWARD UFFINGTON VALENTINE and S. ECCLESTON HARPER. London Mr. Fisher Unwin.

LEONORE REDWAY, the offspring of an English father and a French mother, resolves to become a great actress on the Parisian stage and despite all obstacles she leaves Chicago and settles down in the city by the Seine. Devotedly attached to her art she is perfectly oblivious of the commotion she stirs in men's bosoms and thus her progress towards fame is strewn by many painful episodes—painful for the men. One of the chief factors in her struggles is her acquaintance with a strange person named Fidus, a malformed Alsatian woodcarver, who has abnormal powers of poetic expression. He keeps a cabaret—"the Cabaret des Sept Péchés Capitaux"—and here Leonore begins her theatrical career by reciting for the mordant, degenerate proprietor a descriptive monologue entitled "The Red Sphinx." Of course she wins a tremendous reputation thereby and soon she becomes engaged to a rich young painter—the only son of millionaire restaurant proprietors—who promises to do all in his power to realize her ambitions. But Leonore is one of those temperamental beings to whom the ordinary plan of life does not conform. Her betrothed ends his own life and in so doing brings her into such notoriety that the management of the Odéon give her the rôle of Phédre to play. The summit of her ambition is reached and at the same time she discovers that she loves, and that most passionately, the strange creature Fidus—and with the discovery comes death. A powerful book, with the darker shadows painted in almost too sombre pigments.

Memories and Thoughts. Men—Books—Cities—Art. By FREDERIC HARRISON. London: Macmillan and Co.

IT is quite impossible in a short notice to convey an adequate idea of the charm of this book. Some of the articles it contains have probably already met the eyes of readers of English and American magazines. But arranged as they are in this book, they constitute a history of the impressions left on Frederic Harrison's mind by the experience of a long life. Frederic Harrison's duties as the preacher of Comtism to the English people have been so arduous that he has never been able to give himself unreservedly to literature, and he tells us that he is not cut out for playing the rôle of a litterateur. Here are his own words on the subject: "I no more pretend to be a man of letters than I pretend to be a politician. I have even less of the man of letters about me than of the politician. . . . I have always felt myself more or less of an amateur. Nor do I remember to have wasted an hour in thinking about style, or about conditions of literary success. As I have sought to teach many things, and have fought hard for many opinions, I have tried to put what I had to say as well as I could." Mr. Harrison tells us that to want to make people do something or to want to teach something is fatal to pure literature. "Literature is art, and the artist should never preach." When one peruses these lines and remembers all the literary criticism that has come from Frederic Harrison's pen, one is disposed to ask whether those who have followed literature as a profession have proved to be the best judges of literature and the best writers? Is their appreciation of the finest passages of our great authors keener than that of the members of other professions who have only turned to literature as a pastime, as a man turns to a game of billiards or to tennis? Not to mention a host of others, the cases of Lord Rosebery, Stopford Brooke and Frederic Harrison would seem to show that the very highest proficiency in literature can be reached by men who have only taken it up as a pastime or as a means of preaching to others on one subject or another. Frederic Harrison began life as a barrister. He followed the profession up to 1890 with little zest and with less ambition. For a short time he taught jurisprudence as a professor. The inheriting of a modest fortune enabled him to follow the bent of his own mind, which was to be the leading English Apostle of Comtism. In this rôle he does not pretend to have succeeded. But he has found time to study a large number of subjects that have little relation to Comtism. It is these outside studies of his that are so valued by the learned world of Europe and America. There is a cosmopolitan ring about all his writings. Frenchmen, Germans, Italians appreciate them quite as much as Englishmen and Americans. He appeals to the finer instincts of all reading men and his verdicts on men, books, systems of government, institutions, fashions and art are those of a mind of extraordinary penetration.

The book before us possesses three great merits. (1) It supplies abundant material for making a special study of the many talents of the writer. (2) It treats in a fascinating manner no less than 44 subjects, ranging from "Tobacco" and the "Jolly Girl," to "Scientific History" and the "True Cosmopolis," that is, from topics that are apparently most trivial to those that are manifestly very serious. (3) It contains passages that are perfect models of a style which in some of its characteristics is quite inimitable, being the product of Frederic Harrison's personality. The writer, the subjects he treats, the literary merits of his book—these we will take up in order in this review.

(1) The writer.—At the age of 11 Frederic Harrison went to King's College School, which he left as second in the school in 1849. Among his schoolfellows there were the sons of Charles Dickens, T. Landseer, Richard Lane, Macready the actor, Lord Westbury, the Chancellor, and Henry Parry Liddon, one of the greatest preachers of modern times. He went to Oxford in 1849, when the great controversy in theology, which shook the Church and led to the conversion of Cardinal Newman and Cardinal Manning, and many others, was passing into a new phase. At this time he was a prodigious reader. The list of works ancient and modern that he devoured, mentioned by him in the sketch of his life with which the book opens, is a very long one. He was brought up as a high Churchman, but before leaving college had given up his belief in any form of supernatural doctrine. Of this period he writes: "As the supernatural died out of my view, the natural took its place, and amply covered the same ground. The change was so gradual, and the growth of one phase of thought out of another was with me so perfectly regular, that I have never been able to fix any definite period of change, nor indeed have I ever been conscious of any real change of mind at all.* I have never known any abrupt break in mental attitude; nor have I ever felt change of belief to involve moral deterioration, loss of peace, or storms of the soul. I never parted with any belief till I had found its complement; nor did I ever look back with antipathy or contempt on the beliefs which I had outgrown." He seems to have had excellent mental training both at school and college. Neither at school or at college was he ever put through the mill. He read what he enjoyed and enjoyed what he read. From the early years of his manhood he had an antipathy to politics as a profession. "Compromise is the soul of politics," he tells us, "and personally I loathe compromise. The statesman's duty is to reckon with the opinions of the majority, and personally I feel scanty respect for the majority, and I cannot bring myself to profess it." On his adoption of Comtism, he writes:—"I was quite thirty-five before I fully absorbed the Positive system. I had been a systematic student of it for ten or twelve years before." A conversation with Comte seems to have led to his subsequent adoption of his system of philosophy, and his views on politics, history and religion.† Harrison's Oxford tutor, Richard Congreve, a pupil of Dr. Arnold of Rugby, was the first preacher of Positivism in England. Since 1890 Frederic Harrison has devoted him-

* This has been the experience of many other deep thinkers.

† It is a mistake to think that Harrison ever slavishly followed Comte. As a Comtist he is considered unorthodox by some leading Comtists. "Even now," he writes, "I am regarded by some Comtists par tang as a profane amateur, a schismatic and a Gailion."

self almost exclusively to writing, and has even given way to what some regard as senile weakness, the publication of a romance and a tragedy. He resigned the post of President of the English Comtist Committee a few years ago after 25 years' service. As a man of high culture, as a linguist, as a literary critic, as a bold thinker, as an interpreter of French thought, as a man of wide sympathy and poetic feeling, Frederic Harrison occupies a very high position in Europe and is in every way a man of whom Englishmen may well be proud.

(2) The subjects treated in "Memories and Thoughts."—The celebrities on whose careers or writings he has much that is instructive to tell us are: Tennyson, Renan, King Alfred, Cromwell, Gibbon, Carlyle, Motley, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, Thackeray, George Eliot, Ruskin and Maurice Hewlett. It is correct to say that he has achieved the difficult task of saying something new yet true about personalities concerning which so much has been written. He describes Tennyson's poems as "the poetry of intense culture, inspired by the worship of form." He writes of Tennyson:—"Down to his latest years he was constantly shaken with the enigmas of the Universe, the Infinite, Death, the petty and transitory nature of our earth. As he recognized no authoritative Revelation, Creed, or Church, all this hung over his subtle and brooding soul, and made him almost a pessimist, in spite of his resolute will to believe where we cannot prove. Such was the tone of the cultured academic mind of the first half of the nineteenth century. Tennyson lived his whole life in this atmosphere and transfigured its hopes, its doubts, its horror, and its yearnings in a series of exquisite, but depressing, descants." It is impossible in this short notice to refer however briefly to the account Frederic Harrison gives of his connection with Carlyle, George Eliot and other great minds. He says:—"No study and no books can supply the place of personal intercourse with those who know and those who lead. I am sure whole libraries would not give me what I have gained in converse with Gambetta, Mazzini, Renan, Michelet, Louis Blanc, Tourgenieff, F. Newman, G. H. Lewes, John Bright, J. Stuart Mill, Carlyle, G. Eliot, Ruskin, Cardinal Manning, John Dillon, John Burns, Spencer, Comte, John Morley and Gladstone."

The places on which Frederic Harrison writes are Chicago, London, Paris, and one or two more. The Chapters on Art discuss "Music in Great Cities," "Our Cathedrals," "Picture Exhibitions," "Nude Studies," "Ancient Masters" and other topics.

(3) The Literary Merits of the Book.—The quotation of a few short passages will best show in what a high key the whole book is pitched. Writing of Gibbon, whom he considers to be the greatest literary historian England has produced, he says:—

"The age is one of interminable specialism, colossal research, microscopic minuteness of examination; and our mountains of documents are become very Pelions upon Ossa. All this is right and necessary; and Gibbon was an accomplished specialist, a glut of research; no man so microscopic, so minute, so documentary, in the true sense and in the right way. But then Edward Gibbon was much more. His gigantic accumulation of facts and indomitable accuracy were not the ends of his labour—but the instruments. Research was to him, like grammar or scholarship, not his title to honour, but his raw material for thought and creation. He did not discharge his note books in a heap like bricks for the brickyard, and leave us to build them up into a house as we pleased. He built the house, and did not ask us to come into it till it was perfect from foundation to roof ridge, ornamented, elaborated, habitable, and pleasant to dwell in. His teeming brain disdained the ageous placidity with which Bavius flows on through one hundred mild and meandering chapters; his creative genius abhorred the rough-hewn masses of stone which year by year Mævius unloads upon us from a thousand quarries. When we grow weary of histories which are nothing but undigested note books or copies from duldest jottings of some contemporary memoir—histories without form, without mind, without imagination, without purpose, without beginning, middle, or end—when we yearn for a book—for a man, an idea within the cover, then, for the tenth or the twentieth time, we take down The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and we have one of the greatest dramas of human civilisation, rehearsed with the ordered imagination of a poet and the monumental form of a consummate master of language."

With one more brilliant passage we will close this all too inadequate review of a fascinating book: "As a statesman, the unique merit of Cromwell's government was his genius for administration, for securing efficiency in every department, for selecting the right man for every duty, for recognizing and using every kind of capacity in every department. His success in this crowning act of the statesman has perhaps never been equalled in our own history, hardly in that of Europe, unless it be by Richelieu and Frederick the Great. This plain yeoman, who had tilled his farmstead until past 40 years, stepped forth into public life, made himself a thorough soldier, created a consummate army, decided a tremendous civil war, conquered two neighbouring kingdoms, guided a national revolution, stemmed it back by organizing a solid conservative government, chose as his deputies the most capable soldiers, seamen, governors, diplomatists, financiers, lawyers, ministers and publicists who could be found to serve the Commonwealth, and in five years he had formed the strongest government in Europe, and had made his country the leading Power in the world."

"In what we call opportunism (that is, the instinct of the statesman to change his tactics under circumstances and to seize the occasion of the hour) Cromwell has rarely been equalled by any man in all recorded history. His note as a born statesman is the union of matchless audacity with inexhaustible wariness. No great man so brave and so daring was ever so untiringly prudent and watchful. In his whole career Cromwell never met with a single disaster, either in war or in government. . . . In the broadest sense he gave us modern England. . . . It was Cromwell who in the evolution of the English nation made our subsequent history possible." W.D.

YOKOHAMA'S WATER FAMINE.

In an interview with the representative of the Japan Mail, Mr. H. Doi, chief secretary of the Yokohama Water Works, said that the damage sustained by the main pipe along the river Dosu, which is the source of the water supply, was quite as serious as first stated. At Benten-no-shita, 160 yards of the main was moved from its original position by landslides. The joints of the pipe were all torn off and opened. At Mitsugaki, similar damage was caused to the piping for about forty yards and the mains fell down the cliff side. Some eighty yards of the pipe were thrown into the valley by a land slide. Early on the morning of Aug. 25th, Dr. Hara, chief civil engineer, went to the scene in company with his staff and a number of workmen. They are now repairing the damage, using reserve pipes left in the vicinity. Dr. Hara, according to his report to the Water Works states that the work is difficult on account of the hills and the constant rains. The repairs will take at least ten days. The secretary of the Water Works further said that the water now in the reservoir will be insufficient to supply Yokohama for five days longer.

At 1 p.m. on Aug. 25th, the councillors of the city and the active committee of the Water Works met at the office at Noge-yama. They discussed the question of the water supply, but no decision was come to, inasmuch as the repairs at the source are not completed.

The Yokohama Water Supply Co., and the Seisen Water Co. propose to carry water from Tokyo to Yokohama, their assistance having been invoked by the Yokohama Water Works, the water to be sold to the citizens at a certain price. The two companies are said to be able to transport about four hundred tons each a day.

Eight hundred tons, which are supposed to be conveyed from Tokyo, are equivalent to about 220,000 gallons. This supply is of course insufficient as compared with the usual demand which aggregates six million gallons on the average per day in the summer season.

It may be remarked that owing to the poor supply of the Water Works, the Yokohama Electric Light Co. and the Yokohama Electric Railway Co. have curtailed their working capacity. In future, should the supply of fresh water be entirely stopped, these companies will be compelled also to stop their business.

Reviewing all these facts it would seem that the residents of this large city are face to face with a water famine, because the supply to be brought from Tokyo is quite inadequate to meet its demands. It is to be earnestly hoped that the authorities will be able to reduce the time which it is estimated the repairs will occupy.

The water famine in Yokohama is becoming serious. As already reported, Dr. Hara, chief civil engineer of the City, who is now at the scene of the breakdown, said that the repairs would take at least ten days from Aug. 26th. According to later information, the operations are being much impeded and at some sections entirely stopped by continued heavy rains which cause further landslides and floods. Consequently the work of repair will take longer than was previously estimated. The proposal that two companies should bring water from Tokyo has not come to anything as yet, as negotiations between them and the Tokyo Water Works authorities have not been settled. The Yokohama Water Works are bringing water by boat from Nakamura. The water is being distributed free to the public at the bridges on the creeks. The average daily quantity available is about 120 tons, which is equivalent to about 23,000 gallons. Most of the inhabitants therefore resort to different means of catching the rain water which is now rather welcome. The city councillors and the officials of the Water Works held a meeting on the afternoon of Aug. 27th and considered the best means of supplying water. On this subject, no definite conclusion was arrived at. They decided, however, that the present space of time (1½ hours) for supplying water daily should be shortened to one hour or less in accordance with the discretion of the Water Works and that thus the period during which the present stock of water can be doled out may be prolonged. It is said that even by this means, the present quantity of water in the reservoir cannot last five days.

Mr. James P. Mollison on Aug. 27th sent a letter to the Kaga-cho Police office, in his capacity of chairman of the Fire Insurance Association, enquiring as to the contingency of fire occurring.

All the police offices of Yokohama, we learn, are paying close attention to this matter and have issued urgent warnings to local firemen to observe special care both by day and night, and have employed an additional number of men as assistant patrolmen. Fire patrols are now on duty on the Bluff and in the Settlement. Preparations for drawing water from the creeks in case of fire are completed. Mr. Ikariyama, Superintendent of the Kaga-cho Station, states that Yamashita-cho or any locality adjoining the sea or the creeks is tolerably safe. The firemen, however, will endeavour, in places distant from the sea or creeks to destroy the building affected as soon as an outbreak occurs so as to avoid the spreading of the flames.

Damage, not of a severe nature, has been caused at the source of the Tokyo Water Works owing to the storm. Repairs were at once made. The expense is estimated at about ten thousand yen.

The quantity of water now remaining in the Yokohama reservoir is about 600,000 gallons, which is only 10 per cent. of the water supplied in ordinary days. As is stated in our advertisement columns, the water will be distributed to the public at Yoshidamachi, Ogimachi, and at a place near the Bluff Police Office. The authorities of the Water Works say that the supply will be finished within five days and that the water is muddy and is not quite safe for health. There is a question why the Water Works' authorities did not add a suggestion in the advertisement as to the safety of public health. In an interview with the representative of the Japan Mail, Mr. Doi, secretary of the Yokohama Water Works, asked him to publish a statement that the water should be boiled before being used for potable purposes. This official further said that the repairs will be completed by Sept. 5th or earlier if the weather is favourable. The work on Aug. 27th was considerably impeded owing to the heavy rain. Also as appears in our advertisement columns, water will be distributed free to the public at certain places near Maeta-bashi and ten other bridges. The quantity is said by the authorities of the Water Works to be about four hundred tons, viz two hundred tons from the spring at Nakamura and two hundred tons from the Tokyo Water Works, and of course, with such a poor supply, the inhabitants of Yokohama are suffering from a water famine.

The number of wells in Yokohama is as follows:—

Jurisdiction of police office.	Number of wells	Population.	Number of persons per one well.
Isezaki.....	59	49,124	830
Tobe.....	47-9	59,594	127
Kotabuki.....	250	57,521	230
Kaga-cho.....	38	13,540	350
Bluff.....	165	34,708	210
Kanagawa.....	568	25,095	440

Besides the foregoing, there are a number of other wells—96 in Isezaki police jurisdiction; 156 in Tobe; 220 in Kotabuki; 41 in Kaga-cho; and 148 in Kanagawa, which are all unavailable for drinking purposes but can be used in case of fire.

The race course of the Keihin Keiba Club, at Kawasaki escaped the floods. The pavilion and other buildings are safe.

WELL POISONING.

It is a well-vouched for fact—that many of our readers will hesitate to give it credence—that a well on the Bluff placed by its owner at the disposal of his less fortunate neighbours during the present serious conditions, was deliberately poisoned early on Thursday morning by means of carbolic acid or some form of that agent. Mr. E. Kildoyle, of No. 34 Nakamura, who owns a well supplied by a rich spring of excellent water, has, since the present famine began, allowed every one requiring water to enter his grounds and take his or her turn at the well head. Up till a little after midnight on Thursday morning there was a string of applicants, which gradually thinned off. When at daybreak on Thursday a servant of the house drew a bucketful of water she found it necessary to call attention to the peculiar odour and on careful inspection it was ascertained that the water was milky in appearance and smelt strongly of carbolic acid. The result is that for at least 24 hours this valuable source of supply will be unavailable to those who had come to rely on it and upon the generosity of its owner. The police authorities are in action with regard to the case and it is to be hoped that they will not merely detect the perpetrator of this outrage but also take steps to prevent such acts in the future. Of the motives actuating such a deed it is hardly possible to write with moderation. The responsibility is now with the authorities to assign the guilt to the actual culprit.

On the same morning a well in West Tobe was found to have been doctored with kerosene oil. In this case, it is said that the owners of the well, who reside in the neighbourhood, have refused to give the water to persons from other places. Similar outrages are reported from other districts.

The Yokohama City Office has purchased about 15,000 patent fire extinguishers from the Chuo-Shokai, Tokyo, and distributed them among various police stations and police boxes of Yokohama.

According to the Yokohama Water Works, an excellent water fall has been discovered in Mita in the village of Misawa, Tsukui district, about seven miles on this side of the River Doshi, on the main pipe road of the Water Works. On the afternoon of Aug. 28th, the main pipe was extended to the water fall, and water has since been carried to the reservoir on Noge-yama. The supply amounts to two hundred thousand gallons per day and night. As the pressure of the water is weak, the supply of a further quantity is impossible. The water is now being distributed among the public in accordance with the arrangement notified in the last advertisement of the Water Works. In an interview with the representative of the Japan Mail, Mr. N. Mitsuhashi, Mayor of Yokohama, said that Dr. Hara, the chief civil engineer and his staff, are attending to the repairs at the water source. They intend to complete the work before Sept. 5th despite any change of weather. In reply to a suggestion as to the pitiful condition of poor families consisting of old and very young persons who are quite unable to carry water from distant points, the Mayor expressed his profound regret, and said that if there were such cases, the city office was willing to assist them by sending coolies. This treatment would be extended also to foreigners. For example, there were two or three poor old Chinamen who were unable to search about for water, consequently the water was being supplied to them by the Kaga-cho police. As to anxiety with regard to fire, the Mayor said that the municipality are doing their best to provide against the occurrence of any accident. Finally he asked the interviewer to convey his sincere sympathy to the readers of this journal, at the inconveniences that have arisen as the result of the storm.

It is interesting in this connection to read the following, which appears in the San Francisco Chronicle of Aug. 5th, and has reference to the future action of the new Board of Supervisors of that city:—

All the members of the new Board speak of the matter of the donation to Spring Valley in tones which might be termed distant. But one of them said last night:

"Instead of rehabilitating Spring Valley, it seems to me that a better plan would be to start work at once on a series of pumping plants for an auxiliary salt water fire protection system. Parts of such a system would become available for use as they were completed and could be relied upon before the completion of a reservoir on the Twin Peaks. This would accomplish two purposes: It would give immediate relief in the matter of fire protection and the reduction of insurance rates and it would relieve the strain on the Spring Valley system, of which we have heard so much of late. But personally I do not believe that we are anywhere so near a water famine as we have been led to believe."

MARS AND HIS CANALS.

The recent close approach of the planet Mars to the earth has re-started the discussion as to the real meaning of the strange markings on its surface. Are they really canals? Many intelligent folk, headed by Mr. Percival Lowell, are firmly convinced that they are, and declare that their presence demonstrates that the ruddy planet is inhabited. Those who hold this view, however, have probably to a certain extent been misled by a word, remarks the writer of Echoes of Science in the Globe. Canals are artificial things, and the work of men. If, therefore, Mars has canals it must have intelligent inhabitants. But to call certain phenomena seen on the surface of the planet "canals" is, in a manner, to beg the question. And the word "canal" is really a mis-translation of the term applied to them by their discoverer, the Italian astronomer, Schiaparelli. The darker regions on the surface of the planet were supposed to be oceans, and Schiaparelli discovered that these were connected by comparatively narrow streaks. These he named canals, that is channels, a word which implies no theory. This being erroneously translated canal, the word itself lends some colour to the idea that the phenomena are artificial, and implies the existence of intelligent inhabitants. Among those who contend that the Martian channels indicate intelligent inhabitants none are more positive than the well-known American astronomer and specialist on Mars, Mr. Lowell of the Observatory, Flagstaff, Arizona. In his recent observations this astronomer finds confirmation of his previous views. The spring melting of the South Polar ice cap has been very favourably.

observed. Dark lines have been seen proceeding from the melting area to the extreme southern "canals," and show, Mr. Lowell contends, that these are dependent on the water thus let loose for their origin and office. In other words, it may be presumed, they are of the nature of drains dug by the inhabitants for their own protection against the floods from the melting ice. And the strongest argument for the existence of these inhabitants is founded on the regularity of the "canals." Other astronomers, however, have seen them differently. Professor Barnard, for example, of the Yerkes Observatory, with the aid of powerful telescopes, sees a wealth of irregularity where Lowell only sees straight lines. And if the "canals" are not straight the most convincing argument for their artificial nature is destroyed. Considering the possibility of intelligent inhabitants on Mars from another point of view, we may note that in the planetary evolution Mars has passed the present stage of earth history, and approaches that of the moon. The ice-caps at the Poles are much more extensive than ours. Three months ago, the South Polar cap came down to latitude 40°, which corresponds to Spain and South Italy. And then there is the question of atmosphere. Dr. Johnstone Stoney, in his paper on "Atmospheres Upon Planets and Satellites," has applied his arguments to Mars. He calculates that vapour of water with a density of 9 cannot remain on this planet. In this case the Polar caps would be solidified carbonic acid gas, and not ice. And without water there could be no vegetation. In the absence of the latter, again, there would be little free oxygen. Hence it is suggested that the atmosphere of Mars is mainly nitrogen, argon, and carbonic acid gas. And this latter part of the atmosphere, being heavier, would remain near the ground. The fogs and snows formed by the liquefaction and solidification of this constituent might account for some of the appearances seen on Mars. With regard to the "canals," again, it may be noted that Prof. Pickering has seen similar pseudo-canals on the moon. And as showing how the eye can be deceived in such matters, the experience of the astronomer Cerulli may be quoted. After observing the "canals" of Mars for two years through a telescope, he was able to see similar lines on the moon through an opera-glass. If Mars were nearer, of if a more powerful telescope could be used, the "canals" might resolve themselves into definite natural phenomena. For it is to be remembered, that even when it is at its nearest, Mars is still 140 times as distant as the moon!

THE INFRINGEMENT OF BRITISH TRADE MARKS IN CHINA.

The North-China Daily News of Aug. 20th states that the following is a free translation of a Proclamation recently issued by His Honour Taotai Jui Cheng on the subject of British Trade Marks:—

I, Jui Cheng, the Taotai of Shanghai, etc., do hereby issue this Proclamation for the information of the public that H. B. M. Consul-General, Sir P. L. Warren, has written me to the effect that he has repeatedly received complaints from British merchants in regard to Chinese manufacturing and retailing certain qualities of English-made goods, purporting same to be manufactured by those factories, for which they (the British merchants) are the sole agents. This is a great detriment to the British interests. The quality of the goods which are imitated according to English patterns is very poor and of great difference, although the packing, colour, pattern and chop are quite similar to those of English-make. Therefore when the Chinese are charged with copying patterns he generally denies the charge by pointing out the slight difference of patterns between the two kinds of goods. This is a very intolerable business competition in the market. Recently such malpractice is daily increasing, and, therefore, litigation on this question will keep on increasing also. As such would more or less strain the commercial relations of the two countries, he requests me to prohibit further copying of patterns by Chinese people. The Chinese Chamber of Commerce, upon being notified of this matter, has replied that such prohibition is the right step taken for commercial protection, and asks to be informed of the different patterns which are most frequently being copied in order to co-operate in the prohibition. In compliance with my request the British Consul-General has furnished me with a list of the cigarettes manufactured by the British-American Tobacco Co., Ltd., and also a list of the soap for which Messrs. A. R. Burkill and Sons are the sole agents; these two articles are more often manufactured by the native according to their patterns. The Consul-General says that he has on several occasions called the attention of the Viceroy of Nanking to this matter, and, moreover, he requests me to issue this Proclamation to be posted everywhere to prohibit further imitation of English-made goods. The Chamber of Commerce having been asked to observe this order, I hereby warn the general public that henceforth such malpractice on the part of our people should once and for all be stopped. Anyone found to be violating this law, will be punished without leniency.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Forty hours travelling between Karuizawa and Yokohama is the record for the season we imagine. The gentleman who accomplished it reached Yokohama on Wednesday evening.

The trial of eighteen persons who are charged with having planned to assassinate the Tsar began on Aug. 20th, at a Court Martial in St. Petersburg of which Lieut.-General Mubish is president.

The Tokyo Hydraulic Power Electric Light Co., which was promoted in the spring of this year, held a general meeting on Aug. 28th. The shareholders decided to wind up the association.

Notice is given that the period of flash which is exhibited from Shirasu Lighthouse south-westward of Aino-shima, western entrance to Shimonoseki Strait, will become temporarily irregular, on and after August 26th, 1907, owing to the examination of its revolving machinery.

Mr. Pierpont Morgan has again scored a success in acquiring the fruits of the intellect of Europe during the middle ages. This time he figures as a bibliophile, and the book is the MSS. "Contes" of Queen Marguerite of Navarre, of which the learned world had for long lost all traces.

It is reported by an official telegram that on Aug. 21st, the German Empress sustained a slight injury while playing tennis at Wilhelmshöhe. Her condition is satisfactory. The Emperor and Empress of Japan, on Aug. 24th, sent a telegram to the Imperial German Court enquiring as to Her Majesty's health.

M. Odelin, the Vicar-General of the city of Paris, according to the Gentleman, is noted for his dry humour. The other day at a dinner, someone asked him whether he knew M. Richard, President of the Divorce Court. "He is my great opponent," said M. Odelin; "he undoes all I do, and I am afraid he is as busy as I am!"

A foreigner (whose name is reported by Tokyo papers to be Mr. Carl Mathew) was arrested on Aug. 28th at Nagasaki on a charge of having photographed the suburbs of the city. After examination at the police office, it was ascertained that he was a new comer and quite ignorant of the fortification zone. He was at once acquitted, but his negatives were all confiscated.

An accident occurred at noon on Monday, Aug. 26th in Main Street, Yokohama. A carriage belonging to Messrs Durand, Cobb and Co., occupied by a foreign lady, a guest at one of the hotels of Yokohama, collided with an electric light post at the corner of Messrs Lane, Crawford and Co.'s, one of the wheels being practically caught by the pole. The result was that the betio was thrown from his seat, and the two horses broke the harness and galloped off.

They ran through Main street and Odawara-cho and thence to the Bund, and were caught in front of the Time Ball Station. The betio was slightly injured. The occupant of the carriage was uninjured.

Exeter Hall finally closed its doors on July 19th as the headquarters in the United Kingdom and the metropolis of evangelistic effort and missionary enterprise. The day had been observed as a day of prayer, and in the evening addresses were delivered testifying to what the hall had stood for—in missions, as an open door of sympathy to young men coming to London, as the champion of religious freedom, as the foe of oppression in all lands, and as the mouthpiece of the British conscience.

Two cases of diphtheria are reported on the Manchuria, which arrived at Yokohama on Aug. 24th from San Francisco, the patients being two children, one seven years of age and the other one year, of a steerage passenger named Hsieh-chu. The ship entered the inner harbour on Sunday on account of the heavy weather. The younger of the patients has died and the result was reported on Aug. 26th to the Harbour Police Office. The usual disinfecting measures were carried out by the Yokohama Sanitary authorities. The elder patient was removed to the Chinese Hospital at Nakamura in Yokohama.

The Navy, the official organ of the American Naval League, raises a doubt whether the United States can be considered to rank as a second naval Power in view of the faulty construction of several of its heaviest battleships. Dealing specifically and technically with the Kearsarge and Kentucky, the Navy holds that they would be an easy prey to hostile vessels because their enormous turret ports expose the gun mechanism to instant wreck by even a one-pound rapid-fire gun. The Navy also attacks the new ships as being deficient in water-line armour protection and speed. The Navy Department admits that mistakes were made in the construction of the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, but these have been corrected in later designs, and, all things considered, the Department holds American battleships equal to those of any other Power.

General Baron Nishi, Inspector-General of Military Instruction in Japan, gave a dinner at Berlin on July 18th to which many Japanese and German officers were invited. General Nishi said that 40 years ago when Japan desired to adopt modern methods she had sought a model among European States, and had finally decided to follow the lead of Germany, to whose teaching she had been faithful for the last 20 years. Since those early days Japan had had occasion several times to test the edge of her sword, and it could be said without exaggeration that that sword had been a credit to its German teachers, to whom Japan offered her sincere thanks. General Nishi expressed the hope that in the future, too, his country would take lessons from Europe, and notably from Germany, and thus grow from youth to manhood. The speaker concluded by calling for cheers for the Emperor and the German Army.

The terrible disasters in submarines which have occurred from time to time in both British and French navies lead special interest to a new invention by Commander Hull, inspecting commander of submarines, and Staff-Surgeon Oswald Rees of H. M. S. Mercury. When through an accident, a sudden inrush of water prevents the submarine from rising, the problem is a threefold one (1) to save the crew from poisonous gases generated by salt water reaching the electrical storage batteries; (2) to save the crew from drowning, and (3) to enable them to escape and reach the surface. The new apparatus consists of a kind of helmet, containing a special substance called "oxylythe" which enables the air within the apparatus to be breathed over and over again. When the crew has escaped to the surface (there are special arrangements for opening the hatch of the conning tower in all circumstances) the helmets act as life buoys until help arrives. A demonstration of the apparatus has been given in London with good success.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHRISTIAN APOLOGISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—So long as the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan persists in drawing the red herring athwart the track of the contention which I originally advanced, so long shall I guide him from the erring path lest a too confiding public be led astray.

I gather from the somewhat oracular utterances in his last epistle that he scorns my argument and persists in affirming that the truth of Christianity is independent of history. If he does not know that this proposition involves a petitio principii he is not equipped for a serious discussion of this nature. If he does know, then he is sadly wanting in candour.

He has not denied and cannot deny, that Christianity is a union of ethics with doctrine. I shall presently deal with the ethics. In the meantime I shall only say that the existence of ethics is a relative truth which in no way establishes the truth of Christian doctrine, as the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan very well knows. This Christian doctrine explicitly states that God gave his only begotten son as a sacrifice for humanity, that he was born of the Virgin Mary, was crucified and rose from the dead on the third day. Furthermore this doctrine teaches that all this is attested by the existence of the Gospels and other scriptures and by the miraculous events therein related. This is the essence of Christianity and if your correspondent faithfully believes it to be true it can only be on the ground of its historicity. Revelation must be historically true, otherwise it is not truth.

There is no connection whatever between this proposition and the appeal to reason in man, though its origin is lost in the speechless past. I can only describe such tactics as juggling with analogy, a favourite trick with mystery-mongers since the beginning of history. It might equally be held that as reason has evolved from humble beginnings, so Christianity has developed from the inchoate legends and moral maxims of a hoary antiquity. But if the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan faithfully believes the above statement of Christian doctrine, there is no occasion to appeal to analogy (save the mark!) as if he needed a backdoor of escape from an embarrassing position. Holding firmly to the historical truth of Christ's life, teaching and miracles there would be no necessity to decry the value of history as he has done, nor to attempt to divert the discussion from the question of its fundamental truth to that of its relative ethical truth. Safe in his unassailable fortress of truth there would be no advantage in blowing up its buttresses to facilitate retreat.

Your correspondent is now changing his position. I showed that to deny the essential utility of history was to destroy all hope of revelation and he now explains that he did not mean to, "neither can my reference to Locke be twisted to mean that I have tried to show that Locke set no value on history as a source of historic truth." "Twisted to mean!" His words were:—"Locke, in his great essay on the understanding shows clearly that historical propositions do not properly constitute knowledge at all." Why should he introduce Locke and try to impose the above meaning in the face of Locke's explicit language, which I quoted in my last letter? Was it not to disparage history in view of the criticism which rests upon it? Had I not exposed this attempt, the public would have gathered that historical criticism could not affect the truth and he ought to know that to hoodwink the unlearned is a poor rôle for a Christian pastor.

Though he denies disparagement of the "history of Christianity as a witness to its usefulness," he still speaks of the "minor consideration of the historicity of the personal Christ." Does he not believe the Apostles creed? If so how can the historicity of Christ be a "minor consideration"? How can the truth of the sayings and miracles of Jesus be a minor consideration? When he quotes from these logs is it a minor consideration whether or no they were ever uttered? It is on the contrary a fundamental necessity to prove the historical truth of the gospel narratives and no polemical device can make it otherwise. The only logical position is that proof of the fundamental miracles, i.e. the Virgin birth and Resurrection are absolutely essential in order to establish the Divinity of Jesus Christ. This is fully admitted by the church authority and to call it a minor consideration "is to dissent seriously from the standard of Christian orthodoxy."

The misrepresentations of my position and the sneering references to the authorities whom I have mentioned show not only piteous ignorance of the problem but the unscrupulous rancour of the ad hominem theologian. "Abuse the plaintiff's attorney" is a well worn maxim for the losing side. Confident in his "authorities" the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan says that I do not "hesitate to place the opinion of a second rate German rationalist who discredits the genuineness of Paul's four Epistles." It is quite evident that your correspondent has not read the work referred to, but no contemptibly applied to Professor van Manen, of Leyden University, will diminish the force of his criticism. If the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan will turn to the article "Paul" in the Encyclopædia Biblica, edited by his "prince of scholarship" the Rev. Professor Canon Cheyne, he will find the main argument given by Professor van Manen. Surely Canon Cheyne, the editor, must rejoice at finding himself associated in this work with a "second rate German rationalist." I demur to the statement that the "historical question becomes an appeal to the highest scholarship." Authority, which your correspondent parades in a generic way without condescending to particulars, is merely of value in indicating the path along which research must tread in all matters of controversy. The specialist states his results and it devolves upon J. Ingram Bryan to use his brains to weigh the evidence thus presented. If he does not choose to do so he is denied all right to sneer at the critic. I emphatically protest against his petulant characterization of this great scholar and his critical work. Criticism is progressive. It began with the elimination of many scriptures during the early centuries which are now regarded as apocryphal; it eliminated the Gospel of John, and reduced the credibility of Matthew, Luke and the Acts to an insignificant degree. The Rev. J. Ingram Bryan surely knows this. He has not attempted to deny it. Why does he seek to hide it? When F. Baur wrote, this criticism had not extended to the Epistles of "Paul." Now they are in turn attacked and it is the duty of the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan to meet the argument of this critic whose work is edited by the Rev. Canon Cheyne. I pass by the animus of his remark that "Truth Seeker's" attempt to use the names of such unquestioned scholars as Driver and Cheyne, as aids to discredit Christianity, is evidence of a peculiar bias that may well be buried under anonymity," but I shall only say that I quoted them verbally, and am not responsible for their opinions. Even Paul W. Schmiedel, Professor of New Testament Exegesis in Zurich, and the Rev. Dr. Abbott, who writes for him in the same work edited by Cheyne, though believing in Jesus as a "completely human being, and that the divine is to be sought in him only in the form in which it is capable of being found in a man" (Ency. Bib. "Gospels" par. 139) says:—

1. "The alleged situations in which the recorded utterances of Jesus were spoken, can by no means be implicitly accepted. (par. 134.)

2. Several of the reported sayings of Jesus clearly bear the impress of a time which he did not live to see." (par. 136.)

3. Some doubt as to the accuracy of the accounts cannot fail to arise in the mind even of the stoutest believer in miracles when he observes such points as the following. . . . The conclusion is inevitable that even the one evangelist whose story in any particular case involves less of the supernatural than that of the others, is still very far from being entitled on that account to claim implicit acceptance of his narrative. (par. 137.)

4. It is unnecessary to enter more fully into the almost incredible variations in the accounts of what happened at the sepulchre after what has already been said" (par. 138.)

In the same work the Rev. Professor A. B. Bruce D.D., in his article on Jesus, while expressing the opinion that "he was the child of his time and people," says that even the Synoptics (Matthew, Mark and Luke) "from a critical point of view are not of equal value nor do the contents of any one of them possess a uniform degree of historic probability." While such doubts exist within the church and such destructive criticism without it as I have abundantly shown (but will advance further proof if necessary) how can the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan dare to speak of high authorities supporting the Divinity of Jesus Christ? He has conspicuously failed to give the slightest proof of the divinity of Christ and no proof that would stand a moment's consideration in any court of law, that such a person ever existed. The testimony of Paul is of no value whatever, till his writings have been authenticated. Clement stands in the same position, as I shall prove if required. In any case the ignorant credulity (of which there are several instances) of a person writing in the 2nd century A.D. concerning events which are supposed to have happened more than half a century previously, does not fit him to be a witness of even hearsay testimony. That the reference in Josephus to which your correspondent refers is a pure interpolation is not questioned by any impartial critic and is obvious on the face of it. The reference to Pliny shows that a Christian sect existed about the beginning of the 2nd century, which every one already knows. That they worshipped a Messiah, or Christ has no necessary bearing on the historicity of Jesus in face of the fact that there were many such and that there was abundant time for the Gentile cult of the Messiah or Christ to have reached individually by the end of the first century A.D.

The Rev. J. Ingram Bryan has falsified my remarks, probably in the confusion of intellect consequent upon this exposure of his exegetical blunders. At least I shall not give him credit for deliberate falsehood. I have not "denied that Christ ever lived." I explicitly stated that there may have been such a man and a good man too, but that the evidence was not sufficient to prove it, while on the other hand the prior existence of Mithraism and other cults having a close resemblance to Christian doctrine suggested an evolution from some such source. I will even go farther and state my opinion that some of the logoi seem to have proceeded from an individual. But I emphatically say that one ought not to rest upon such a slender foundation, if such it be, a belief that this was the only begotten son of God, born of a virgin, who, after performing various miracles, rose from the dead and ascended into heaven. I say that in the face of modern criticism, the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan has no conceivable ground for the statement that the Gospels "show every evidence of a truthful record of facts." They have been proved to lie under the gravest suspicion of being untrustworthy. If your correspondent did not know this he would surely not say that the essence of Christianity, its raison d'être, its revelation to man, is a point of "minor importance." To say that "the very fact that the New Testament does not agree in every detail, and that discrepancies exist, proves that these writings could not have been the work of collaborators of an after age" is sheer nonsense. No one has said that all the collaborators were contemporary and that they concocted these writings together in a committee room for the confusion of humanity. On the contrary there is every evidence that they were compiled from various sources at various times and no suspicion need rest on them of more than ignorance and credulity. The instance furnished by the Rev. J. Ingram Bryan when he gave out to the world that Christ died under Augustus Caesar and that Livy had testified to him will prove how even a conscientious man might unwittingly give rise to a myth in an ignorant and superstitious age.

I should have liked to discuss the question of Christian ethics, but have already encroached too much on your space. I shall only repeat that Christianity has not only not created ethics but has not monopolised it. In the records of Babylon, Egypt and Mexico, in the Rig Veda, the Zoroastrian and Buddhist scriptures and the writings of Confucius and his disciples the plan of moral conduct differs little, or not at all, from that of the New Testament. Has Christianity more of a beneficent influence over its adherents than has Buddhism? I greatly doubt it. If we admit a more robust type we must also admit greater crime and misery. It may be said that if God did not suffer at the hands of humanity, there is no harm done. But think of the Jews! Think of the obloquy, the ostracism, the horrific suffering inflicted upon this gifted people for nearly two thousand years! Is it not time for fair minded people to confess that a blunder has occurred and to cry, Halt!

But if the story of the slain God be untrue, there can be no question that the belief in a Friend of Man, tender, true, and brave, whether founded on fact or imagination, has had an uplifting influence on humanity. Despite the lack of historical proof it may be that, as like draws to like, the narratives of loving kindness have expanded or cohered around a personal teacher whose individuality has thereby been merged in the significant title of Jesus or Christ. Whether, in a poetic sense, a personality has thus been sacrificed to the higher purpose of creating an ethical ideal, or whether this ideal of manhood is purely as synthesis of the nobler human perceptions, is indeed of minor importance. The salient fact is that humanity has raised this ideal for a beacon to "shine before men" and has striven, without some success, to live according to its light. That this and other ethical ideals have been evolved, not in the days of modern enlightenment but amid surroundings of barbarism and even savagery, is to me a fact of momentous importance. Call it if you like the "Immanent God," better still, the "Immanent Good"; it exists, it is here. It constitutes, as I have already said, the refutation of pessimism and the triumphant vindication of human existence.

Yours, etc.

REV. J. I. BRYAN'S "LAST WORD."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—You will remember that at the beginning of June last Mr. Bryan attracted special notice to himself by the untrue and insolent things that he penned in reference to Agnosticism. Agnostics were according to him immoral, dishonest men with very low ideals, whose creed he briefly described as that of the ox. To this abuse I replied in two longish letters. In one of these Mr. Bryan was asked to show wherein the superiority of the special form of Christianity in which he believes consists. He neither told us clearly what is his own creed, nor did he attempt to give an intelligible definition of what Christianity, in his conception, is Dr. Greene, who knows what he is writing about, informs us that Christianity seems to him incapable of being defined. He himself does not venture to define it. He also says that there is not being absolutely new in it. Now, Sir, what will strike all logical thinkers in connection with this subject is this. How is it possible to declare that the Christian ideal is superior to all other ideals known to scholars when we do not know what that ideal is? The fact is that Dr. Greene is right in thinking that Modern Christianity is a mixture of all sorts of elements. The Christian system of doctrine is in the course of history received hundreds of accretions. As to what is essential and what accidental in the creed as it exists to-day, theologians and scholars differ. Truth and error are inseparably mixed in all human institutions and systems, and it is extremely rare to find anybody who has looked into the subject maintaining that Christianity has been invariably on the side of truth. We all know that too often the opposite has been the case. We reach the conclusion that the subject is a complicated one, and that Mr. Bryan, instead of making things clear has hopelessly muddled them. In his controversy with "Truth Seeker" he has suffered defeat all along the line. Mr. Bryan is quite incapable of stating an issue clearly and keeping to it. He has meandered off to a hundred subjects not connected with Agnosticism or Christianity. He lives in a world of his own and we leave him there to pass his days in the self-assurance which his clerical life has developed to an abnormal degree. With apologies to your readers for another "Last Word."

I am, yours, &c.

NIGHT NOISES IN YOKOHAMA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I would be most grateful if you will have the extreme kindness to allow me the use of your paper to protest against the noise which is carried on, sometimes the whole night, in some of the streets of the settlement.

Why the local police are so tolerant must really be a matter of astonishment to any one living in the neighbourhood of those "Grog-shops" where females attired in European dress manage to retain their guests very often until sunrise. Placing one's self on the ground of neighbourship only, things appear to have now come to an untenable position which calls for prompt action on the part of those who are entrusted with the enforcement of police regulations.

Thanking you in anticipation.

I remain, Dear Sir, Yours faithfully.

TRAINING NOTES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The sporting community are under obligations to you for the frequent publication of the above, being more in accord with their feelings than long discursive correspondence on agnosticism, etc.

It is a pity, however, your contributor "Carbine" is not more accurate in his occasional dissertations regarding the breeding of Australian horses. I passed over some discrepancies appearing the other day thinking that it might be captious to call attention to what was evidently only repeated from memory, but in this morning's issue of your paper appears the statement that the famous horse Carbine had a sire for his dam—a matter that cannot be passed over without protest. It is said it is a wise child that knows its own father, but a very ordinary one should know its own mother, and for that reason I am surprised that "Carbine" should not be aware that the dam of his namesake was Mersey. The only race horse Australia has known as Carnage was a colt that won the Melbourne Derby in 1893, 5 years after Carbine had failed in the same race.

Again, your correspondent styles Trenton as half brother to Carbine. They were certainly both by the same size, Musket, but in racing parlance that does not constitute the relationship named. They had different dams, Carbine's being Mersey, as stated before, and Trenton's being Frailty. Amongst the progeny left by Trenton no mention is made by your correspondent of two mares sired by that great horse, both in my opinion superior to those chronicled by him. I refer to Wakeful and Lady Trenton, the former certainly one of the very best racing mares Australia has produced, and both of them winners of Sydney Cups. Lady Trenton was subsequently dam of Strata Florida (one of the highest priced yearlings ever sold in Australia) and Lord Cardigan, winner of Melbourne Cup 1903, in which race Wakeful with 10 stone, was second.

I am, Sir, Yours etc.

DEForestation.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—If the industrial enterprise of the French capitalists who have just arrived in Japan is to take the form of that of another French Syndicate now occupied in ruthlessly cutting down the timber in South-Western Kyushu, I fervently hope the prediction of the Mainichi Shunpo as to the difficulty to be encountered in carrying out their ideas will be realised. In spite of the warnings afforded by the floods in the neighbourhood of Nikko and other parts of the country where the hills have been denuded of their trees, the apathy of the authorities on this very important question is incredible. Deforestation is not an industry; it is a form of vandalism that in all probability ultimately leads to the ruin of existing industries as the late havoc in the silk districts amply testifies. But the subject has frequently been dealt with in your columns; this is not another cry from a tree lover and one who has the best interests of the country at heart.

Yours truly,

Aug. 28th, 1907.

THE WATER FAMINE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—About the water supply as promised by the Mayor of Yokohama City, by advertisement in your columns on 25th and 26th instants, et seq.; the water was to be turned on every morning from 5 to 6.30. Everybody was ready and waiting in the districts of Kitagata and Honmoku-machi, morning after morning, they waited patiently, but no water was forthcoming. It is a pity, in fact, that certain districts, namely, the top of Jizozaka and down Sakura-michi, had every morning, an ample supply of water. This seems the more curious as there is a special main for Kitagata and beyond under Hei's Hill. Through the medium of your valuable columns, I would like to draw the attention of the responsible authorities to the unfortunate omission to supply water to one district in the City, while another had water to throw away!

Yours truly,

ONE SUFFERER.

THE REAL QUESTIONS UNDER THE JAPANESE TRAVEL AND THE SAN FRANCISCO SCHOOL BOARD RESOLUTION.

[BY THE HON. ELIHU ROOT IN THE "AMERICAN JOURNAL OF INTERNATIONAL LAW."]

In opening this meeting of the American Society of International Law, which I hope will be the first of many meetings in unbroken succession to continue long after we personally have ceased to take part in affairs, let me welcome you to the beginning of your labors for a more thorough understanding of this important and fascinating subject. It is impossible that the human mind should be addressed to questions better worth its noblest efforts, offering a greater opportunity for usefulness in the exercise of its powers, or more full of historical and contemporary interest, than in the field of international rights and duties. The change in theory and practice of government which has marked the century since the establishment of the American Union has shifted the determination of great questions of domestic national policy from a few rulers in each country to the great body of the people, who render the ultimate decision under all modern constitutional governments. Coincident with that change the practice of diplomacy has ceased to be a mystery confined to a few learned men who strive to give effect to the wishes of personal rulers, and has become a representative function answering to the opinions and the will of the multitude of citizens, who themselves create the relations between states and determine the issues of friendship and estrangement, of peace and war. Under the new system there are many dangers from which the old system was free. The rules and customs which the experience of centuries had shown to be essential to the maintenance of peace and good understanding between nations have little weight with the new popular masters of diplomacy; the precedents and agreements of opinion which have carried so great a part of the rights and duties of nations toward each other beyond the pale of discussion are but little understood. The education of public opinion, which should lead the sovereign people in each country to understand the definite limitations upon national rights and the full scope and responsibility of national duties, has only just begun. Information, understanding, leadership of opinion in these matters, so vital to wise judgment and right action in international affairs, are much needed. This society may serve as a collegium, in the true sense of the word, in which all who choose to seek a broader knowledge of the law that governs the affairs of nations may give each to the other the incitement of earnest and faithful study and may give to the great body of our countrymen a clearer view of their international rights and responsibilities.

I shall detain you from the interesting programme of instruction and discussion which has been arranged for this meeting only by trying to illustrate the kind of service that the society may render, in a few remarks intended to clear away a somewhat widespread popular misapprehension regarding a question arising under a treaty of the United States.

The treaty of November 22, 1894, between the United States and Japan provided, in the first article:

"The citizens or subjects of each of the two high contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, travel, or reside in any part of the territory of the other contracting party, and shall enjoy full and perfect protection for their persons and property."

"In whatever relates to rights of residence and travel; to the possession of goods and effects of any kind; to the succession to personal estate, by will or otherwise, and the disposal of property of any sort and in any manner whatsoever which they may lawfully acquire, the citizens or subjects of each contracting party shall enjoy in the territories of the other the same privileges, liberties, and rights, and shall be subject to no higher imposts or charges in these respects than native citizens or subjects or citizens or subjects of the most favored nation."

The constitution of the state of California provides, in article 9:

"Section 1. A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement."

"Sec. 5. The legislature shall provide for a system of common schools, by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in every year, after the first year in which a school has been established."

"Sec. 6. The public school system shall include primary and grammar schools, and such high schools, evening schools, normal schools and technical schools as may be established by the legislature, or by municipal or district authority. The entire revenue derived from the state school fund and from the general state school tax shall be applied exclusively to the support of the primary and grammar schools."

The statutes of California establish the public school system required by the constitution. They provide that the state comptroller must each year estimate the amount necessary to raise the sum of seven dollars for each census child between the ages of five and seventeen years in the said state of California, which shall be the amount necessary to be raised by ad valorem tax for school purposes during the year."

The statutes further provide that the board of education of San Francisco shall have authority "to establish and enforce all necessary rules and regulations for the government and efficiency of the schools [in that city] and for the carrying into effect the school system; to remedy truancy; and to compel attendance at school of children between the ages of six and fourteen years, who may be found idle in public places during school hours."

The statutes further provide, in section 1662 of the school law:

"Every school, unless otherwise provided by law, must be open for the admission of all children between six and twenty-one years of age residing in the district, and the board of school trustees, or city board of education, have power to admit adults and children not residing in the district, whenever good reasons exist therefor. Trustees shall have the power to exclude children of filthy or vicious habits, or children suffering from contagious or infectious diseases, and also to establish separate schools for Indian children and for children of Mongolian or Chinese descent. When such separate schools are established, Indian, Chinese, or Mongolian children must not be admitted into any other school."

On the 11th of October, 1906, the board of education of San Francisco adopted a resolution in these words:

"Resolved: That in accordance with Article X, section 1662, of the school law of California, principals are hereby directed to send all Chinese, Japanese, or Korean children to the Oriental Public School, situated on the south side of Clay street, between Powell and Mason streets, on and after Monday, October 15, 1906."

The school system thus provided school privileges for all resident children, whether citizen or alien; all resident children were included in the basis for estimating the amount to be raised by taxation for school purposes; the fund for the support of the school was raised by general taxation upon all property of resident aliens as well as of citizens; and all resident children, whether of aliens or of citizens, were liable to be compelled to attend the schools. So that, under the resolution of the board of education, the children of resident aliens of all other nationalities were freely admitted to the schools of the city in the neighborhood of their homes, while the children of Indians, Chinese and Japanese were excluded from those schools, and were not only deprived of education unless they consented to go to the special oriental school on Clay street, but were liable to be forcibly compelled to go to that particular school.

After the passage of this resolution, admission to the ordinary primary schools of San Francisco was denied to Japanese children, and thereupon the government of Japan made representations to the government of the United States that inasmuch as the children of residents who were citizens of all other foreign countries were freely admitted to the schools, the citizens of Japan residing in the United States were, by that exclusion, denied the same privileges, liberties, and rights relating to the right of residence which were accorded to the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. The questions thus raised were promptly presented by the government of the United States to the federal court in California, and also to the state court of California, in appropriate legal proceedings. The matter has been happily disposed of without proceeding to judgment in either case; but in the meantime there was much excited discussion of the subject in the newspapers and in public meetings and in private conversation.

It is a pleasure to be able to say that never for a moment was there as between the government of the United States and the government of Japan, the slightest departure from perfect good temper, mutual confidence, and kindly consideration; and that no sooner had the views and purposes of the governments of the United States, the state of California, and the city of San Francisco been explained by each to the other than entire harmony and good understanding resulted, with a common desire to exercise the powers vested in each, for the common good of the whole country, of the state, and of the city.

The excitement has now subsided, so that it may be useful to consider what the question really was, not because it is necessary for the purposes of that particular case, but because of its bearing upon cases which may arise in the future under the application of the treaty-making power of the United States to other matters and in other parts of the national domain.

It is obvious that three distinct questions were raised by the claim originating with Japan and presented by our national government to the courts of San Francisco. The first and second were merely questions of construction of the treaty. Was the right to attend the primary schools a right, liberty, or privilege of residence? and, if so, was the limitation of Japanese children to the oriental school and their exclusion from the ordinary schools deprivation of that right, liberty or privilege? These questions of construction, and especially the second, are by no means free from doubt; but as they concern only the meaning of a particular clause in a particular treaty they are not of permanent importance, and, the particular occasion for their consideration having passed, they need not now be discussed.

The other question was whether, if the treaty had the meaning which the government of Japan ascribed to it, the government of the United States had the constitutional power to make such a treaty agreement with a foreign nation which should be superior to and controlling upon the laws of the state of California. A correct understanding of that question is of the utmost importance not merely as regards the state of California, but as regards all states and all citizens of the Union.

There was a very general misapprehension of what this treaty really undertook to do. It was assumed that in making and asserting the validity of the treaty of 1894 the United States was asserting the right to compel the state of California to admit Japanese children to its schools. No such question was involved. That treaty did not, by any possible construction, assert the authority of the United States to compel any state to maintain public schools, or to extend the privileges of its public schools to Japanese children or to the children of any alien residents. The treaty did assert the right of the United States, by treaty, to assure to the citizens of a foreign nation residing in American territory equality of treatment with the citizens of other foreign nations, so that if any state chooses to extend privileges to alien residents as well as to citizen residents, the state will be forbidden by the obligation of the treaty to discriminate against the resident citizens of the particular country with which the treaty is made and will be forbidden to deny to them the privileges which it grants to the citizens of other foreign countries. The effect of such a treaty, in respect of education, is not positive and compulsory; it is negative and prohibitory. It is not a requirement that the state shall furnish education; it is a prohibition against discrimination when the state does choose to furnish education. It leaves every state free to have public schools or not, as it chooses, but it says to every state: "If you provide a system of education which includes alien children, you must not exclude these particular alien children."

It has been widely asserted or assumed that this treaty provision and its enforcement involved some question of state's rights. There was and is no question of state's rights involved, unless it be the question which was settled by the adoption of the constitution.

This will be apparent upon considering the propositions which I will now state:

1. The people of the United States, by the constitution of 1787, vested the whole treaty-making power in the national government. They provided: "The president shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur." (Art. II, sec. 2.)

"No state shall enter into any treaty, Alliance or confederation; * * * No state shall, without the consent of congress, * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power." (Art. I, sec. 10.)

"This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." (Art. VI.)

Legislative power is distributed: upon some subjects the national legislature has authority; upon other subjects the state legislature has authority. Judicial power is distributed: in some cases the federal courts have jurisdiction, in other cases the state courts have jurisdiction. Executive power is distributed: in some fields the national executive is to act; in other fields the state executive is to act. The treaty-making power is not distributed; it is all vested in the national government; no part of it is vested in or reserved to the states. In international affairs there are no states; there is but one nation, acting in direct relation to and representation of every citizen in every state. Every treaty made under the authority of the United States is made by the national government, as the direct and sole representative of every citizen of the United States residing in California equally with every citizen of the United States residing elsewhere. It is, of course, conceivable that, under pretense of exercising the treaty-making power, the president and senate might attempt to make provisions regarding matters which are not proper subjects of international agreement, and which would be only a colorable—not a real—exercise of the treaty-making power; but so far as the real exercise of the power goes, there can be no question of state rights, because the constitution itself, in the most explicit terms, has precluded the existence of any such question.

2. Although there are no express limitations upon the treaty-making power granted to the national government, there are certain implied limitations arising from the nature of our government and from other provisions of the constitution; but those implied limitations do not in the slightest degree touch the making of treaty provisions relating to the treatment of aliens within our territory.

In the case of Geoffroy v. Riggs, which, in 1889, sustained the rights of French citizens under the treaty of 1800 to take and hold real and personal property in contravention of the common law and statutes of the state of Maryland, the supreme court of the United States said:

"That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations is clear. * * * The treaty power, as expressed in the constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government itself and of that of the states. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the government, or in that of one of the states, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter without its consent. But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."

3. Reciprocal agreements between nations regarding the treatment which the citizens of each nation shall receive in the territory of the other nation are among the most familiar, ordinary and unquestioned exercises of the treaty-making power. To secure the citizens of one's country against discriminatory laws and discriminatory administration in the foreign countries where they may travel or trade or reside is, and always has been, one of the chief objects of treaty making, and such provisions always have been reciprocal.

During the entire history of the United States provisions of this description have been included in our treaties of friendship, commerce and navigation with practically all the other nations of the world. Such provisions had been from time immemorial the subject of treaty agreements among the nations of Europe before American independence; and the power to make such provisions was exercised without question by the Continental Congress in the treaties which it made prior to the adoption of our constitution. The treaty of 1778 with France, made between the Most Christian King and the thirteen United States of North America by name, contained such provisions. So did the treaty of 1782 between Their High Mightinesses the States-General of the United Netherlands and the thirteen United States of America by name.

The treaty of 1785, with Prussia, ratified by the Continental Congress on the 17th of May, 1786, contained an exercise of the same kind of power. Mr. Bancroft Davis summarizes the provisions of this character in the Prussian treaty in these words:

"The favored nation clause put Russia on the best footing in the ports of Charleston, Boston, Philadelphia and New York, no matter what the legislatures of South Carolina, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, or New York might say. Aliens were permitted to hold personal property and dispose of it by testament, donation, or otherwise, and the exaction of state dues in excess of those exacted from citizens of the state in like cases was forbidden. The right was secured to aliens to frequent the coasts of each and all the states, and to reside and trade there. Resident aliens were assured against state legislation to prevent the exercise of liberty of conscience and the performance of religious worship; and when dying, they were guaranteed the right of decent burial and undisturbed rest for their bodies."

It is not open to doubt that when the delegates of these thirteen states conferred the power to make treaties upon the new national government in the broadest possible terms and without any words of limitation, the subjects about which they themselves had been making the treaties then in force were included in the power.

The treaty of July 28, 1868, between the United States and China—the celebrated Burlingame treaty—contained, in the sixth article, a provision in the very words of the Japanese treaty. That article provided:

"Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States, shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation."

In the case of Tiburcio Parrot (6 Sawyer, 368) the circuit court of the United States said, Mr. Justice Sawyer reading the opinion:

"As to the point whether the provision in question is within the treaty-making power, I have as little doubt as upon the point already discussed. Among all civilized nations, in modern times at least, the treaty-making power has been accustomed to determine the terms and conditions upon which the subjects of the parties to the treaty shall reside in the respective countries, and the treaty-making power is conferred by the Constitution in unlimited terms. Besides, the authorities cited on the first point fully cover and determine this question. If the treaty-making power is authorized to determine what foreigners shall be permitted to come into and reside within the country, and who shall be excluded, it must have the power generally to determine and prescribe upon what terms and conditions such as are admitted shall be permitted to remain."

And regarding the same treaty the supreme court of the United States remarked, in the case of Baldwin v. Franks (120 U. S. 679):

"That the United States have power under the constitution to provide for the punishment of those who are guilty of depriving Chinese subjects of any of the rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions guaranteed to them by this treaty we do not doubt."

4. It has been settled for more than a century that the fact that a treaty provision would interfere with or annul the laws of a state as to the aliens concerning whom the provision is made, is no impeachment of the treaty's authority.

The very words of the constitution, that the judges in every state shall be bound by a treaty "any thing in the constitution or law of any state to the contrary notwithstanding," necessarily imply an expectation that some treaties will be made in contravention of laws of the states. Far from the treaty-making power being limited by state laws, its scope is entirely independent of those laws; and whenever it deals with the same subject, if inconsistent with the law, it annuls the law. This is true as to any laws of the states, whether the legislative authority under which they are passed is concurrent with that of congress, or exclusive of that of congress.

In the case of Ware v. Hylton the supreme court of the United States, in the year 1796, considered the effect under the Constitution of the treaty of peace with England of 1783, which provided that creditors on either side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money, of all bona fide debts, theretofore contracted, as against a law of the state of Virginia which confiscated to the state of Virginia the debts due from its citizens to British subjects.

The court said:

"There can be no limitation on the power of the people of the United States. By their authority, the state constitutions were made, and by their authority the constitution of the United States was established; and they had the power to change or abolish the state constitutions, or to make them yield to the general government and to treaties made by their authority. A treaty cannot be the supreme law of the land—that is, of all the United States—if any act of a state legislature can stand in its way. If the constitution of a state (which is the fundamental law of the state, and paramount to its legislature) must give way to a treaty and fall before it, can it be questioned whether the less power, an act of the state legislature, must not be prostrate? It is the declared will of the people of the United States that every treaty made by the authority of the United States shall be superior to the constitution and laws of any individual state; and their will alone is to decide."

"Four things are apparent on a view of this sixth article of the national constitution: 1st. That it is retrospective, and is to be considered in the same light as if the constitution had been established before the making of the treaty of 1783. 2d. That the constitution or laws of any of the states, so far as either of them shall be found contrary to that treaty, are by force of the said article prostrate before the treaty. 3d. That, consequently, the treaty of 1783 has superior power to the legislature of any state, because no legislature of any state has any kind of power over the constitution, which was its creator. 4th. That it is the declared duty of the state judges to determine any constitution or laws of any state contrary to that treaty (or any other), made under the authority of the United States, null and void. National or federal judges are bound by duty and oath to the same conduct."

In the case of Fairfax v. Hunter, in 1812, Mr. Justice Story delivering the opinion, the supreme court of the United States sustained the title of a British subject, under the provisions of the treaty of 1794, in direct contravention of the law of the state of Virginia. In the case of Chirac v. Chirac, in 1817, Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion, the supreme court of the United States sustained the title of a French subject to real estate in Maryland, in direct contravention of the laws of that state. A long line of cases have followed in the supreme court applying the provisions of various treaties and maintaining without exception the unvarying rule that the state statute falls before the treaty.

It equally appears from these cases that the treaty provisions which were sustained by the supreme court and the state laws which were declared void, so far as they conflicted with a treaty, related to matters regarding which congress had no power to legislate but upon which, in the distribution of legislative powers under the constitution, the states, and the states alone, had power to legislate.

5. Since the rights, privileges, and immunities, both of person and property, to be accorded to foreigners in our country and to our citizens in foreign countries are a proper subject of treaty provision and within the limits of the treaty-making power, and since such rights, privileges, and immunities may be given by treaty in contravention of the laws of any state, it follows of necessity that the treaty-making power alone has authority to determine what those rights, privileges, and immunities shall be. No state can set up its laws as against the grant of any particular right, privilege, or immunity any more than against the grant of any other right, privilege, or immunity. No state can say a treaty may grant to alien residents equality of treatment as to property but not as to education, or as to the exercise of religion and as to burial but not as to education or as to education but not as to property or religion. That would be substituting the mere will of the state for the judgment of the president and senate in exercising a power committed to them and prohibited to the states by the constitution.

There was, therefore, no real question of power arising under this Japanese treaty and no question of state rights.

There were, however, questions of policy, questions of national interest and of state interests, arising under the administration of the treaty and regarding the application of its provisions to the conditions existing on the Pacific coast.

In the distribution of powers under our composite system of government the people of San Francisco had three sets of interests committed to three different sets of officers—their special interest as citizens of the principal city and commercial port of the Pacific coast represented by the city government of San Francisco; their interest in common with all the people of the state of California represented by the governor and legislature at Sacramento; and their interests in common with all the people of the United States represented by the national government at three Washington. Each one of these three different governmental agencies had authority to do certain things relating to the treatment of Japanese residents in San Francisco. These three interests could not be really in conflict; for the best interest of the whole country is always the true interest of every state and city, and the protection of the interests of every locality in the country is always the true interest of the nation. There was, however, a supposed or apparent clashing of interests, and to do away with this, conference, communication, comparison of views, explanation of policy and purpose were necessary. Many thoughtless and some mischievous persons have spoken and written regarding these conferences and communications as if they were the parleying and compromise of enemies. On the contrary, they were an example of the way in which the public business ought always to be conducted; so that the different public officers respectively charged with the performance of duties affecting the same subject-matter may work together in furtherance of the same public policy and with a common purpose for the good of the whole country and every part of the country. Such a concert of action with such a purpose was established by the conferences and communications between the national authorities and the authorities of California and San Francisco which followed the passage of the board of education resolution.

There was one great and serious question underlying the whole subject which made all questions of construction and of scope and of effect of the treaty itself—all questions as to whether the claims of Japan were well founded or not; all questions as to whether the resolution of the school board was valid or not—seem temporary and comparatively unimportant. It was not a question of war with Japan. All the foolish talk about war was purely sensational and imaginative. There was never even friction between the two governments. The question was, What state of feeling would be created between the great body of the people of the United States and the great body of the people of Japan as a result of the treatment given to the Japanese in this country?

What was to be the effect upon that proud, sensitive, highly civilized people across the Pacific, of the discourtesy, insult, imputations of inferiority and abuse aimed at them in the columns of American newspapers and from the platforms of American public meetings? What would be the effect upon our own people of the responses that natural resentment for such treatment would elicit from the Japanese?

The first article of the first treaty Japan ever made with a western power provided:

"There shall be a perfect, permanent, and universal peace and a sincere and cordial amity between the United States of America on the one part, and the empire of Japan on the other part, and between their people respectively, without exception of persons or places."

Under that treaty, which bore the signature of Matthew Calbraith Perry, we introduced Japan to the world of western civilization. We had always been proud of her wonderful development—proud of the genius of the race that in a single generation adapted an ancient feudal system of the far East to the most advanced standards of modern Europe and America. The friendship between the two nations had been peculiar and close. Was the declaration of that treaty to be set aside? At Kurihama, in Japan, stands a monument to Commodore Perry, raised by the Japanese in grateful appreciation, upon the site where he landed and opened negotiations for the treaty. Was that monument henceforth to represent dislike and resentment? Were the two peoples to face each other across the Pacific in future years with angry and resentful feelings? All this was inevitable if the process which seemed to have begun was to continue, and the government of the United States looked with the greatest solicitude upon the possibility that the process might continue.

It is hard for democracy to learn the responsibilities of its power; but the people now, not governments, make friendship or dislike, sympathy or discord, peace or war, between nations. In this modern day, through the columns of the myriad press and messages flashing over countless wires, multitude calls to multitude across boundaries and oceans in courtesy or insult, in amity or in defiance. Foreign offices and ambassadors and ministers no longer keep or break the peace, but the conduct of each people toward every other. The people who permit themselves to treat the people of other countries with discourtesy and insult are surely sowing the wind to reap the whirlwind, for a world of sullen and revengeful hatred can never be a world of peace. Against such a feeling treaties are waste paper and diplomacy the empty routine of idle form. The great question which overshadowed all discussion of the treaty of 1894 was the question: Are the people of the United States about to break friendship with the people of Japan? That question, I believe, has been happily answered in the negative.

FOR A BETTER UNDERSTANDING BETWEEN THE EAST AND THE WEST.

BY BARON KANEKO KENTARO.

In the troublesome path of bringing about a better understanding between the East and the West, there are two obstacles standing out with more emphasis than others: One the religious prejudices of different peoples and the other is what is known as the race problem. I have always looked upon the religious prejudices as perhaps the gravest barrier between the races of the East and the West. My eighteen months' stay in the United States, however, during the Russo-Japan war, gave me a new idea. I was happy enough to be admitted into intimate association with a large number of people of affairs in America who are leaders of thought, men of affairs commercially and otherwise.

My association with this class of Americans resulted in the conviction that, so far as the religious horizon of the people of the United States is concerned, it was very broad indeed. The consensus of opinions of religious circles of America is based upon the lofty and broad principles of charity, and is distinguished with tolerance surprising to the outsider.

In fact, I found that the prevailing sentiment of the religious American was strongly in favor of our country, not at all prejudiced against us because of creed, and what is more, in some cases, it was even decidedly prejudiced in our favor. Thus I had the pleasure of throwing away from my mind the fears that I had entertained for many years, arising from the difference of religious cults as a potent factor in wrecking the worthy efforts for the consummation of which all of us are longing—of bringing about as complete an understanding as possible between the East and the West.

On the other hand I discovered, I regret to say, a new difficulty, after all as grave as the religious prejudice. From year to year the misunderstandings which arise from the difference of blood gain force, and at this time they have come to assume the serious proportions of an international menace.

In the United States, while the amalgamation of the Anglo-Saxon and the Teutonic races seems to have brought about a very happy result, the distance between these two races (I mean the Anglo-Saxon and the Teutonic races) and the Latin races seems to be not a whit closer than it was in the days of old. The fact has a pertinent significance to us, read in the light of these days, when the public opinion of the United States has begun to tell abroad. It has widened its influence over the seas, and with the growth of its prestige and actual sovereign power over the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines it has come to wield a powerful influence in the domain of the Far East.

The same may be said of Great Britain, Germany and France. They are exceedingly active in extending their spheres of influence into Africa and the East, so are coming into close touch with alien races. The chancelleries of the great powers of the world to-day seem, in fact, to show a strong penchant in the occupation of the tropical domain. In their programme of mastering tropical domains, however, they have changed tactics; they used to dispatch their religious teachers as a herald of their onset. To-day they do not do so. In order to bring these barbarous or semi-civilized races under their influence, the great powers depend almost altogether on the military or money powers, or both. Their ambition is created with money and sword.

One of the serious problems which is engaging the energy and time of American and European men and scholars to-day is whether or not the European and American races can occupy African and Oriental territories in the tropics, and occupy them permanently, and as a corollary they are looking into the question as to whether the African and Oriental races can establish their own institutions, develop them to the level of those in the civilized states, and maintain themselves independently.

Not long ago a learned book was published. It was written by one of the students of international politics on the control of the tropics. It is surprising to note what a very wide attention among the statesmen and scholars of the West it claimed, an incident which goes far to show the extent and interest of the West in such matters. It was just at this point of time that the world saw the opening and progress of the Russo-Japan war. The war commented plainly on the ability and the spirit of the Nippon race in maintaining and defending its vested rights, and in the conduct of a great military campaign, and this it was that gave the Western powers a somewhat exaggerated dread of what it may be able to do. They have come to the conclusion, the chancelleries of the West, that here is one race at least in the Far East with all the necessary, and in fact more than necessary endowment in not only maintaining itself against all comers, but with the power and ambition of extending its domain and influence abroad; thoroughly competent to occupy the territories, not only in the Far East, but in the tropic regions. And this conviction was the father of a new emphasis which is now being put on the racial question throughout the world, bearing especially on the differences of the Western and Eastern races. So it came to pass that Europe, which of old used to tame the Far East through their honeyed words of religious propaganda, has, all of a sudden, changed its tactics completely, and to-day is active in assuming a somewhat hostile attitude, which we see expressing itself through many measures, either barring out the Far Eastern races from their own domain, or carrying out drastic measures in openly fighting their interests. This phase of the anti-Oriental movement on the part of the Western races is a matter which ought to claim our most serious attention.

While this anti-Oriental sentiment has been carefully fostered in attaining its surprising growth, it is plainly seen that the differences between the different countries of Europe and America are coming together into a common household, with more or less success, with more or less appreciation of each other. Indeed there are many prominent leaders of thought and politics both in Europe and America who are straining their efforts and marshaling their powerful influences, and bringing about a consummation of a better understanding between the European and American races.

Chief among these, according to the current reports of the day, are his Majesty the Kaiser and the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt. Germany has already created a chair at the Berlin University, and distinguished it with the name of the Roosevelt chair. She invited professors from the United States to come over and lecture to the German students on the conditions and events of the United States. The Columbia University of New York has dispatched one of its professors to fill this German chair created by the Kaiser, and his lectures are on the Constitution of the United States and popular rights in America.

In response to the kindly initiative of the German Emperor, Columbia University has created the Kaiser Wilhelm chair. It invites a German scholar to fill it, in much the same manner as the German University invites an American professor. Professor Schumacher, of Bonn University, filled the chair and lectured in New York on commercial and industrial Germany, and the Americans who have had the pleasure of listening to him are loud in commending the special advantages which accrue from this series of lectures.

Now this exchange of scholarly men between the United States and Germany is an admirable effort to sweep away the somewhat unpleasant misunderstanding which has for many years clouded the prospect of bringing about a thorough understanding between the two peoples, and there is no doubt but this will prove to be one of the most efficient measures to attain the end.

Italy lost no time in following this good example; at once she established in the city of Rome a chair for an American professor. Through him Italy wishes to learn more intimately of the different affairs of the United States. At the same time the United States promptly returned the courtesy and showed her appreciation of this effort on the part of Italy, and went about creating chairs in different American universities for scholars and artists from Italy to instruct American students in Italian art and in the more modern developments of Italian civilization. Perhaps one of the reasons which induced Italy to take this measure of encouraging a more intimate friendship between herself and the United States was occasioned by the desire of nullifying the effect of an unfortunate misunderstanding which arose from an unhappy complication in New Orleans, where a certain number of Italians were murdered by Americans. The world knows how, at the time, the Italian Ambassador closed his Embassy in Washington and returned home. Ever since the friendly relation between the two countries has always been under a cloud, and this effort in establishing a sort of scholarly alliance between Italy and the United States is hoped to sweep away the last shadow, if such still remain, resulting from the unfortunate incident of many years ago, and thus call this scholarly entente to the assistance of diplomacy.

England followed suit: Mr. Moseley is the originator of what is known as the Moseley Educational Commission. Through the liberality of this wealthy citizen of Great Britain, five hundred educators were dispatched to the United States from Great Britain for special investigation along commercial, industrial and educational lines. Mr. Moseley defrayed all expenses incurred by the commission, and the results seem to have produced more than the expected advantage.

This seems to me a golden hour. The leading powers of Europe and America are assiduous in bringing about this scholarly alliance between them. It is to be heartily hoped that our Imperial land may not fail to appreciate the significance of the opportunity which is facing her to-day. Nothing is more gracious and profitable than the exchange of ideas; of knowledge, of experiences; nothing would do quite as much in making our race closer to another as to enlighten it on the conditions of the other race. It is one of the pressing duties and necessities of the State. That, at least, is my conviction. It is highly important that many of the races' differences, so difficult to understand, and which are arising almost every day, should be thoroughly investigated, and, if possible, explained and reconciled. Who shall say that such efforts as this should be neglected by one desirous of friendly relations among the powers. The time is here when the racial question is dictating the foreign policy of the great powers of the world. It is the racial question that is either to develop the friendly relation between the nations of the East and the West or utterly break it.

For that reason it is my opinion that we should follow the admirable example of America and Germany in the matter of scholarly understanding between the nations. It all means let us encourage a movement which should result in the exchange of lecturers between the universities of Europe and America on the one hand, and, on the other, those at home. Last year an English university invited Dr. Kikuchi to lecture upon the educational system of our country. Our universities ought to seize upon this opportunity at once, and should return the compliment by inviting a scholar from England to teach our countrymen of the institutions and condition of affairs in Great Britain.

This measure is doubly profitable: Our people can learn at first hand and from a competent authority the affairs of a foreign country in which we are interested, and at the same time we can take an effective step toward the establishment of an international friendship.

Indeed, we have with us in our midst Professor Ladd, from Yale University. He came over to our country at his own initiative, and he is responding now to the invitation of a number of schools all over the country, lecturing to them on the educational development, systems and institutions in his country.

Such is exactly the work that I would hail with enthusiasm. His personal efforts are giving us an opening by which we may profit very largely. We should extend the sphere of his activity, we should enlarge the scope of the work so auspiciously begun by Professor Ladd.

Last year, at the time I was leaving the United States, Mr. Green, the secretary of Harvard University, wrote me and said that there was a movement afoot among Americans for creating a special chair to invite a scholar from Japan to lecture to Americans on the history of Japanese civilization, and especially on the transition and development of the political and social Japan of the modern date. If there be found among the people of Nippon those who are willing to endorse this movement and bear a portion of the expenditure in connection with such programme, he suggested that Harvard University would at once establish such a chair, supported by joint contributions of both the American and Japanese friends, and thus create a friendly chair between Harvard University and Japan by constantly having in their midst a Japanese scholar filling the chair thus created. He asked me if I would not take an interest in this matter and do what I could for its success.

I have no doubt but that, if I may be happy enough to find a number of wealthy men in Nippon who are willing to bare a portion of the expenditure connected with the creation and support of this chair, we may have the pleasure of seeing in Harvard University a chair devoted to the study of Japanese history and institutions.

The foreign nation as I have pointed out, is anxious, on her own initiative, to know more about the history and present condition of our country. We cannot do less than return the compliment of this very kindly desire on the part of our friends, and on our part should at once take an active step in inaugurating such measures as would result in the establishment of a chair at our own university devoted to the study of the history, industry, education and other affairs of our neighbors, taught by scholars from abroad. Nothing in my judgment would be more gracious than this intellectual alliance. Nothing would unangle more effectively the sad knots of misunderstanding which are resulting from racial differences and racial prejudices. Nothing would work so well in smoothing a path of friendly relation between the nations as this move.

In short, I look upon to-day as a golden age, in which we may be permitted to bring about a scholarly alliance between the East and the West, which of necessity would inaugurate a better day of friendly relations between the powers.—The Independent.

KOREAN DEVILS AND CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES.

By DAVID KELLY LAMHUTH IN THE "INDEPENDENT."

Three religions nominally occupy Korea: Confucianism, Buddhism and Shamanism, which is a polite name for the worship of devils; but Confucianism, a code of ethics rather than a religion, has left the way open to a simultaneous practice of demon-worship, while Korean Buddhism has largely degenerated into the Shamanism about it. "From the hour of his birth until the spirit leaves his body," says one missionary, "the Korean is surrounded and tormented by innumerable evil spirits"; while another declares that the "only real religion of Korea is the worship of every sort of evil spirit." "So full are they of superstition," comments a third, "that it takes much time and effort for them to understand the simplest truths." In such an atmosphere what more natural than that the missionaries, who live in closest intimacy with the people, and isolated from the daily contact with Western forms of thought, should imperceptibly be wrought upon not only by the persistent fear and belief of the unchristian populace, but also by the exaggerated tendency toward demonology inbred through ages into those who are now converts to Christianity, who cannot out of hand brush off a lifelong habit of mind? An examination of the facts shows that the missionaries in Korea display a sense of the presence of evil spirits markedly in excess of that manifested in other countries where demonology has no such popular hold. The spirit-saturated air has with insidious power waked in the missionaries all the dormant demonology with which the Christian religion was at one time furnished forth.

The quotations which follow are, with one exception, taken from printed articles or public addresses, and only in two cases are more than one statement taken from the same source, so that they represent authoritative deliverances and cover an extended field.

A peculiar sense of the presence of an evil spirit is evidenced thus:

"In a country where the evil spirit is so dominant and so tangible, one comes to a vital sensation of his presence."

"Certainly I am more conscious of the real presence of the devil in Korea than in America. Many of the missionaries have been acutely conscious of his palpable presence in the very room with them."

"The consciousness of a real personal devil is as vivid as the sense of God's presence, though infinitely removed in kind. In Korea you feel him in the atmosphere."

More important testimony is offered in the evidences of belief in possession by devils, a belief that has fastened with a peculiar and tenacious grip upon the people of Korea, so that one writer calls the country "the haunted house among the nations, afflicted with the delirium tremens of paganism." "The Christians, too, says one missionary, "hold to the possession by evil spirits." "Demoniac possession in that country," says another, "becomes a thing too evident to doubt." "Thousands of people," says a third, "are slaves to evil spirits, in bondage to His Satanic Majesty (sic)." While another describes a woman, "possessed of many devils," and still another tells of "miracles performed, the crazy made of sound mind, the devil-possessed set free."

"At the services was a young man, demonically possessed, made dumb by his indwelling spirit for three years. After long prayer and a command to depart, it left him and he began to read aloud."

Another was "a man with every symptom of demoniac possession, in whom, upon catching sight of the preacher, the demons began to rave." Again, prayer brought "a marked change over the demoniac." He slept that night, the first for many days, and in a vision saw that God had "driven the evil spirits out of his heart and home." Again:

"Five years this woman had been a sorceress, practicing her devilish magic upon all whom she could find. The instant she lay down at her home her muscles contracted, her hands clinched and her eyes set, and the devil would say to her, 'Why do you lie here idle? Go out and do your work.' She buried herself with her head in a sack of rice, but only found that he did not have a sensitive nature."

Christian neighbors prayed over her, but the "devil cried out, 'I will not listen.' She was relieved in convulsions on the floor by the devil, but continued crying out, "Depart from me," until at last he fled out of her."

"During the revival the feeling was so intense that one man fell into raving insanity, his violence and superhuman power breaking to pieces even the iron chains that bound him and snapping an iron bar like glass, evidencing demoniac possession no less real than that of the man in the country of the Gadarenes. The devils were trying to frighten us and our converts into silence."

Prayer was again successfully resorted to. "The spirits left him and he came to himself."

No more complete avowal of belief in demoniac possession than the following could be required:

"In our work in Korea we are continually coming in contact with the most extraordinary cases of apparent demoniac possession and cure, containing all the phenomena that characterized demonized minds in the days of Christ."

Another writes pertinently:

"If you had lived in the midst of the native quarter with me and heard at midnight the cries of terror of those appealing to the evil spirits for help of being tortured by them, veritable possession by devils would then seem no impossible thing to you."

There is little reason to doubt that this diagnosis of the case is correct, for under circumstances such as these it would indeed be the unusual man that went his way unmoved.

This spirit-laden air has generated a sense not only of possession by devils, but also of their malignant presence on every side, indicated by such statements as "At our preaching the legions of Satan fled," or "Travelers enter these huts," referring to the wayside shrines, "and recognize one or the other of these score of devils that reside inside." But most amazing and unequivocal of all is the actual admission of the possibility of a demon cult, sinful in character, but based upon premises whose validity is unquestioned: "In truth, these spirits of evil are never hard to find. I have never seen them, but the Koreans do. Not only do they try to propitiate the devils, but they pray to them and the devils honor their faith. Of that I have seen too many evidences to doubt."

Such facts point irresistibly to a relation of cause and effect between the Shamanistic beliefs of the Korean people and the strangely vivid sense of demoniac presence experienced by the missionaries since in other countries less devil-ridden they have by no means displayed a tendency to the construction of so liberal a demonology. The point at issue, which is the unconscious and insidious tendency of the foreigner to accept the native point of view, is sufficiently admitted in such phrases as, "the Korean's native power of insight into spiritual matters," or "the Korean's marvelous sense of sin," while most naive and enlightening of all is a remark that palpably admits the whole contention: "The woman was insane—or, as the Koreans with more accuracy say, 'possessed of a devil!'" And in that word the entire story of the interaction of religious conceptions and modes of thought stands epitomized. On every man must his environment, mental as well as physical, inevitably react. The influence of the missionary upon the unchristian nations, whether for individual or social life, has been both deep and salutary, yet it may be that the evidence of the reaction of these several nations upon the missionary's attitude and formal creed may serve to demonstrate that the mental differences of races must inevitably modify the institutions and beliefs which they may mutually adopt, and that the formal garment of religion in East and West must diverge as radically as the psychology of Orient and Occident differ from each other.

AMERICAN STOCK EXCHANGES.

New York, August 21.

President Roosevelt on August 20th was present at the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of a monument in Provincetown, Massachusetts. He delivered a speech in which he said that the public were appealing to the President as to the panic in financial circles. The trouble arose through the general condition of the world; and in Paris and Berlin serious fluctuations are being experienced. Such troubles ought not to be attributed to his administrative acts. The fall in shares was invited by the various trusts themselves. The panic was very regrettable on account of the innocent shareholders. In conclusion he said that eighteen months are still left of the term of his service as President. During that period, he would not alter the principles of his policy but would continue to enforce it in accordance with the laws.

When the speech of the President was reported in Wall Street, the stock market, which was at its lowest point, gradually recovered, and shares went up by two or three dollars.

STANDARD OIL FINES.

The Standard Oil Company has again been punished with a fine of $9,200,000 on a charge of having infringed the law. The Company has distributed many thousand copies of a complaint saying that the steps taken by the President constitute serious interference.

It is said that the present panic in American financial circles originated in the treatment of trusts by the Government. The special slump experienced in March, this year, on the stock exchanges, was caused by a similar policy. The extent of the Government's policy in dealing with the trusts is not yet known and consequently European share holders of trusts are anxious as to their stock and have commenced to unload. There is no doubt that the panic was thus intensified. Later it became known that the Federal Government had merely enforced the laws upon illegal trusts but that nothing was done against honest corporations. After that the stock exchanges recovered.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

San Francisco, Aug. 21.

Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, has inspected the conditions in this city and adjacent places. His view is that Japan must send her workmen to America despite all difficulties. He admitted the development of Japanese in California, and the unavoidable necessity for Japanese labourers as the natural result of the progress in industrial enterprises. He will further investigate commercial and industrial work in the locality during the week commencing on Aug. 22nd. On the evening of Aug. 30th he will entertain Mayor Taylor and other prominent American officials and merchants.

SAN FRANCISCO CITY ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. Taylor, mayor of San Francisco, has discharged all the police commissioners who had taken steps injurious to the employment and other business rights of the Japanese. The commissioners are opposing the Mayor, contending that there is no reason to dismiss them. Their successors, however, have been appointed consisting of lawyers, merchants, and bankers. Things at present are favourable to the Japanese. The police superintendent will be changed. The question with regard to the alleged injury done to Japanese business rights by Americans will be settled.

KING EDWARD ON THE CONTINENT.

London, August 22

M. Clemenceau lunched with King Edward at Marienbad. The meeting was very cordial but informal. The general situation was discussed especially with reference to Morocco. Clemenceau stated that the interview "led to absolutely pacific hopes."

MOROCCO.

It is reported from Paris that the French general (Prude) has urgently requested more troops, the Government at once sending 900 to Casablanca.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

A telegram from the Hague states that Germany supported the two or three Powers who have been strenuously resisting the proposal to lay down anchored mines outside territorial waters with appliances rendering them innocuous in two hours after their abandonment.

The attitude of Japan is regarded as most praiseworthy, although with her unrivalled experience in the use of mines she could only gain from the point of view of naval strategy by their unlimited employment. Through her able delegate Shimamura she has set an example to the Powers by steadfastly supporting humane methods of warfare.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, August 22.

Mr. Taft, Secretary for War, has been welcomed at Lexington, Kentucky, with enthusiasm. In a speech there, he said, referring to a rumour regarding his resignation, that he would not desert President Roosevelt and his principles and that he would stay in the Cabinet and assist the President.

The police superintendent of San Francisco, whose position was precarious, resigned to-day. The proposed re-organization of the police department will thus be carried out with ease. Mr. Schmitz has handed over all official documents, etc., to the new Mayor, Mr. Taylor.

To-day, Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, proceeded to Sacramento where he had an interview with the Governor of California. He will inspect the condition of agricultural work.

Friction is arising among labourers in connexion with the strike of the electric railway conductors. The trouble means that the anti-Japanese movement is subsiding.

San Francisco, August 24.

The hearing of a case instituted by the Japanese proprietor of a restaurant claiming against the San Francisco City Office on the ground that his building was damaged by rioters, began on Aug. 23rd in the California Supreme Court. The City Office's counsel stated that the municipality was willing to admit a portion of the claim, $575, which damage was directly caused by the rioters, but refused to bear the damage, amounting to two thousand dollars, which was indirectly caused. Plaintiff's counsel presented an objection as to the organization of the Court after which the case was adjourned.

Mr. Loeb, confidential secretary to President Roosevelt, said on August 23rd that a squadron consisting of sixteen ships will proceed to the Pacific in December. The fleet will take its route by the Straits of Magellan and will arrive at San Francisco. It will call at Puget Sound. A flotilla of destroyers will be despatched to the Pacific but not in company with the squadron.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN NEGOTIATIONS.

London, August 26.

The Anglo-Russian negotiations are progressing rapidly. An impression prevails in well-informed circles that the concessions made will evoke much criticism among Indian statesmen, but the negotiators claim that the concessions are an honest price for assurances against invasion.

THE TSAR.

The Tsar has cancelled his cruise along the Finnish coast.

MOROCCO.

At Tangier it is announced that the proclamation of the Sultan's brother has been officially confirmed. It is expected that the actual Sultan will be obliged to abdicate.

THE HAGUE.

The peace conference will probably conclude in the middle of September. Great Britain has made some amended proposals with regard to mines placed in extra-territorial waters, which should be prohibited unless they are rendered innocuous within a certain time.

PROPOSED BOYCOTT OF JAPANESE.

San Francisco, August 26.

An anti-Japanese Mass Meeting has been held at Winnipeg, Canada. One of the speakers said they should take up arms and oppose the steamers who bring Oriental people to their shores and so prevent their landing. Finally a decision was arrived at that a boycott should be placed on timber, fish and other business under the control of Japanese.

THE AMERICAN PACIFIC SQUADRON.

President Roosevelt has issued an order to the fleet under Admiral Evans to proceed to the Pacific. The order included instructions to all the bureaux of the Naval Department, to make preparations for despatching a squadron consisting of sixteen battleships, on December 1st, to the Pacific.

THE RUSSIAN NAVY.

The Russian government has placed an order with Armstrong, Whitworth and Co. for the construction of three battleships, three cruisers and four gun boats. The Russian authorities will place other orders with several ship-building yards of America and Germany.

BUILDING UP THE NAVIES.

London, August 29.

Brazil has placed orders with Armstrongs and Vickers for three battleships, whereof one will be turbine-engined; costing £2,000,000 sterling each; and two turbine cruisers costing £330,000 each.

The Argentine republic has ordered two gunboats. Rumours are again current that large Russian orders have been placed in England for warships.

THE HAGUE.

Some second rate Powers dispute the competence of the Conference to deal with the rights of neutrals to defend their coasts by means of mines. A special meeting will be called to discuss the point.

UNHAPPY RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg.

Exceptional laws designed to repress revolutionary crimes have been again enacted.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

SAN FRANCISCO AFFAIRS.

San Francisco, August 20.

The Mayor of San Francisco has dismissed as unsuitable for office the head of the Police Bureau and four other police officials. The candidates for the vacant posts are one half baristers and the remainder merchants. All are men of some position.

San Francisco, August 21.

The former chief of the Police Bureau and his dismissed comrades have declared that they do not consider the new Mayor to be lawfully appointed and are objecting to him.

The State Court in San Francisco opened the hearing of the Japanese restaurant case on the 23rd instant. Counsel for both sides spoke. The Court announced that within 10 days it would give a decision as to "consequential damages" over and above actual damages.

The Mayor of San Francisco has commenced the reform of the Engineering Bureau, which was criticised in sequence to the Police Bureau. The head of the former tendered his resignation which the Mayor at once accepted, appointing another in his place. Reforms are to be at once introduced into other bureaux and sections. The administration of San Francisco will be gradually ameliorated.

FLOODS ON THE NAKASENDO.

Karuizawa, August 25.

The Nakasendo railway line is damaged at Kumagaya. The Tonegawa railway girder is within 2 feet of the water. Large tracts between Oyama and Maebashi are 10 feet under water. The No. 26 Usui Tunnel is damaged; the tracks at Karuizawa station are under water and many houses have been flooded in Karuizawa.

CHRONIC ECZEMA FOURTEEN YEARS

Every Part of Body Affected—Was in Hospital Five Times—Army Doctors and Nine Different Remedies Did No Good—Speedy Improvement and Finally a

PERFECT CURE BY USE OF CUTICURA REMEDIES

"I have suffered with chronic eczema for fourteen years. Every part of my body was affected. My father has been in the army and I have been attended by army doctors who all failed. I have been in hospital five times, but none of them did me any good. I have tried nine different kinds of remedies and none took any effect on me. At last I read of the wonderful cures which the Cuticura Remedies have made and in May I got a box of Cuticura Ointment and used it. When I had used half of the first box I saw that there was a great improvement in me. After that I got the Cuticura Soap and Resolvent Pills which did all the better. Since then I have used five boxes of Cuticura Ointment and am now completely cured. Had we known of Cuticura years ago we would have given pounds for it. I am writing this letter so that other sufferers may see it and get cured by the Cuticura Remedies. O. F. Hodge, 61, Vaughan Road, Coldharbour Lane, Camblewell Green, Dec. 8 and 11, 1906."

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7TH, 1907.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

BARON KIKUCHI has been appointed to proceed to The Hague on official business.

THE Tsukuba and Chitose left Naples on Sept. 1st for Trieste, where they are expected to arrive to day.

THREE Generals, Baron Kuroki, Baron Oku and Baron Hasegawa, have been promoted to Second Junior Rank.

AN Osaka telegram says that owing to scarcity of stock kerosene oil prices are rising. The price went up by sen 2 on Sept. 1st.

SIR CLAUDE MACDONALD, British Ambassador, who had been staying at Nikko for some weeks past, returned to Tokyo on Sept. 2nd.

IT is reported by the Nichi Nichi that Marquis Ito, Resident-General in Korea, will leave Tokyo between Sept. 15th and 20th for Seoul.

ON Sept. 3rd, J. Nakamura, a young employee of a tailor of Tokyo, committed suicide by jumping into the Kego waterfall near Nikko.

IT is reported by a Vladivostok telegram that four of the men who plotted to assassinate the Tsar were sentenced to death on Aug. 29th.

CONSIDERABLE fluctuations in copper continue in London. According to a telegram which was received on the morning of Sept. 3rd in Osaka, the price was £74.15.0. and another report received the same afternoon said that the quotation had fallen by 15 shillings.

THE usual conference of heads of naval stations, squadrons, etc., will be held at the Naval Department on Sept. 15th and will last for three days.

THE improvements in Kobe harbour will be commenced on Sept. 16th. The opening ceremony will be attended by the Minister of Finance.

PERMISSION has been granted to the Nippon Horse Breeding Company to hold horse races at Itabashi. The first meeting will take place in December.

THE King Alfred and three other British cruisers arrived at Nagasaki on Sept. 3rd from Korean waters. The Kent was to leave on Sept. 5th, for Yokohama.

THE steamers Koun Maru and Uwajima Maru collided on the evening of Aug. 30th off Oita. Both sustained slight damage, and both arrived the following morning at Moji.

THE Osaka-Kobe Electric Railway Company on Sept. 3rd held a general meeting and decided to add three million yen to the present capital, with a view to extending the lines.

TRAFFIC on the Tokaido Railway between Yamakita and Koyama, which was suspended on account of damage caused by the recent storm, will be resumed about Sept. 13th.

THE steamer Danzo Maru collided with the Sixth Kannon Maru on the morning of Sept. 1st off Kiyobashi, Funaba-cho, Tokyo. A sailor on the former fell into the sea and is missing.

MR. H. TANAKA and some other officials of the Nagano Prefectural Government were arrested on Sept. 2nd on a charge of fraud in connexion with passports recently granted to several persons.

MR. ISHII, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, left San Francisco on Sept. 2nd for Portland. He will visit Seattle and Tacoma, and is expected to arrive at Vancouver on Sept. 9th.

THE Uraga Dock Company on Aug. 30th held a general meeting. The accounts for the first half of the year were submitted to shareholders. A loss of yen 131,544 was sustained during the period.

ON the morning of Aug. 29th, a landslide occurred in the village of Uyeno, not far from Maibashi, Gumma prefecture. Six houses collapsed, forty-one persons were killed, and six were injured.

AT 1.30 a.m. on Sept. 4th, fire broke out in a house belonging to a small merchant named K. Ikeda, No. 226, Kitagata, Yokohama. The flames were put out before spreading far. A lamp is reported to have been the cause.

IMPORT duties from April 1st, the beginning of the fiscal year, to the end of August amounted to twenty million yen. The estimate in the budget aggregated thirty-six million yen for the whole year, and there is no doubt that the takings for the year will exceed the amount set down in the budget.

SOME Japanese capitalists of Yokohama are endeavouring to establish an ice-making factory and cold storage with a capital of half a million yen. The promoters intend to call up the first quarter of the proposed capital and then to start business. According to the prospectus, yen 75,000 will be used in purchasing ice manufacturing machines, etc.; yen 20,000 for providing buildings, and the remainder for the expenses of daily business.

A TELEGRAM to the Hochi says that a Russian named Rojevsky was arrested on Sept. 2nd at Hakodate while photographing the burned district of the city after the recent fire, within the fortification zone.

GENERAL TERAUCHI, Minister for War, on Aug. 29th, issued a notification in the Official Gazette that military and naval officers and men in foreign countries are not permitted to wear their uniforms except in case of official necessity.

A TELEGRAM from Mr. Ishihara, Governor of Chiba Prefecture, reports that at 3 p.m. on Aug. 3rd about sixty yards of the embankment of the River Yasuji, in the village of Niijima, Katori, collapsed. A thousand houses were inundated.

A VLADIVOSTOCK telegram reports that the Russian Government has decided to devote 3,000,000 yen toward the construction fund of the Amur railway, one half of the sum to be used for road improvement and the other half for construction.

A PARCELS-POST agreement has been concluded between the Japanese Department of Communications and the Hongkong Post Office. The text was published in the Official Gazette of Aug. 30th. The day of enforcing the convention is not yet settled.

THE promoters of the Newchwang Horse Race Association have decided to fix its capital at half a million yen and to invite Chinamen to become shareholders. The prospectus will be issued after Mr. K. Inouye, one of the promoters, returns from Manchuria.

THE five-years old son of a merchant named Hayakawa, residing in Tobe, Yokohama, fell into the creek near Hirato bridge at 3.30 p.m. on Sept. 4th while trying to catch a dragon fly. A passer by pulled the little fellow out of the water, but he was already dead.

MR. S. UYENO Consul in San Francisco, has been promoted Consul General and removed to Sydney; Mr. M. Fuji, of the Foreign Office, has been appointed consul to Harbin; Mr. G. Shibata, a consul, ordered to England; Mr. Y. Tsuda, a Secretary of the Embassy in France, appointed consul to Antwerp.

THE Toyo Kisen Kaisha's steamer Tenyo Maru (12,000 tons) which is under construction at the Mitsui Bishi Shipbuilding Yard, Nagasaki, will be launched on Sept. 14th. The building of two ships of the same type as the Tenyo will be commenced next spring. All three steamers will be employed on the American line.

THE steamer Waka Maru (784 tons) went ashore on Sept. 2nd in the neighbourhood of Shibatsushima on her way from Kamchatka to Hakodate. The ship is in a serious situation; in fact there is no hope of saving her. The crew landed at Nemuro the same evening. The cargo consisted of salted salmon and herrings.

A SMALL merchant named C. Nakura (39) living at Take-cho, Shitaya, in Tokyo, on the evening of Aug. 28th, attempted to murder with a knife his wife named Tome (34) and her younger brother, Senzo (19) inflicting on them severe injuries. Subsequently he attempted to commit suicide, injuring himself in the throat with the same weapon. Temporary insanity is reported to have been the cause.

KOREA.

Friday, August 30.

We mentioned in our last issue that Japanese public opinion seems likely to be divided into two camps with reference to the question of financing Korea under the new regimen. The Jiji Shimpō has now thrown its powerful influence into the same scale with the Kokumin Shimbun. It says in effect that Japan has no choice in this matter. She can not be content merely with a drafted document without supplying any means for giving vitality to its provisions. That would be a veritable case of moulding an image without breathing life into it. Moreover the pecuniary sacrifice that this country will be asked to make is comparatively trifling—from two to three million yen annually. It is true that Japan has her hands pretty full with her own finances, but it is also true that she can easily afford such a paltry expenditure, especially when the issue at stake is the welfare of a nation for which she has constituted herself sponsor. The sacrifice too will be only temporary. If Korea be tided over her present difficulties she will undoubtedly be able to pay her own way handsomely two or three years hence.

Marquis Ito's meeting with Count Okuma has naturally attracted some attention. The general interpretation put upon it is that Count Okuma's influence will be exerted to induce the Progressists not to oppose Marquis Ito's financial demands. Whether the Count's efforts will be wholly successful is considered doubtful, but at all events they will probably have the effect of averting any radical opposition on the side of the Progressists. There is no concealing the fact, however, that a considerable body of publicists in Japan are opposed to drawing upon the national exchequer for Korean purposes. They would prefer that the money should be provided by making Korea herself responsible for a debt which she will very soon be in a position to pay off.

Mr. Homer B. Hulbert, who, so far as we know, has never taken any public step to dissociate himself from the wholesale falsehoods scattered broad-cast by a so-called "Prince," apparently the leader of the Korean delegation now touring the United States, is quoted by an American reporter as saying:—

"Korea is thoroughly outraged over the injustices which the Japanese are heaping upon her, and the Koreans are angered beyond words. Still they feel the dread hopelessness of their extremity. The Koreans look upon the Japanese as vages. They are insulted and debauched, but can do nothing. I have seen a Japanese boy rush out into the street and belabor a Korean gentleman with a stick and laugh. The Korean could do nothing, for protests to the Japanese would avail nothing."

"The Japanese have seized their salt-works, driven away the Korean fishermen from their fishing-grounds, and taken every form of profitable industry in the country for themselves. The Koreans will tell you that Japanese are striving to drive them from the country, that they may occupy it for themselves."

"Knowing, as I do, the Korean temperament and the policy which Japan has pursued in the peninsula, I am able to predict that Japan will obtain peace there only by the decimation of the people."

"It is hard to arouse the Koreans to the fighting-point. They are almost infinitely patient, but drive them to desperation and they will turn on their tormentors as they did in 1892, and then nothing but extermination will give Japan peace there. But to exterminate 13,000,000 people, or even to beat them into quiescence, will be no easy task. The Koreans are fast approaching the turning-point, and despair will arm them to resistance, even though it be suicidal. The Korean people, thoroughly aroused, could carry on a guerrilla warfare that would bankrupt Japan in three years."

We hesitate to say that Mr. Hulbert is willingly an exaggerator. He is a warm partizan, however, and by degrees he has talked himself into a kind of phrensy. A mischievous person he certainly has become, yet, when all is said and done, it could scarcely have been expected that the drama now being acted in Korea would fail to produce some fanatic of the Hulbert type. England's acts in Egypt and her acts in India were similarly made the text of wild diatribes by enthusiasts whose judgments were easily prostituted to their emotions. Nevertheless it is in the wise scheme of dispensation that men like Mr. H. B. Hulbert should appear upon the public stage. They undoubtedly exercise a wholesome restraint upon licence. What Mr. Hulbert says can not be wholly the outcome of his own imagination. There must be some substratum of truth could we only dig deep enough to find it. And to the extent of that substratum Japanese doings in Korea will be checked and corrected. It is necessary to be a partizan, and a prejudiced partizan at that, if one hopes to obtain a hearing from the world as it is now constituted.

Official reports show that the Japanese troops are employing very drastic measures against the insurgents in the Yangkeun district. Villages are wiped out by the torch and military fugitives who incite the people are shot down ruthlessly. It has evidently been decided that an object lesson of the severest character must be given. Probably that is the most merciful policy in the long run, yet one can not but reflect with pain on the fact that many innocent villagers must be involved in this general penalty.

Quite a remarkable exploit stands to the credit of a small body of land-transport soldiers who were descending the Han River in charge of provisions. The men numbered only six and a sergeant. They were suddenly fired upon from both banks of the river by bodies of insurgents who seemed to number about 300. One of the Japanese was killed but the remaining six ran the boat ashore, landed in the face of a heavy but evidently ill directed fire, charged the Koreans, shot down ten of their number and thus opened a path of escape. The Koreans rallied, however, and pursued vigorously, so that the little band was compelled to turn again in self defence. This time 20 Koreans are said to have been killed or wounded, and the six Japanese effected their escape without further molestation. Next day a detachment of troops was sent to the place. By that time, however, the Koreans had dispersed and nothing remained except to bury the body of the fallen soldier.

Saturday, August 31.

There has been a riot on the island of Quelpart in connexion with some fishery dispute. An attempt was made to settle the matter by arbitration but a mob of Koreans took the law into their own hands and attacked a small party of four Japanese whose fate has not yet been ascertained.

From several places in Korea comes news of petty disturbances, with all of which the Japanese forces are dealing decisively. It is evident that the disbanded soldiers are the main instigators of these troubles. We do not enter into particulars because it is impossible to find on any map the names of the various places referred to, and in almost every case the record is identical, namely, so many insurgents attacked, or were attacked, and were driven out or driven back.

It is stated that Viceroy Hsu has sent a party of Chinese troops to Chientao. If this be true there is a danger of a collision between these troops and the Japanese who are already in occupation. The Asahi Shimbun, however, says that the matter has been under discussion between Tokyo and Peking and that the result will be published in a few days.

Sunday, Sept. 1.

Again this morning news comes of various encounters between the insurgents and Japanese troops. The fighting appears to be in the country adjacent to Seoul, which fact suggests that the ring-leaders are for the most part disbanded officers and soldiers. Indeed officers have been clearly recognised with drawn swords encouraging their men to advance. It seems to be altogether a very one-sided business, the casualties being entirely on the side of the insurgents, but nevertheless these misguided people evidently think that they have some patriotic mission. The bewildering feature of the reports is that the Japanese seem to have broken up into a number of small parties, but that is understood when we remember the plan of campaign, namely, to close in on the insurgents from all sides. This method necessarily leads to petty encounters here and there pending the final operation.

With regard to the Chientao affair, it is explained that rumour has erred as usual. The ownership of this so-called island has been a source of fitful discussion between China and Korea from time immemorial. It is a land much favoured by nature and its fertile qualities have attracted quite a large number of settlers. No accurate statistics are available, but it is calculated that there are 600,000 Korean settlers and 400,000 Chinese. In former years it was the custom of each Power to send officials with a certain following for the protection of its subjects, but during the Russo-Japanese war the Korean Government recalled its officials from Chientao, and the 600,000 Korean settlers, being thus deprived of all protection, fell into most unenviable circumstances, being the constant prey of bandits and raiders. Frequent complaints reached Seoul, and in November of last year the Korean Government formally applied to the Residency-General, asking that the duty of protecting these people should be assumed by the latter. After due consultation the Resident-General decided to conform with this application and on the 20th of November Lieut.-Col. Saito was sent to undertake the duty, formal notice of the fact being conveyed simultaneously to the Peking Government. It has been commonly rumoured that Colonel Saito is at the head of a body of troops, and his despatch to Chientao has been construed in the sense of a military expedition to take forcible possession of the disputed territory. That is entirely erroneous. Colonel Saito is accompanied by only a small body-guard and a few gendarmes and police; in fact merely a handful of men to assist him in performing the duty of preserving order. It would seem that these rumours reached the ears of the Chinese Government only lately, for although it raised no objection when officially communicated with last November, it is now said to have protested against Japan's action although that action does not amount to more than simply a resumption of the duties formerly performed by Korea herself. The question of the ownership of Chientao will now be opened therefore between China and Japan, and it may be assumed that some final settlement will be reached. It is understood that China's protest embodies a distinct assertion of her title of ownership in Chientao, but on the other side there are said to be abundant historical and geographical proofs that the place is Korean territory. At all events it is to be desired that the unsettled state of affairs which has hitherto existed should be definitely determined. China probably regards Chientao as one of those buffer states on which she placed so much reliance in former times as instruments for saving her from contact with outside Powers. She has been gradually shaken out of that theory. One by one the buffers have disappeared. Chientao is one of the very last and the dispute about it presents some features very much resembling those of the old Riukiu problem.

Some details are given of the judicial system which Marquis Ito proposes to establish in Korea, the courts being collegiate, with the exception of the lowest of all, namely the district courts, whose jurisdiction will be limited to cases not involving more than 200 yen. The number of judicial officials required will be 1830, and a large proportion of these will be Japanese. But as the Bench in Japan can not spare any considerable force of officials for service abroad, the full organization of the Korean courts must be a matter of time. The Marquis is said to consider it quite essential that this reform should be carried out without a day's delay, and he has accordingly asked that the Government should take upon its own shoulders the responsibility of providing the necessary funds forthwith and obtaining the post-facto sanction of the Diet.

Count Okuma appears to be ranging himself emphatically on Marquis Ito's side with regard to the Korean affair. His Excellency is quoted as denouncing all extreme measures in the case of the Peninsular Empire. His view is that any exercise of force or coercion in the case of such an impotent Power should be avoided as far as possible.

Monday, Sept. 2.

There has been a sharp engagement at Hoisan between a company of Japanese troops and 300 Korean insurgents. It ended as usual in heavy loss for the insurgents and none for the Japanese. The Koreans occupied a camp from which they were driven pell mell, leaving 30 dead and many wounded, as well as a large quantity of arms, ammunition and provisions. One would think that the misguided people must soon learn the futility of their attempts. They are said to be divided into three principal bodies, of which one is at Wongchong and Chechong, another is at Ichong and Yaju, and the third is at Hoisan. They do not appear to be acting in concert or indeed to have any effective system of intercommunication. We shall probably soon have news of a more or less important nature from Pyongchang, where three detachments of Japanese troops are closing in on 800 insurgents.

The Chuo Shinbun, which is generally well informed, says that the grant asked for by the Resident-General in connexion with Korean reforms is a sum of 3 million yen annually for a period of five years commencing from 1908. There will also be something required for the remainder of the present fiscal year which, according to Korea's method of accounts, terminates in December. It is considered certain that this outlay will receive approval from the various political parties. Our Tokyo contemporary notes that as many Japanese subjects are to be employed in Korea, a large part of this grant will go into Japanese hands. According to present appearances it seems certain that the grant will be made under the authority of an Urgency Ordinance and that the Diet's post facto assent will be sought.

Tuesday, Sept. 3.

The Korean Government is about to send Chief Chamberlain, Mr. Min Pyongchol, to Japan as Imperial Delegate to return the visit of General Hasegawa who received the Mikado's commission to represent his Majesty at the recent Coronation ceremony.

It is stated that the Emperor of Korea has put an end to all the complicated ceremonials which had hitherto been performed at the Court, and has also vetoed the entry of various persons including even several friends of the Prince Imperial. These steps are regarded as plain evidence of his Majesty's resolve to carry out the process of Palace purification.

The Korean delegates to the Hague have returned to that place from America, their mission to the United States having proved a complete fiasco. They declare that the sentence of death pronounced against them in Seoul was fully expected, but that it will not deter them in the least from prosecuting their anti-Japanese campaign. It had been their intention to reside either in England or America, but some undefined features in those countries have induced them to change their minds and they are now about to domicile themselves in Russia.

Reports still continue to arrive indicating that the process of quelling the insurrection in Korea is proceeding steadily. The insurgents seem to be assembling at Yangchi. Several thousands of them are said to be already massed there.

There are several paragraphs in Japanese newspapers about the Chientao affair, and according to present appearances journalistic agitators are not unlikely to manufacture a sensation out of it. China is represented as having set her face resolutely against any theory of divided ownership and is said to be despatching troops to the Yalu valley. One telegram even hints that a collision is imminent. Such rumours may be regarded as veritable moonshine. Neither Government is so giddy and foolish as to carry a problem of the kind into the armed lists, and as for China, she has already seen quite enough of Japan in the field to cool any readiness for a further trial of prowess. But indeed there is no occasion to talk in this way. We assume it as certain that the Chientao question will never emerge from the diplomatic realm.

Wednesday, Sept. 4.

The Emperor of Korea has issued a long edict with the object of removing the causes which are now making for unquiet in the Peninsula. As yet we have only brief telegraphic summaries of the document, but they suffice to show that his Majesty alludes seriatim to the changed administrative conditions resulting from the new Convention and to the various measures of reform which are now in progress of inauguration. He says that whereas his subjects ought to be in a calm and contented frame of mind, they seem to have fallen into a mood of apprehension and perturbation, and are thus bringing upon themselves sufferings and disasters instead of enjoying the benefits which the new system will certainly confer.

The Korean Envoy to the Court of Japan is to leave Seoul on the 18th inst.

A band of Korean insurgents attacked the railway station at Ongju on the 2nd instant and succeeded in burning the station as well as killing four of their own countrymen.

On the 31st ultimo a Japanese detachment attacked and dispersed a body of insurgents encamped at Hoisan. The Koreans left 30 dead upon the field and a quantity of arms and ammunition.

The most sanguinary engagement yet recorded seems to have taken place on the 28th ultimo at Kwanyong. The insurgents numbered 200 and it is said that 100 of them were killed or wounded while the Japanese on their side had only one casualty.

It will be remembered that at the time of Marquis Ito's return to Tokyo several Japanese journals undertook to act as exponents of his financial views. All agreed that the Marquis had come to ask for money among other things, and some confidently asserted that his demand would take the form of an ultimatum, failure to obtain compliance being followed by his own resignation. The Marquis' private secretary, Mr. Furuya, speaking through the columns of the Kokumin Shinbun, gives information which places the matter in a very different light. After pointing out the necessity and obligation devolving upon Japan to provide for the proper administration of affairs in Korea under the new regime, he says that the Resident-General has asked the Japanese Government to do one of three things:—First, to grant the required amount of money without imposing any fresh liability upon Korea; secondly, if such a grant be impossible, then to lend the money on condition that it is repaid by Korea within a fixed term of years; and thirdly, if neither of the above courses be feasible, then to sanction the borrowing of the money from some other source. This is something radically different from the attitude assigned by the above journals to Marquis Ito.

Mr. Furuya goes on to speak of the amount required. It takes two forms; one a sum of 3 millions to be paid forthwith: the other an annual allowance of like amount during a period of five years. The former sum is needed immediately to provide travelling expenses, house purchasing and other outlays incidental to the transfer of a large number of Japanese officials for service in Korea. Mr. Furuya puts this number at 2,500, including police and petty officials of all kinds. The salaries of such a number of employees amount in themselves to quite a large figure.

It may be mentioned in this context that Mr. Megata takes a very hopeful view of Korean finance. He points out that whereas the estimates for 1906 amounted to less than 9½ million yen, the corresponding figure for the current year is over 13 millions. He is confident that if abuses now prevalent in tax-collecting were corrected, and if proper revisions were made of the various sources of revenue a large income might be secured without any difficulty.

The following appears in a business report issued by Messrs. Noel, Murray and Company, of Shanghai:—

"The feelings of many of the British Import Houses here who have been for years interested in the trade of Korea can better be imagined than described as they see its total extinction slowly but surely getting nearer and nearer. Probably because the British trade with that country does not figure to any great extent in the Board of Trade Returns the Government does not consider the actions of Japan towards that country are worthy of notice. But for years past a steady trade in Manchester goods has been done through Shanghai, and this is altogether doomed if Japan is quietly allowed to absorb the trade, as she is evidently trying to do, by bringing about a Customs Union. The report that the United States is willing to aid and abet her in doing so, as a sop to counteract the awkward situation that has been raised over the immigration question, is only natural, considering her commercial relations with Korea are of no importance. It is, however, quite time a halt was called and a re-valuation made of the "open door" and "fair field and no favour" protestations that were so much to the fore a few years ago both with regard to the Manchurian and Korean trades."

It is wise and prudent, of course, that merchants should keep their eyes fully open to all contingencies capable of affecting their trade, which is as the breath of their nostrils. A customs union between Japan and Korea would be such a contingency, and if Messrs. Noel, Murray and Company think they have grounds for apprehending anything of the kind, they are well-advised in inviting public attention to the danger. But it would have been very easy for them to inform themselves that, as yet, this project of a Korean-Japanese Zollverein has not emerged from the domain of irresponsible suggestion. Certain journalists have mooted the idea of such an arrangement, but no one has approached the question seriously. Moreover, the Shanghai firm should know and must know that all the great Powers of the Occident have with Korea treaties which ensure for their subjects or citizens most favoured-nation treatment in the peninsular empire, and that to establish a customs union between Japan and Korea of a nature discriminating against the Powers thus conventionally protected, an essential preliminary would be to obtain the consent of those Powers. Is it conceivable that any such consent could be procured? Nothing seems to us more chimerical. In fact, Marquis Ito himself has openly alluded to this project and has curtly dismissed it as unworthy of serious attention. Shanghai may therefore rest assured so far as this special rock ahead is concerned. But it is plain from the tone of Messrs. Noel, Murray and Company's circular that something more than the shadowy possibility of a customs union is troubling them. Already without such a handicap they are feeling the effects of Japanese competition. We suppose that to be inevitable. It can scarcely be doubted that in certain lines of trade Japan will ultimately dominate the markets of the Far East. She possesses in cheap labour, mechanical adaptability and geographical position advantages which must tell clearly in her favour. Does any one doubt, however, that the shrewd and profoundly experienced British merchant will be unable to find his account in other directions?

Thursday, Sept. 5.

On the evening of the 2nd inst. a Korean mob stoned a Japanese store in Pyongyang. It is claimed on behalf of the rioters that they were suffering from the effects of drink imbibed to celebrate the Emperor's fete day.

Korean insurgents appear to have been reduced to the perpetration of mere mischief. They have smashed a lighthouse on the coast between Fusan and Gensan and cut telegraph lines in two places. This morning there is no news of any collisions between the troops and the insurgents.

On the 3rd inst. the last section of the Korean army was disbanded at Pukchon without any disturbance.

THE WEATHER.

Saturday, Aug. 31.

There are some signs of a centre of depression developing in the Shinano region, but according to the meteorological authorities no sensible disturbance is likely to be generated there for some days to come. The other centres of depression referred to in our last issue have ceased to be threatening. Thus the present prospect is that the 210th day will pass quietly. As to the interval between that day and the 220th day, however,—namely, the interval between the 2nd and the 12th—nothing can be predicted of course. The more nearly the season approximates to the autumnal equinox, the greater does the risk of storms become all over the world, and this is fully borne out by Japanese records.

Sunday, Sept. 1.

Two centres of depression declared themselves on the 31st ultimo in the same regions where these phenomena recently appeared, namely the south of Riukiu and the neighbourhood of Ogasawara. Up to midday on the 31st the meteorological authorities had not been able to determine what course these atmospheric disturbances would take, but both are described as of very small dimensions. It may be conjectured, however, from climatic conditions yesterday in Tokyo and Yokohama, that the 210th day will not pass off as favourably as was expected.

Reports still continue to arrive from various parts of the country as to damages inflicted by the recent floods. Of course the fine weather of the past few days has done much to reduce the volume of water, but in the Fukagawa, Asakusa and Senju suburbs of Tokyo inconvenience is still felt. Even after these districts have been restored to their normal condition so far as water is concerned, extensive sanitary measures will have to be taken to prevent an outbreak of disease.

Monday, Sept. 2.

The meteorological authorities report several petty climatic disturbances throughout Japan, the outcome of the great heat of the closing days of August. They were all insignificant, however, and at present there is no cause for uneasiness unless it be a centre of depression which has developed on the east coast of Korea and is moving eastward. This may affect the Japanese Islands but as yet it is not possible to speak confidently. The centres of depression which were reported from the Bonin Islands and the Riukiu Archipelago are said to be rapidly losing force. Nevertheless the weather has a decidedly unsettled aspect although the barometer keeps up.

Tuesday, Sept. 3.

The 210th day passed off very favourably throughout the whole of Japan. The petty centres of depression which menaced the country at the close of August have dissipated themselves without working any mischief, and on the whole this important day must be said to have shown excellent climatic conditions. Of course the next few days are only a shadow less important from an agricultural point of view than the 2nd inst. was, but so far as present appearances indicate, there is no immediate prospect of a change. It remains to be seen, however, what route will ultimately be taken by the centre of depression now lingering near the Riukiu Archipelago.

Wednesday, Sept. 4.

The climatic conditions continue to be favourable. There are no indications that the Riukiu centre of depression will move northward. It remains stationary and may possibly exhaust itself without involving Japan proper. There have been minor centres of depression at various places throughout the Empire but they are spoken of as quite insignificant, and on the whole if present conditions last a few days longer, the harvest will be secured.

As to the rice crop, the estimate published by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce from statistics carried down to the eve of the floods, showed a crop of 48,887,940 koku. This has been confirmed by telegraphic inquiries addressed by the Shogyo Shimpo to all the principal rice producing centres subsequently to the floods. In fact it is now pretty certain that great as was the damage done by the inundations in some respects, their effect upon the rice crop was scarcely appreciable inasmuch as they did not touch the cereal's principal producing regions.

Thursday, Sept. 5.

At 6 o'clock on the morning of the 4th the Meteorological Observatory announced the appearance of a centre of depression in the Yenshu-nada, which was moving in a north north-easterly direction. This storm, if it hold in that direction, ought to strike Yokohama and Tokyo. Another centre of depression has developed off Noto and is moving in a direction which would take it across Hokkaido. The Riukiu centre of depression has begun to move slowly but its direction being to the northwest, it is not likely to work any injury in Japan.

THE STATE COUNCIL.

The State Council which had been deferred on account of the floods, met on the 30th ult. at the residence of the Prime Minister. The session lasted from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., with an interval for luncheon. Marquis Oyama, who is detained at Nasu by the floods, was the only one of the Elder Statesmen that did not attend. Nearly the whole time is said to have been occupied by a statement which Marquis Ito made about the progress of recent events in Korea and about the projects entertained by him for the development and administration of the country. After the meeting Marquis Ito returned to Oiso and he is expected to come again to Tokyo on the 2nd inst.

It is generally reported that the programme formulated by the Resident-General was unanimously endorsed by the Council, and that nothing now remains except to draft a bill, after detailed consultation with the Minister of Finance, for presentation to the Diet. The three main features of the programme are first, the establishment of offices throughout the country for investigating the taxation question in general and the land tax in particular; secondly, the reform of the police system by adding 500 Japanese constables to the present mixed body of Koreans and Japanese; and, thirdly, the reorganisation of the judiciary, which will involve the establishment of courts of appeal in Seoul, Pyongyang and Fusan. The total additional cost involved in carrying out this programme is said to be 3½ million yen annually, but of that amount about one million will be obtained in consequence of disbanding the army, and there will also be certain small economies effected in the outlays of the Residency-General, so that the charge on the Japanese Treasury will not exceed 2½ million yen. This annual allowance is expected to be required for three years in succession, after which the amount will be reduced, and from the sixth year Korea will be in a position to commence recouping Japan. Thus what is asked for is not a grant but a loan.

An Osaka telegram says that tuberculosis is prevalent in the village of Hishima. One thousand of the five thousand villagers are infected with the disease.

MANCHURIA.

There had been a suspension of negotiations at Mukden, but they were reopened on the 28th inst when Mr. Hagiwara, the Japanese Plenipotentiary, sought to obtain the signature of the Chinese officials to the documents embodying the results of the negotiations already concluded, namely, those relating to the fishery question and to the coal mines along the Mukden-Antung Railway. Viceroy Hsu declined to sign, however, on the ground that he was awaiting instructions from the Foreign Office in Peking. It is suspected that under the influence of the rights-recovery party, the Viceroy has been instructed to assume a more stalwart attitude towards Japanese demands.

The Russian Consul-General at Harbin has joined his voice to those of Consul-General Kawakami and Consul-General Hagiwara in protesting against China's veto on the export of grain. It is insisted by these officials that the material development of Northern Manchuria will be fatally affected if this veto remains in force, for a complete check would thus be imposed on the flour-manufacturing industry which attained such large dimensions at Harbin during the war.

The Russo-Japanese Entente continues to be the subject of various and sundry rumours. Somebody has said, for example, that the alleged secret document which accompanies the Entente contains a clause placing the Sungari region within Japan's sphere of influence and granting to her the right of freely navigating the river. In St. Petersburg, however, it is denied that any such agreement has been made, and indeed a moment's thought shows how superfluous it would be, inasmuch as the language of the Entente clearly provides for the removal of everything making for inequality of trade opportunities. In face of that agreement the navigation of one of the two great rivers of Manchuria can not possibly be reserved as an exclusive Russian privilege.

Rumours continue to be circulated in the sense that Peking is much perturbed about the Entente and that the Chinese authorities have even gone so far as to lodge a formal protest. That, however, is scarcely credible.

The Yalu timber-felling question seems to have again failed of solution. The second set of Chinese proposals were in some sense an improvement on the first, but were still far from offering a satisfactory basis for discussion. Things have drifted back therefore into their old channel, and it now remains to be seen which side has the greater patience. Japan has the advantage of being in possession and actually working the property.

Our readers are aware that Lieut.-Colonel Saito, at the head of a small force of Japanese troops, proceeded recently to Chientao for the purpose of restoring order. In that object he was entirely successful, but it appears from a telegram to the Mainichi Dempo that the Chinese Government has entered a strong protest against the presence of Japanese troops in territory which China claims as her own. This, if it be true, reopens the whole question of the ownership of Chientao, which, according to the Nichi Nichi Shinbun's information, was satisfactorily disposed of some time ago.

According to telegrams from Peking, the Chinese Government is beginning to recognise what is really involved in its grain-export veto. The only plea upon which such vetoes are issued and enforced in the Chinese Empire, can scarcely be said to apply at all to the case of Manchuria, for Newchwang still remains as an outlet, and moreover the grain chiefly affected is wheat, which is not an article of local consumption. It would seem to follow therefore that this veto has nothing to do with the preservation of the peoples' food stuffs, but is merely intended to be a thorn in Japan's side. That is not the view, however, which is said to be perplexing Chinese officials. What they find is that, in vulgar parlance, to insist on enforcing this veto would be cutting their own noses to hurt their faces. The Japanese Representative in Peking, on learning the grounds of China's action, is said to have made the very obvious retort:—"Very well; then Japan is quite willing to accept the exchange offered by Peking. She will agree to recognise Kwantung as her own territory, as a set off against the grain veto." Apparently the problem had not presented itself to the Waiwupu in this light. Indeed it is doubtful whether the Peking Foreign Office gave any serious consideration to the matter at the outset. What seems to have happened was that the Chief Commissioner of Customs conceived the idea of imposing the veto, for reasons which remain unexplained, and that his instruction in that sense was passed through the administrative machine to its destination in Manchuria without any special reference to the Waiwupu. But of course the idea of deliberately abandoning her right of eminent domain over the most important section of the Three Eastern Provinces merely for the sake of temporarily sticking a pin into Japan, does not present itself to China as a very wise policy. The matter is now under discussion and it appears to be thought certain that the veto will be withdrawn.

On the 1st inst. the first anniversary of the opening of civil government in the leased territory of Manchuria was celebrated with great éclat. General Baron Oshima, the Governor-General, made a speech in which he spoke of the policy of the open door and equal opportunity having been inaugurated in Manchuria by the establishment of the civil government system. He predicted that the result would tend to greatly promote the country's prosperity, and he took the occasion to solemnly and publicly announce that Japan was determined to adhere in practice without favour or affection to the principle of equal opportunity.

Apparently the discussion of the Manchurian problems has been completely suspended at Mukden. When Viceroy Hsu took up the duties of his post, his language and the line of action assumed by him gave every promise of mutual concessions and an early solution of all outstanding problems seemed imminent. Some were actually settled and their settlement only awaited the endorsement of Peking, while others, although their solution promised to be more difficult, gave every sign of yielding to practical treatment. Now all this is changed, but we are disposed to think that the change is due rather to divided counsels and domestic confusion in Peking than to any deliberate purpose of slapping Japan's face. Be that as it may, the questions already settled are now awaiting ratification which they do not seem likely to obtain, and in the case of those unsettled a virtual impasse has been reached. Mr. Consul-General Hagiwara has therefore put up the shutters and is returning to Tokyo, whether for instructions or on leave we do not know. Of course the situation is not particularly embarrassing for Japan. She is in the position of the beatus possidens. That is to say, she carries on the timber felling, mining and fishing privileges which she enjoyed during the war, and which China in her present peculiar mood declines to discuss practically. The only embarassing matter is the salt industry of Kwantung. That important enterprise must remain almost undeveloped until some agreement can be come to with China as to the export of the mineral across the borders of the leased territory.

There is a rumour that Viceroy Hsu will be removed from Mukden to resume the duties of his original post, namely Minister of Home Affairs. His successor at Mukden is expected to be either the former Governor General Chou or the ex-Viceroy of the Two Kwang, Tsen Chun-hsuan. The latter has been a conspicuous figure upon the stage of Chinese officialdom for some time past, and he enjoys the reputation of being an enlightened statesman.

General Oshima, Governor General of Kwantung, is making a tour of inspection in Manchuria. He has already reached Mukden and after a brief stay there will go on to Changchun.

There has been quite a riot in Mukden. Our readers are aware that frequent complaints have been preferred of late with reference to disorderly conduct on the part of Chinese soldiers stationed in that city. It is now stated that the Chinese police are behaving in an equally arbitrary manner. One of them recently beat a Japanese child which was playing in the street, and when the lad's father remonstrated, he too became an object of police attack. Several Japanese came to the rescue and the policeman's whistle summoned a number of his comrades, whereupon a fracas occurred. The police used their batons freely and several Japanese are reported to have been more or less seriously injured.

The revenue of the Manchurian Railway has been greatly affected by the recent floods and by the grain veto. The following figures are published showing the gross earnings month by month in round numbers:—April 869,000 yen; May 873,000 yen; June 640,000; July 490,000; August 399,000. The average earnings per day during this period of five months were 25 yen a mile on the main line and 27 yen on the Mukden-Antung line.

It is now alleged that the main reason for the failure of the negotiations in Mukden is to be attributed to the fact that Viceroy Hsu's powers were not plenipotentiary. Every move he made was directed from Peking and he had no competence to settle anything without reference to the capital. Negotiations are hopeless and in such circumstances Mr. Consul-General Hagiwara has declined to continue them and is on his way back to Japan. This defect in credentials is an old story so far as Chinese officials are concerned.

The Fiji Shimpō says that the Japanese Government is determined not to yield a point to China in the matter of the Chien-tao problem. The occasion will be seized to settle once for all this long-standing question. We may mention here that there appears to be some uncertainty about the romanization of this name. A Tokyo contemporary transliterates the first character as "Hsien," but so far as our information goes the proper spelling should be "Chien." The chief difference of opinion, according to Tokyo journals, turns upon the name of a river. If the Chinese interpretation of the name be accepted, the main river Tumen forms the boundary between the territories of the two Empires and the whole of the Chien-tao region will thus belong to China. But the Koreans claim that not the main river but one of its tributaries constitutes the boundary. The main river and the tributary have each the same appellation phonetically, but the ideographs used in writing them differ. In the year 1712 a commission was appointed by the two Powers for the purpose of delimiting the frontier and the commissioners set up a series of marks, several of which are still extant. On the central of these marks there is an inscription which mentions the name of the river, and the characters used are those designating the tributary not the main stream. Thus the only tangible evidence available goes to support the Korean contention.

THE HAKODATE FIRE.

August 31.

The problem of paying the insurance money in the sequel of the Hakodate conflagration still occupies public attention. It is now thought certain that the five principal companies will faithfully discharge their obligations, which aggregate 3,610,000 yen, but the competence of the smaller companies to be equally honest is much doubted. It will be remembered that in July last the big companies combined to raise their rates of insurance, and it is now said that the small companies took advantage of this measure to secure business by cut rates. Thus they wrote a number of policies in Hakodate and retribution has come quickly and sharply. These small companies and their liabilities in connexion with the fire are reported to be as follows:—The Osaka Company 700,000 yen; the Nisshu Company 700,000 yen; the Naigai Company 400,000 yen; the Ryokan Company 300,000 yen, and the Yamato Company 200,000 yen. If these five companies fail to pay up, it will mean that the Hakodate insurers will be plundered to the extent of over two million yen. The general impression seems to be that these small companies will go to the wall, but that the money market will not be sensibly affected by the diversion of 3 or 4 million yen into the hands of the Hakodate people. To us it seems rather a fine fear that the money market should feel this incident, considering that the whole amount at stake is only three or four hundred thousand pounds. If the insurance companies have any considerable quantity of their reserves lodged in the hands of small banks, these latter may be embarrassed, but that should represent the sum of the trouble. It is to the unfortunate inhabitants of Hakodate that our sympathy goes out.

Great interest attaches to the question of fire insurance in connexion with the recent disastrous conflagration in Hakodate. We have already alluded to this matter more than once, but in view of its importance we now quote figures which are said to be official. In the first place we have the following statistics with regard to the five companies principally affected:—

Name of Company.	Capital in Yen.	Amount paid up.	Amount remaining to be paid up.
Meiji Kasai.....	1,000,000	250,000	750,000
Tokyo Kasai.....	10,000,000	2,500,000	7,500,000
Nippon Kasai.....	3,000,000	750,000	2,250,000
Yokohama Kasai.....	5,000,000	1,250,000	3,750,000
Kyodo Kasai.....	5,000,000	1,250,000	3,750,000

Then we have the liabilities of these companies in connexion with the fire as follows:—

Name of Company.	Policies.	Reserves.
Meiji.....	540,000	2,800,000
Tokyo.....	2,000,000	1,600,000
Nippon.....	1,000,000	1,400,000
Yokohama.....	300,000	1,300,000
Kyodo.....	270,000	—

These companies are all expected to pay up, but it will be a very hard struggle, especially as some of the reserves are not in immediately liquifiable form. There are other smaller companies which will probably go bankrupt. All kinds of reports are circulated. The amount of re-insurance effected seems to have been very small. One result of the incident will probably be the inauguration of a stricter system of official surveillance.

September 1.

There seems to be little room for doubt that the Hakodate fire will prove the ruin of several of the small insurance companies. Their total reserve funds would not be available to discharge their liabilities. Even the five big companies will be much embarrassed, though the general belief is that they will meet all legitimate demands fairly and squarely. This has produced something like a panic on the Stock Exchange. It is apprehended that whatever portion of their reserve these various companies have invested in shares will have to be realized forthwith, and thus a large quantity of scrip will be forced into the market. It looks at present as though prices will be pushed down to the neighbourhood of the extreme point which they reached on the 17th of June last, for holders are scrambling to unload before the insurance companies come into the market.

Of course some banks will also have to meet heavy calls in connexion with these insurance payments, but on the whole the state of affairs in the money market at the close of August may be described as easy. Indeed, when one comes to consider that the total sum involved does not exceed half a million sterling, one is at a loss to understand why such a large influence should be apprehended.

September 3.

One result of the insurance question which is now perturbing the money market is expected to be that a strict system of government supervision will be inaugurated with regard to the manner in which fire insurance companies invest their reserves. A life insurance company stands in a very different category from a fire insurance one, the former being virtually guaranteed against such violent and wholesale shocks as the Hakodate conflagration. But a fire insurance company must be prepared at any moment to liquidate its reserves, and that is said to be precisely what some of the Japanese companies have failed to provide for. They are alleged to have thought mainly of the profit to be gained from investment when placing their reserves, some even going so far as to lend money on mining property. There ought certainly to be a law delimiting the uses to which a fire insurance company devotes its reserves. Of course the loss of credit that must follow inability to draw upon a company's reserves in time of emergency, constitutes in itself a potent protection against such abuses, but if the action of that remedy has to be awaited, the unfortunate people who have taken out policies become the corpora vitia of the process. This incident will give a distinct setback to the development of insurance business in Japan, for although it should increase public confidence in the companies which met their obligations fully, it will debilitate those companies to such an extent as almost to cripple them for further enterprise.

September 4.

It appears probable that when the accounts come to be accurately made up, the liabilities of the insurance companies on account of the Hakodate fire may not prove as large as was anticipated. The commissioners despatched by the insurance companies to make local investigations, have sent in a report carried down to the 2nd inst. which involves a total amount of 2,360,000 yen. This may be increased of course by later inquiries, but it is not likely to be doubled, whereas the original estimate published by the press was in the neighbourhood of 5 millions.

September 5.

It appears that the figures originally published with regard to the liabilities of the insurance companies in connexion with the Hakodate fire represented not the losses actually incurred but the total of the policies issued. It is now alleged that the sums to be paid by the companies will not exceed 2½ million yen. It was generally apprehended on the Stock Exchange that these companies would be obliged to throw a quantity of shares upon the market in order to meet their liabilities. But the Fiji Shimpō emphatically denies that any such fear really exists. Nearly all the principal companies have ready money reserves considerably in excess of the losses incurred by them. These reserves are lodged in the banks and can be withdrawn at any moment. As illustrating this we quote the following figures:—

Company.	Losses.	Ready-money Reserves
Tokyo.....	1,020,000 yen	2,107,000 yen.
Meiji.....	550,000 "	389,000 "
Nippon.....	470,000 "	1,048,000 "
Kyodo.....	90,000 "	796,000 "
Yokohama.....	70,000 "	1,439,000 "
Totals....	2,200,000 yen	5,842,000 yen.

It will be observed that in the case of one company only do the losses exceed the ready-money reserves. But that company is the Meiji which has behind it the strongest backing of capitalists in Japan. On the whole the idea that shares will be dumped upon the market by these great companies may be dismissed as chimerical.

NAVAL.

The building of warships at Kure seems to be proceeding with great rapidity. The first-class cruiser Izuma, which was recently launched, is now receiving her armament and will be ready for her trial trip in October. The first-class cruiser Ibuki, 14,600 tons, was laid down on the 22nd of April, in succession to the battleship Aki, and it is expected that she will be launched within six months from the day on which her construction was commenced. Her armament will occupy another six months and she will be ready for sea in April next year. The completion of a first-class cruiser of some 15,000 tons within a year from the date of laying her keel is a feat that can be surpassed in England only. The Japanese have now built two line-of-battleships and two first-class cruisers, so that they may be said to have fully established their title to competence in this class of work. It was in 1904, the opening year of the war with Russia, that the idea of constructing line-of-battleships and first-class cruisers in Japanese dockyards was first mooted. The foreign public received the news with considerable surprise and some incredulity, but in this matter as in many other adoptions of foreign material civilization the Japanese have shown extraordinary aptitude. We may mention that the Kurama, sister-ship to the Ibuki, is now building at Yokosuka. Both vessels are said to be fitted with all latest improvements in naval architecture and with special features suggested by the recent war. They will have a speed of 21 knots.

CHINA.

The Japanese Chargé d'Affaires in Peking has been making strong representations to the Chinese Government with the object of obtaining the removal of the grain export veto. His efforts have not been crowned with any success. Indeed, it is said that he has failed to obtain even an answer. China's policy in this matter will be fatal to the development of northern Manchuria.

It is again affirmed confidently that the very disappointing delay which is taking place in the settlement of Manchurian problems is due entirely to the covert influence of ex Governor-General Chou. This official is supposed to have taken offence at the attitude assumed by Viceroy Hsu, his successor at Mukden, inasmuch as the various problems which had been dealt with by Chou and which came into Hsu's hands unsettled, seem likely to be solved under the new régime by concessions which Chou himself had resolutely refused to make. The ex-Governor General is accordingly misrepresenting the new Viceroy's action to the Throne, and instead of proceeding to his viceroyalty in Szchuan, is dividing his time between Peking and Tientsin and pouring accusations against Hsu into the ears of high officials.

The Japanese are planning the construction of a new fishing village at Liaofu near Port Arthur. A sum of 5,000 yen per annum is to be expended during the next five years for the purpose of building houses. These with their attached lands will be rented free to Japanese fishermen, and after a certain number of years those that have been signally successful as fishermen will be recognised as owners of the houses and lands without any payment.

It is stated that the Chinese Government recently despatched 30 spies to Japan to report upon the political tendencies of the Chinese youths studying in this country. The report was so unfavourable that Peking is said to have decided to recall all the students, some 10,000 in number. The students have sent delegates to Peking to combat the misrepresentations of these spies, and it is added that a great number of them have resolved not to obey the order of recall if it be definitely issued.

China appears to be even more perturbed than was originally supposed with reference to the ententes recently concluded. Leading journals like the Shipao and the Jipao, as translated by the Nichi Nichi Shinbun, write in an exceedingly strong strain, and it must be confessed that there is a good deal of reason in what they say. Their main point is that if the Great Powers regarded China as competent to protect herself, they would not think of making agreements to respect her integrity. Evidently they regard her as impotent for purposes of self preservation, and therefore, without even paying her the compliment of consulting her, they sign covenants pledging themselves to preserve her integrity, while, at the same time, recognising their own spheres of influence within her borders. What that means is clearly indicated by history. Equal opportunity signifies that everything granted to one Power must also be granted to another. That is the first corollary of protection based on equality of opportunity. Then follows the guarding of concessions thus obtained, and this process of guarding inevitably leads to curtailment of the sovereign rights of the lord of the soil, which curtailment, once commenced, has a faculty of perpetual growth, so that the so-called preservation of integrity ultimately becomes an instrument of aggression. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance meant the alienation of the Yangtze valley from the Chinese Empire. The Franco-Japanese Entente meant the alienation of Liaotung and the southern regions of China. The Russo-Japanese Entente meant the alienation of Mongolia and Sinkiang. China has had plenty of object lessons. She has seen France in Annam, Japan in Korea, and England in Burma. She ought to know perfectly well what is before her, and ought to understand fully that when outside Powers pledge each other to preserve her integrity, they practically announce their conviction of her inability to take care of herself.

The above is but a faint outline of the writings of the two papers mentioned. A telegram to the Mainichi Dempo may here be quoted. It says that one effect of these ententes has been to alienate the sympathies of high local officials, with the result that Japanese enterprises are encountering all sorts of obstacles in China.

Possibly all this has something to do with the altered attitude of Viceroy Hsu towards the questions now under discussion at Mukden. The Viceroy is said to have asked that all signatures of documents shall be suspended until everything is settled. This may have the effect of reopening problems which were supposed to have been fully solved, and indeed the construction put upon the Viceroy's altered attitude is that Peking has refused to ratify his arrangements on the ground of excessive yielding.

Telegrams to the Fiji Shimpō and Asahi Shinbun state that the Chinese Government, having awakened to the disadvantage of bartering the sovereignty of Kwantung for the pleasure of enforcing a frivolous grain veto, have decided that the embargo upon the import of cereals into the leased territory in Manchuria shall be abolished. The abolition has not actually been proclaimed but its publication is expected in a few days.

Important administrative changes are announced from Peking. Viceroys Yuan and Chang become members of the Cabinet, the portfolio of Foreign Affairs also being transmitted to the former. Mr. Lu Haikwan leaves the Foreign Office and becomes High Commissioner of Customs. This of course means that the two great Viceroys cease to be local satraps and enter the Central Government. The tenure of the portfolio of Foreign Affairs by ex-Viceroy Yuan is a most important event. The next great question awaiting solution in Peking is the choice of an heir to the Throne. Rumour says that the Empress Dowager contemplates the nomination of the son of Prince Chun, now a child of seventeen months of age.

Shanghai telegraphs that three new Orders in Council have been issued. One relates merely to transferring to the British Consul-General in Seoul the judicial authority hitherto vested in the British Representative at the Korean Court. The other two provide for considerable extensions of the jurisdiction of consular courts in China.

H. E. Yang Shih-ch'i, Vice-President of the Ministry of Agriculture, Works and Commerce, who was recently appointed to proceed to the islands of the South Pacific for the purpose of visiting Chinese residing there, in order to tell them of the Imperial solicitude for their welfare, and to revive their patriotism for the Fatherland, has handed over his post to Chi Lin (Manchu), who will act in his stead in the Ministry during his absence in the South. H. E. Yang Shih-ch'i is a younger brother of H. E. Yang Shih-hsiang, Governor of Shantung.

The Sinwēnpao states that it is reported from Peking that the Waiwup in the negotiations with the British Minister concerning the question of indemnifying British subjects for losses sustained during the riots in Shanghai about two years ago, is willing to waive its rights and pay the indemnity as a preliminary step.

A somewhat crude though sufficiently impudent attempt to rob a till in the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank was made yesterday morning by a Chinese, said the N.C. Daily News of Aug. 29th. It appears that a Portuguese clerk was sent from the foreign department, where a shortage of silver obtained, to the Compradores' department, with an order for $500 in silver. The shroff to whom the clerk applied had not the required sum in his tills and, in company with the clerk, he went to the strong-room for an additional supply. As soon as the shroff had left the apartment a well dressed Chinese who had evidently been watching his opportunity, slipped in through the wicket door, seated himself on the shroff's stool, pocketed fifty dollars lying on the desk and then proceeded to examine the nearest till in which he discovered a roll of notes amounting to $2,000. Evidently with an idea of disarming any suspicion which might be felt by the remaining eleven shroffs who were seated in the apartment and were apparently oblivious of the irregular proceedings occurring beside them, the visitor calmly began to sort the roll of notes and transfer them singly to his pockets. While he was engaged at this lucrative pastime, a coolie employee of the Bank approached the desk to speak to the shroff; the strange face almost caused him to withdraw, but the unusual activity of the pseudo-shroff convinced him that something was wrong and the alarm was given. After the money he had laid hands on had been extracted from the culprit's pockets, he was hailed off to the Central Police Station where he was charged with having stolen the sum of $50. The accused refused to give any information concerning himself beyond the fact that he is a resident of Pootung.

H. E. Lu Cheng-hsiang, Chinese Minister at the Hague, is stated to have presented a strongly worded protest at the action of the members of the Peace Conference in putting down China as a third-class Power. His Excellency declares that as China has paid her quota towards the expenses of the Conference in the same ratio as one of the first-class Powers, he does not see the justice of placing his country in the list of third-class Powers.

At a recent conference of Ministers in Peking, attended among others by the Grand Secretaries Lu Ch'uan-lin and Shih (Imperial clansman), Tai Hung-tze, President of the Ministry of Rites and Yang Ch'ing, Manchu President of the Ministry of Education, it was proposed to abolish the Manchu garrisons in the provinces and put into immediate practice intermarriage between Chinese and Manchus, as the first tangible step towards smoothing away racial jealousies. These propositions were heartily endorsed by their Imperial Highnesses Prince Chun (brother of the Emperor) and Prince Ching, the senior member of the Imperial Clan, when suddenly Tieh Liang, the reactionary President of the Ministry of War, strongly objected to the first proposition on the ground that this would be taking away the livelihood from the Manchu garrisons—each adult Manchu gets a full allowance of four taels per mensem—and that it would be disastrous to act too hastily in the matter. Finally he declared that it was the duty of each one present to protect the privileges of the Manchus that had been the aim of former Emperors of the dynasty. The Manchus present seemed struck by Tieh Liang's arguments and the proposition was laid on the table for the time.

FINANCIAL.

It appears to be the opinion of experts that the damage done to the rice crop by the recent floods is comparatively small. The regions chiefly affected were not the great rice-producing districts of the country and even where the inundations were most felt, it does not follow that the crop was by any means destroyed. The two varieties known as late wase and early naka te being already in flower, have undoubtedly suffered, but by far the greater part of the rice throughout the country was not yet in flower and consequently may be considered safe. Much depends of course on the weather for the next few days. At present the appearances are favourable though it can not be said that a settled condition prevails. Thus on the 29th instant there were no less than five centres of depression in the Far East. Of these, that which came nearest to Japan was one in the vicinity of Shikoku, which dissipated itself, however, in a few hours. The second was in Korea, the third at Shanghai, the fourth on the south of the Riukiu Archipelago, and the fifth, a reflex depression, was in Koshiu but it proved a trifling affair. The meteorological authorities are therefore disposed to view the situation favourably.

Of course the Stock Exchange has been more or less heavily affected by all these recent untoward events. Especially on the morning of the 29th inst., when the climatic conditions threatened to become again unfavourable, and when the effect likely to be exercised on the money market by the floods and the Hakodate fire was estimated in a pessimistic manner, selling became the order of the day and all shares showed a strongly downward tendency. There does not appear to be much hope of a speedy recovery of tone. It is noticeable in this context that dealers in rice also took a gloomy view of the weather on the morning of the 29th and the price of this cereal tended upwards.

By way of contrast Japanese bonds have taken a strong upward leap on the market of London Paris and Berlin. This is thought to be due to the gradual cessation of the Wall Street panic, but it is also probably due in some degree to the fact that the rate of interest ruling in London has begun to fall.

Settling day on the Tokyo Exchange passed off quietly on the 30th ultimo. Some idea of the extraordinary depression in the market during August may be gathered from the fact that the total number of shares settled on that day was only 48,800, representing 3,107,830 yen, being at the average rate of 63.68 yen per share. Considering that fully this number of shares has been frequently disposed of in a single day's operations on the Exchange, one can easily see how slack the market was. The transactions recorded for settlement at the end of September are said to be already more than twice as large as those for August, but even then they are nothing compared with the volume of business in ordinary times. In this context the Asahi Shimbun notes the fact that even at the most depressed period of the market during the war with Russia, the month's transactions were 25,760 larger as to number of shares and 1,440,000 yen larger as to monetary value than was the case in August. It may now be said that a condition of debacle has continued almost without interruption for six months.

The customs returns for the month of August show an excess of 4,783,000 yen on the side of exports owing principally to large sales of raw silk, habutaye, and tea.

Japanese stocks still continue to rise in the London market. It becomes plainer every day that the comparative ill success of the South Manchuria Railway loan is not to be taken as a general indication of the mood of British capitalists towards Japan. What really seems to have happened was that Englishmen showed no special alacrity to put up a large sum which was to be spent in the main for paying for American manufactures.

The Chuo Shimbun has been at the trouble of sending a reporter to each of the insurance companies to make inquiries. The results are given in the case of the Nihon Kasai only as yet. The policies issued by that Company in Hakodate represent a total of 870,000 yen, but the value of the property destroyed was only 470,000 yen, and of this 40,000 had been reinsured, so that the Company's total loss does not exceed 430,000, and as its reserves represent 1,600,000 yen, its position is perfectly sound and it is rapidly discharging its liabilities through the medium of the Bank of Japan.

The issue of 15 million worth of Treasury bills proved a failure, so far as the general public was concerned, and the Bank of Japan had to take over the greater part of the bills. An attempt made by the Hypothec Bank to float 5 millions worth of premium-bearing bonds of small dimensions has also been unsuccessful. From these facts it may be inferred that the easy state of the money market recently spoken of as likely to exist this autumn has not arrived. This state of affairs is attributed to two causes which are quite normal, namely, the demand for money in connexion with the autumn silk crop and the need of capital for laying in the winter's stock of goods; and to two abnormal factors, namely the recent floods and the Hakodate fire.

The Tokyo stock market opened very weak on the morning of the 2nd, but showed some slight signs of recovery at the afternoon session. The Kanegafuchi Spinning Company's shares have suffered a notable collapse in the last few days. It is supposed that a large quantity of the Company's raw products and semi-manufactured articles were more or less destroyed by the floods, and that its machinery also suffered from the same cause so that some months must elapse before it can resume business on the old footing. This is probably a considerable exaggeration. It need hardly be said that the shares of the Tokyo Fire Insurance Company have fallen ten points since the Hakodate fire. It is characteristic of the Japanese stock market that the stones and the jewels suffer almost equally in a debacle. Hence there is nothing remarkable in the fact that a general decline in quotations took place during the days immediately succeeding the recent calamities.

The export of silk has been one of the great features of this year so far. It was supposed for a moment that the recent inundations would affect the export injuriously, but the actual result has been an increase of nearly 100 yen per bale in price owing to interruption of the supply.

The Bank of Formosa held its half-yearly meeting on the 2nd inst., and declared a dividend of 10 per cent., after placing a sum of 122,000 yen to its reserves and carrying forward a sum of 98,000 yen to its next account. In the course of his speech the President stated that the exports from Formosa during the half year amounted to 14,800,000 and the imports to 14,800,000 yen, making a grand total of 29,300,000 yen.

The various favourable conditions—exceptionally favourable indeed they may be called—have produced a slight effect upon the stock market. But it is only very slight and can not yet be regarded as a reaction from the minor debacle of the past ten days. As illustrating this, we may mention that the shares of the Exchange itself, though now rising slowly, are still nearly 30 yen below the point to which they had climbed with great difficulty in the middle of August. Tokyo newspapers, though always optimistic in these matters, speak in a very guarded tone about present conditions, and in truth it must be confessed that there are as yet no symptoms of the situation emerging from the unprecedented depression which has brooded over the market ever since the end of March.

The big shipping company which was to have been organized under the name of the Nippon Kisen Kwaisha, seems not unlikely to fail upon the threshold. Its original capital was fixed at 30 million yen, which was afterwards reduced to 20 millions, and there is talk of reducing it now to ten. Rumour says that some of the promoters themselves have not paid in their instalments, and in these circumstances it is impossible to take action against ordinary subscribers who have similarly defaulted. The Company is expected to hold a meeting towards the close of the month when its future will be decided upon.

Mr. Loonen representing the French Syndicate, is stated by Tokyo journals to have been brought into contact with Mr. Takahashi, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, by Mr. Masujima. Mr. Loonen stated the intention of the Syndicate to invest money in Japanese industries and asked for Mr. Takahashi's assistance in making the necessary investigations, which assistance was readily promised. Mr. Takahashi, as quoted by the Fiji Shimpō, says that the time is eminently unfavourable for raising loans abroad, money being in keen demand for various enterprises. He contradicts the idea, however, that foreign capital is no longer procurable for Japan. If the Japanese can make it worth while for capital to come their way, it certainly will come. The only thing is that capitalists must be fully assured as to the nature of the undertaking on account of which they lend funds. They must clearly see a stable source for the payment of both interest and principal, and they will have nothing to do with promoters whose responsibilities cease so soon as a loan is contracted.

The tone of the Stock Exchange on the 4th and 5th inst. showed a slight recovery of firmness in several lines. The shares of the spinning companies, however, continued weak, especially those of the Kanegafuchi. The cause of this is to be sought of course in the injury said to have been done to the factories by the recent inundations. Tokyo journals have at last become very wary in their predictions about the state of the market. They maintained their optimistic tone for quite a remarkably long time, and it is no wonder that at length they have become diffident. The general view seems to be that investors are watching the weather, for an interval of seven days remains between this and the 220th day, a time of great importance to the rice crop.

It is becoming more and more evident that much of the talk about the liabilities of insurance companies in connexion with the Hakodate fire was greatly exaggerated. The latest figures published on the authority of the Jiji Shimpō show that the payments which will have to be made by the five leading companies aggregate only 1,900,000 yen. This can hardly be called a considerable sum, and we are strongly disposed to think that much of the commotion made about the incident was deliberately planned by the bears on the Stock Exchange. If that be so, these gentlemen have reaped a large profit at the expense of nervous holders.

FORMOSA.

The operations in Formosa seem to have come to an end, the task contemplated by the authorities having been concluded satisfactorily. Recapitulating the course of events, we find that the Aiyu troops, numbering 1700 in all, set out in two bodies from Toyen and Shinko, respectively, on the 5th of May and that their operations lasted more or less continuously until the middle of August. In the beginning of July they had their hardest work to do, but they soon broke down the resistance of the savages, and from that time their progress was rapid, a junction between the two forces being effected and the enemy's strongholds being captured. On the 20th of August, at a place called Taikakan, the ceremony of disbanding the Aiyu force was carried out with considerable éclat. Their casualties throughout the campaign have been 250, including 69 killed. The funeral rites of the latter were solemnly performed.

This ceremony, according to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, is not to be interpreted as meaning that the object of the movement has been fully obtained. There was never any idea of such a rapid achievement. On the contrary, the intention is to proceed leisurely and steadily year by year until the whole of the savage region is brought under Japanese sway. The advance which commenced in May has resulted in the occupation of a large slice of territory which is said to be exceedingly rich in camphor forests. Of course the problem of dealing with the savages after their surrender presents many difficulties. They are absolutely ignorant, not even keeping count of their own ages, and the first desideratum would be to supply some form of education. That, however, can not be achieved at once, and the step which the Japanese will immediately take is said to be that farming tools will be supplied to the savages and agricultural methods taught.

THE QUESTION OF CHINESE LABOURERS.

It is now explained, with reference to the Chinese labourers recently employed in Kyushu, that the formalities prescribed by an imperial ordinance in 1899 were not complied with. The ordinance directs that Chinese labourers must not be employed in the interior of Japan without the preliminary consent of the local prefect, and this of course involves an application from the prefect to the Department of Home Affairs under whose jurisdiction he is. But the Home Office was not approached at all in this matter, neither was the prefect. In fact, strange as it must seem, the local authorities had no cognisance whatever of what was going on. They did not make the discovery until the receipt of a query from the Department of Home Affairs. Orders were then issued for the dismissal of the labourers, of whom there were 280, and the question now is, how they are to be returned to China. The contractor by whom they were engaged is disbursing a sum of 60 yen daily for their maintenance at present, but their return passage is the great query. We read in Japanese papers that another batch of 50 Chinese labourers reached Nagasaki on the 2nd inst. under the auspices of the Tairen-Liaotung Company. These men tried to gain admittance to a Japanese inn but they were in such a dirty condition that the innkeeper would not receive them and they finally obtained lodging at the house of a countryman. Their case quickly came before the Governor of Nagasaki and he interdicted their employment.

It having been found, according to Tokyo journals, that the employment of Chinese navvies for purposes of railway construction in Kyushu is contrary to the regulations for the control of Chinese labourers, issued when Count Okuma was Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, the employing company has been obliged to dispense with the services of the men. The navvies, thus thrown out of work and being virtually resourceless, are said to be in a state of great embarrassment. They made application to the Chinese Consulate in Nagasaki and the question was forwarded thence to the Legation in Tokyo, but of course nothing can be done except to require that the railway company which originally engaged the men shall provide passage for them to return to China.

THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF ASSASSINATION.

It is very regrettable that the Tokyo press should have given so much prominence to the Maeda case. Day after day long columns have appeared giving minute details bearing on the whole of Maeda's past life. Every effort has been made to blacken the man's name as much as possible. The natural result of all this is of course the exaltation of the assassin to the rank of a hero. Apropos of this subject the Jiji Shimpō has a leading article bearing the above title. It would seem that a new Historical Society known as the Shidankai (史談會) has recently been adopting measures for adding the names of certain Meiji assassins to the roll of Japan's modern heroes. The Society wishes to see them henceforth referred to as 志士 Shishi, a title which was always coveted by Japan's finest warriors. With a view to silencing objections to their scheme, the members of this Society have consulted with Count Okuma and with members of the Okubo and Mori families as to whether they have any objection to seeing assassins raised to the rank of heroes. Count Okuma is said to have stated that he felt some sympathy for Kurujima, the man who tried to kill him. What reply was given by the other persons concerned respecting Shimada and Nishino, is not known. The Jiji suggests that the Shidankai apply at once to the Government for posthumous honours for their phantom-heroes. The Shidankai, our contemporary premises, may have been influenced by the generous manner in which the Government treated the last defenders of the Bakufu and General Saigō, and other breakers of the law, but surely assassins like Kurujima and Nishino are unworthy of being raised to the rank of the loyal defenders of a form of Government that had lasted over two centuries. The Jiji, however, is strongly of opinion that in past times the Government has acted most unwisely in condoning offences or conferring posthumous honours on transgressors of the country's laws, simply on the ground that the motives of the law-breakers were good. No Government can afford to display such leniency where crimes have been committed. If the Shidankai is blamed for its action, it will of course be ready with the retort that the assassins of Tokugawa officials were regarded as heroes by the Meiji Governments and posthumously honoured. There has been far too much sentimentalism in the policy hitherto followed by the Government in this matter, says the Jiji. It amounts to the encouragement of assassination.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

Those of us who can look back—and it is not a very long retrospect—to the comparatively early days of Japan's over-sea commerce, remember vividly that the total revenue accruing to her from customs dues did not exceed four or five million yen annually. That was in the time of the old tariff when the average impost was about 2½ per cent. What a contrast such figures present to the customs returns for the current year! During the first seven months of 1907 the total revenue accruing from this source was 27,473,874 yen, against 23,207,379 yen for the corresponding period of 1906, and 19,939,722 yen for the same term in 1905. In fact, the mere increase of the revenue during the first seven months of 1907, as compared with 1906, was equal to the double of the total revenue that used to be collected in a whole year a quarter of a century ago. When we add to this that the sake tax now yields an income of 60 millions, posts and telegraphs 30 millions, State monopolies 30 millions, and State railways 10 millions, we find that although the income of the Treasury has undergone signal augmentation, direct taxes have not contributed proportionately to that result. Let us take the two years 1886 and 1906. We obtain the following:—

	1886.	1906.
Sake Tax	13 millions.	59 millions.
Customs	4 "	32 "
Posts and Telegraphs ..	3½ "	30½ "
State Monopolies	0 "	30 "
State Railways	1 "	10 "
Total	21½ "	161½ "

In 1887 the total revenue of the State was only 79½ million yen, so that the increment alone in 20 years from indirect taxes was more than the double of the whole revenue formerly collected. These facts are important in the context of any discussion as to the increase of Japan's fiscal burdens.

DEATH OF MR. KUGA MINORU.

We regret to have to announce the death of Mr. Kuga Minoru, which took place on the 2nd inst. in his villa at Shichirigahama. Mr. Kuga was proprietor and editor of the Nippon Shimbun, which journal he handed over to Mr. Ito last year owing to his own failing health. He died of the disease which claims so many victims in Japan, namely, pneumonia. Mr. Kuga was among the most eminent of modern Japanese journalists. His decease took place at the early age of fifty-one.

RICHARD MANSFIELD.

The news of the death of Richard Mansfield, the well-known American actor, comes as no surprise. When he left England in the early part of the summer he was in a desperate state of health, due primarily to over-work. Though beginning his career on the stage in England he made his name and fame in the United States, his repertoire extending from Koko in "The Mikado" to the central figure in Shakespeare's "Richard III." Much to his chagrin he met with no success in London commensurate with his great abilities. It is said that he attributed this to the jealousy of Sir Henry Irving, who set all the leading critics against him; but the tale may be dismissed as without foundation. True it is that Mansfield when he played in England failed to hit the popular taste and his failure no doubt induced him to believe that he was working in a hostile and prejudiced environment. That London is not quite so small-minded in the matter of American players has been demonstrated again and again from the days of Miss Ada Rehan's successes to those of Miss Edna May. Poor Mansfield died a disappointed man, but his memory will linger long in the land where he reaped his greatest triumphs.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

On the 29th inst. very circumstantial telegrams were received in Tokyo to the effect that Canada had formally approached Japan with a proposal for renewing the old convention under which the number of Japanese labourers admitted to Canada was restricted to 600 annually. Considering that no such convention exists, this story was evidently baseless and it has now been semi-officially denied.

It is now denied that Mr. Nishizawa was the discoverer of the island in the South Sea to which we referred in our last issue. It was discovered in 1902 by Mr. Mizutani who visited it again in the spring of the present year, and came to the conclusion that although the island would well recoup development, a capital of 100,000 yen at least would be required. At any rate the island is marked in the Times atlas as Pratas Island. The question of what power it appertains to may be difficult to decide. When Japan took possession of Formosa she extended her dominion to the 21st parallel of latitude, and when America took possession of the Philippines she extended her dominion to the 20th parallel. Thus the space between the 20th and the 21st parallels becomes a no-man's land, and the island of Pratas is said to be in north latitude 20° 45'.

The Fiji Shimpō has long been of opinion that the Government railways are badly managed, and in a recent issue it reverts to the subject, pointing to statistics to show that during the months since the Government took over certain lines, the accidents on those lines have increased to an alarming extent. Most of these have been the result of carelessness on the part of the Government employees. Such was the collision that took place at Fukagawa on the Northern Trunk Line on the 20th, resulting in the injury of 20 passengers and three engineers. The Government has made excuses for itself, but the Fiji is not satisfied with them. According to information which has reached the Fiji many of the employees on the railways are required to remain on duty for 24 hours at a stretch, the consequence being that during the last few hours of this period they are too wearied to take much notice of anything. The imposition of such long hours of service the Fiji deems to be cruel, and it adds that there is no cause for surprise if accidents occur as a result of this arrangement. The accident at Sakagawa is reported to have been brought about by the negligence of the Station-master. The various mishaps that have occurred may doubtless be traced to divers causes, but it is undeniable that their general tendency is to shake public confidence in the Government management of railways. The Tokyo Asahi Shinbun has expressed itself in equally strong terms on the same topic.

It is said that the Japanese Government is of opinion that some new legislation bearing on the management of workshops, the employment of labour, compensation for injuries received, and provision for old age pensions is called for and that a Bill bearing on this will be introduced during the next session of the Diet. The Fiji Shimpō, while admitting the inadequacy of the existing laws relating to the employment of labour, is strongly opposed to Japan's adoption of the German insurance system. This system was inaugurated by Bismarck with the object of taking the wind out of socialistic sails. Judged from all points of view, the system cannot be pronounced a success even in Germany. The disadvantages attending it are, the Fiji thinks, greater than any benefits it has conferred on the lower orders. But the relations of workmen to employers in this country are so entirely different to what they are in the West that in the conception of our contemporary legislation on European Continental lines would certainly do more harm than good. Such an extreme measure as compulsory insurance of employees should never be contemplated in this country.

As yet we have no very definite information about the prospects of the rice crop. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce has published a return which indicates a signally favourable state of affairs, but as the records on which this report is based were made up previously to the recent floods, the figures must be considerably corrected. The latest information is contained in the columns of the Shogyo Shimpō. This journal issued inquiries by telegraph to 42 Prefectures out of the 46 in Japan and to 86 minor divisions. Forty-two answers were received. Out of these, 25 were eminently favourable, 10 were unfavourable and 7 were neutral. Even in the case of unfavourable replies the indications were not very pronounced. Out of the whole number only two speak of a harvest inferior to the average. From Kyushu, which is the great rice-producing centre, and Shikoku, which stands next in that category, there comes a universal chorus of satisfaction, the lowest estimate in any locality being 20 per cent. above the average and the highest 50 per cent. The rice quotations on the Tokyo market, which a few days ago rose as high as something over 18 yen, broke on the afternoon of the 2nd and fell to 15.94 yen for November delivery.

Such of the Japanese journals as have thus far discussed the Anglo-Russian Entente recognise that it practically removes all sources of actual or potential friction between the high contracting parties in Central Asia. Russian enterprises in that part of the world are to be recognised by England and to be guaranteed against any interference on her part. Per contra Tibet is to remain in statu quo; Afghanistan is to be left entirely within Great Britain's sphere, and Persia is to be divided into two portions, the southern being regarded as England's sphere and the northern as Russia's, an arrangement which gives England control of the Persian Gulf and disposes of all troublesome questions about the building of railways by Russia. Thus the frontier of India is practically secured, and inasmuch as by the Anglo-Japanese Alliance Japan made herself collectively responsible for the protection of India, the position has been correspondingly lightened for this Empire. Taking this view, the leading Japanese journals enthusiastically welcome the Entente as removing from the stage the two great figures which seemed to be driven by necessity to collide sooner or later and thus to disturb the peace of the world. These journals do not pretend to think that a condition of perennial calm has been inaugurated, but they do believe that for some years to come the Powers concerned with Asiatic affairs may "sleep with high pillows," as the Japanese saying is.

Marquis Ito and Count Okuma met again on the evening of the 4th inst. by invitation of the Dojin-kai, an association formed for the purpose of extending the blessings of modern medicine to Korea. The two statesmen are said to have had a most interesting conversation, lasting two hours. They recalled the old times in which they both played such conspicuous parts, and it seems that they have renewed the thoroughly friendly relations which existed between them prior to 1881. This remarkable rapprochement is regarded by some publicists as prelude to the inclusion of Count Okuma in the ranks of the Elder Statesmen. It has indeed been a matter for surprise among foreign observers that Count Okuma has not hitherto been reckoned among the most influential and able advisors of the Throne. His record certainly entitles him to that honour though his political connexions may have been open to criticism.

It appears probable that the 60,000 books contributed by English well-wishers to furnish a library in Tokyo will be temporarily deposited in the building now in course of construction by the Tokyo Municipality in Hibiya Park. The original idea was to build a special library for these books, but funds have not been forthcoming, and as the Municipality's library will be able to accommodate 100,000 volumes, only 40,000 of which have thus far been collected, there is just room for the 60,000 books which constitutes the Gordon-Takakusu collection. It is evident, however, that this can only be a temporary arrangement, especially as the building erected by the Municipality is not either fire-proof or earthquake proof.

Tokyo papers say that the new Commercial treaty with Russia and the Fishery Convention will be submitted to the Japanese Privy Council on the 7th or 8th inst. and will probably be published on the 9th inst. The protocols, however, that accompany the main documents are said to be very long, and consequently they will not be in the hands of the public before the end of the month.

The Kansei Horse Improvement Company will hold its first race meeting on November 17th at the Nishimiya course, Osaka. The capital of the association is registered at half a million yen, a quarter of which is paid up.

THE CHIENTAO QUESTION.

THE Chientao problem seems not unlikely to cause some trouble. Owing to the supineness of Korea's attitude during many years, and owing also, perhaps, to the filial feeling that she always harboured towards China, the Middle Kingdom has gradually been able to establish a system of semi-effective administration throughout the region. This of course goes some way towards establishing a right of tenure, but on the other hand there is historical proof that the region has always been regarded as Korean territory, and there is also the indisputable fact that the large majority of the inhabitants are Korean subjects. It appears that when Colonel Saito arrived in Chientao—an event which we now infer to have been quite recent, not in November last as was originally stated—the Chinese local authorities were considerably perturbed and the Chishien immediately required the Japanese officer to withdraw. Colonel Saito replied, however, that he had been sent by his own Government which had derived its authority from the Emperor of Korea, and that if the Chinese had any objection to urge, they must prefer it duly through diplomatic channels in Peking. The Chishien then required that if Colonel Saito would not leave the country, he should at all events abstain from all administrative action; but of course the reply was that, as the delegate of his own Government, he could not take instructions from foreign authorities whose administrative title was not recognised. The Chinese Government in Peking appears to have imagined that Japan, acting on behalf of Korea, would confine herself to some sort of consular organisation for the purpose of protecting the rights of Korean subjects in Chientao. Hence the appearance of Colonel Saito accompanied by 60 gendarmes had the effect of a bolt from the blue. Of course it will be understood from what has been written from time to time in these columns that the problem of sovereignty in this border-territory has long been under consideration by the two Empires. Very many years have passed since a solution was found by drawing a line of division approximately through the centre of the territory in dispute and assigning everything south of this line to Korea and everything north of it to China. But the line not being demarkated by any natural features but depending for its recognition on a few artificial indications which time tended to obliterate, gradually ceased to be an effective partition, so that the Koreans passed into the Chinese section and the Chinese into the Korean. This led to a state of confusion which brought about a renewal of the discussion between the two Governments some twenty years ago, but no result was obtained owing chiefly to the difficulty of identifying the original line. The upshot was that each country sent its own officials to administer local affairs, and things remained in that mixed condition until the beginning of the Russo-Japanese war when Korea withdrew her representatives from Chientao. The Korean subjects in the presque ile being thus left entirely without protection, suffered greatly at the hands of bandits and marauders, and frequently complained to Seoul of their intolerable condition. It was in these circumstances that the Korean Government asked Japan to take the matter in hand; inasmuch as the latter Power had become conventionally responsible for Korea's foreign affairs. This led to the despatch of Colonel Saito with other officials and a guard of sixty gendarmes. Japan is obviously bound to insist that this perennial problem shall be now practically and finally solved. Of course the matter is one for friendly conference and mutual concession. It is not pleasant therefore to find that the Peking Government has instructed Viceroy Hsu—if rumour be correct—to send a body of troops into the disputed region. Bayonets are not the proper key to the solution and it is inconceivable that China should think of appealing to force. We entertain no doubt that everything will be amicably adjusted.

THE STORM IN KARUIZAWA.

A WONDERFUL DISPLAY OF MUSCULAR CHRISTIANITY.

Wednesday, Aug. 21st, was one of those perfect summer days so well known and so keenly appreciated by holiday-makers in Karuizawa. Semi-final tournament matches were played on the tennis courts, and it was given out that on Thursday, Friday and Saturday all the remaining final matches were to be played off, and on Tuesday the 27th there was to have been a big field day, with all manner of athletic sports, finishing up with special tennis matches. Nothing was said about the weather. The sky seemed to indicate that a long spell of bright days and cool nights might be expected. But that very night ominous clouds began to appear after sunset and on Thursday morning there were signs of an approaching storm. But it took some time to reach its height. Not till Friday morning did it settle down to its work of destruction. All Friday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday the rain only ceased for a few minutes at a time, and terrible gusts of wind came at intervals, driving the rain with terrific force against the sides of plastered houses, in some cases causing walls to fall in and exposing the inmates to the fury of the warring elements. In ordinary summers the streams of Karuizawa are nearly all mere tiny brooks, two or three feet wide, but by Sunday these rivulets had turned themselves into roaring rivers, in whose beds the strongest men could only just keep their feet in certain places, while in others standing or swimming was equally impossible. The largest of the Karuizawa streams comes down from the hills on the north, flowing through Mr. Chappell's and Mr. Read's properties, and passing down the valley between the Mampei Hotel and the village, flowing along at the back of a shrine that stands behind the Union Church, now dignified with the name of Auditorium. The bed of this stream has, in the course of years, if report be true, changed several times. The proprietor of the Mampei Hotel, with a view to improving a road, shifted it somewhat a year or two ago, the result being that when flooded it approached nearer and nearer to a new house erected by Mr. Pedley, of Maebashi, and rented this year to Dr. Gulick of Kyoto. Last Sunday, just as the morning service was closing, an announcement was made to the congregation that Dr. Gulick's house was in imminent danger of being swept away by the flood and that the only possible way of saving it would be to change the course of the stream by constructing a dam. It was further stated that the Police had given their consent to the adoption of this measure. All that was needed were a number of men to volunteer for the work. With no tennis and no hill climbing for three dreary days, bored to death with ennui, panting for some form of excitement, men and even women volunteered by the score. Some excitable individuals bounced into the water as they were, clad in their Sunday-go-to-meeting costumes. Others, more cautious, donned bathing dresses or tennis suits. From noon till after 5 p.m. these amateur sappers worked with axe, pick and shovel, sustained by hot tea and coffee served by a number of plucky ladies, who, despite the wind and the rain, remained on the field of battle till the power of the turbulent waters had yielded to the combined strength and skill of some 70 stalwart workers. The Christian sects were all represented. Theological disputes and differences were forgotten. High-Churchman and Baptist worked side by side. It was as fine a display of muscular Christianity of the Kingsley type as has ever been seen anywhere and we cannot but hope that among the hundreds who witnessed the scene there may be some bard who, in the spirit of Macaulay's finest poem will tell the outside world how the clergy turned the stream and saved the house on this memorable day. Other houses were on Sunday surrounded by water and had to be vacated. Among them were those of Miss Oldham and Mr. John Ballagh. Mr. Binford and Dr. Gulick both fell into the river and were considerably bruised, but escaped without serious injury. The only people who have benefited by the storm are the hotel keepers. The interruption in various places on the railway between Karuizawa and Tokyo, has prevented people from leaving. Then the inmates of flooded houses have had to move into the hotels. The total amount of damage done it is as yet impossible to estimate. Most of the Karuizawa bridges are badly constructed depending on scoria for their stability, which of course, has no adhesive properties whatever and is carried away by the first serious overflow of a stream. The wooden supports of a bridge should rest on a good broad stone wall strongly cemented. The Karuizawa local authorities collect taxes at a high rate, but most of the roads are badly made and a great many of the bridges are swept away several times every year. Some fine trees have been uprooted. The trees cut down to furnish material for constructing the dam were the property of the proprietor of the Mampei Hotel, Mr. K. Sato. He sent a man to stop the destruction going on, but the messenger was summarily dismissed by the Police and the work went on. It was reported on Monday that the stream in its new course threatened to flood Mr. Scudder's house lower down the plain. In Karuizawa houses are dotted about everywhere and hitherto nobody has feared inundation. What has occurred will tend to enhance the value of property that is located high above the water level. Another lesson to be learnt from the storm is the necessity of protecting plaster by good thick weather boards on the outside of houses. Three days of beating rain are sufficient to destroy all the outside plastering of a house.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's chartered ship Shinko Maru (1,500 tons), with rice, has gone ashore on her way to Takao and Anping from Keelung, which she left on August 30th. The company at once despatched a steamer from Shanghai to the scene which assisted in floating her. The damage is reported to be slight.

Owing to dense fog, the steamer Waka Maru (784 tons) has gone ashore off Shiotsu, Nemuro; on the way from Shana, Hokkaido, to Kobe. She is in a serious condition and the saving of either ship or cargo is despaired of. The crew landed safely and arrived at Nemuro on August 31st.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

America is known to the world for her gigantic undertakings and it will hardly come as a surprise to people who know her well, says the Kirisutokyo Sekai (Congregational), to be told that she now proposes to make Christianity known to the whole world within the space of 30 years. A number of Presbyterians at a meeting held at Omaha a short time ago decided to collect sufficient money to allow of the expenditure of 6 million dollars a year on missions. They purpose to despatch 4,000 new missionaries to foreign countries. Counting one missionary for every 25,000 inhabitants, China alone would need about 20,000 missionaries. One cannot but admire, says the Kirisutokyo Sekai, the zeal displayed in this movement, but as to its discretion we have our doubts. Is it possible to force growth in this way? Is not the gospel seed like other seed? Does it not require time for maturing? Can a crowd of foreign missionaries who come out ignorant of the language, the customs, the religions, the traditions of the people among whom they are to work do as much good as native workers? Certainly not. And does not the large use of foreign money in establishing churches act as a positive hindrance to the healthy after-development of those churches. If the cultivation of the spirit of independence is deemed important, such a movement as the one proposed must be condemned. In this country as things are situated now, the tendency is all in the direction of substituting native workers for foreign missionaries, and the notion that the arrival of a number of new missionaries would contribute greatly to the progress of Christian work is wild in the extreme. The increase of converts during the past 25 years has by no means kept pace with the increase of missionaries. In the early years, with few missionaries, people joined the Church in large numbers. But in recent years the number of missionaries are notable to secure a proportionate number of converts. No, the want of the Church to-day is not more missionaries, but thoroughly efficient native workers in larger numbers. At the Centenary Missionary celebration held in China a few months ago one thing was very noticeable; that was, the fewness of the Chinese pastors who took part in the proceedings. Is it a fact that there are hardly any highly educated and influential Chinese in the service of the Church? We confess that we felt somewhat disappointed at the results of 100 years' labour in China regarded from this special point of view. We observe, continues the Kirisutokyo Sekai, that certain Missionary Societies which have their headquarters in New York are agitating in favour of devoting more money to the training of native workers in foreign countries. These people are on the right track. The tendency in America to rely more on lay agency for the spread of the Gospel is also to be regarded as a healthy sign. The founding of Churches by means of foreign missionaries should only be resorted to in the early stages of Christian work, when no better plan can be adopted. Taking a general view of the whole mission field, it is true to say that missionaries from Occidental countries will be less and less needed as the native Churches grow and realize their responsibilities. Whatever other bodies may think, this is the view taken by the majority of Congregationalists in this country. It seems to us, concludes the Kirisutokyo Sekai, that it is the duty of the missionaries themselves to set people straight on this subject.

The Kirisutokyo Sekai in another article advocates the establishment of Christian lectureships in Japan. It says that the existing organizations for reaching the intellectual classes are quite inadequate. The Christianization of Japan is not a thing that can be effected in one or two generations, observes this organ. Few people know anything of Christian theology. The persons competent to teach it are insufficient. Hence the need of volumes of lectures on the subject.

Another useful suggestion which appears in the columns of the Kirisutokyo Sekai is that all theological students in Japan should be required to pass examinations in Buddhism. The connection of Christianity with Buddhism is daily growing closer, says the correspondent who writes on this subject. Then, the religious ideas of people generally throughout the country are distinctly Buddhist in character. To try to teach Christianity in a country without studying the religion, or religions, to which the people are accustomed is the wrong way to set to work.

The Kirisutokyo Sekai states that the successor to Bishop Honda, who has hitherto been President of the Aoyama Gakuin, has not yet been selected and that there is difficulty in finding a suitable man. Bishop Harris, it reports, will stay on in Japan but without any jurisdiction. In Korea, however, the Bishop's position will not be affected by the changes that have taken place in Japan. The foreign Methodist missionaries, it is alleged, will henceforth carry on work under the superintendence of Bishop Honda.

Writing on Mission work in Korea in the Kirisutokyo Sekai, Mr. Hirose Tsunekichi says that though there is a good number of foreign missionaries labouring in the peninsula, recent political events render it desirable that more Japanese evangelists should be despatched to that country. There are some working there now, but their number is insufficient. Mr. Hirose thinks that Japanese Christian workers in Korea will do much towards conciliating the Koreans. He says that there is little doubt that the general feeling throughout the peninsula to-day is that the Japanese have acted in an unwarrantably arbitrary manner. It is too much to expect that the mass of the people should see the necessity of the drastic measures which have been adopted during the past few months. To most Koreans the Japanese appear to be unscrupulous aggressors and heartless oppressors. The display of kind-heartedness and sympathy by a number of Japanese Christian teachers is just what is wanted at present to change the attitude of the Koreans to the Japanese people as a whole. Unless some kind of moral and religious influence is brought to bear on the Koreans it is by no means certain that Japan will find the country an easy one to govern. It goes without saying that Japanese evangelists are likely to understand the Koreans better than European missionaries. There are many points of contact between Japan and Korea. Then, again, while Korea is under the leadership of Japan in military organization, civil administration, education and sanitation, it would seem very odd if she had to depend on Occidentals only for religious teaching. There are those who think that the attempt to reform Korea is bound to end in failure, that the people are too corrupt to be trusted with freedom of action, that they can only be treated like children. But Christians take no such gloomy view of the situation in the peninsula. Our Government is of opinion that Korea can be raised to a higher level by educational, administrative and financial measures. To us these means alone seem inadequate, but the hopefulness of the Government should encourage Christians to place implicit confidence in the enlightening and elevating influences they are about to bring to bear on the Korean people.

In its issue of July 27th the Gokyo (Methodist) announced a change in the editorship of the paper. Dr. Takagi, we are sorry to have to record, has resigned the editorship. In his farewell article he tells us that he has been editor for six years. In addition to teaching theology he has had other church work on hand during this period. Yet he has produced a number of very interesting articles, which have contributed no small amount towards the reputation of the Gokyo as a Christian newspaper, and it remains to be seen whether the paper will maintain its position under the new management. Dr. Takagi tells us that he has always endeavoured to be outspoken in his writing, to represent things just as he sees them, and he thinks it not improbable that his articles may have given offence to some people. The Gokyo will henceforth be the organ of the new Methodist Church. It is for this reason that Dr. Takagi retires, it would seem.

Mr. Usaki Kôgorô is the new editor. In the Aug. 3rd number of the paper, under the title "The Old Editor and the New" Mr. M. Bessho observes that Dr. Takagi fought a hard battle during his tenure of the editorship. The medicine that he administered to church members was often bitter in taste, but of its beneficial effects there was no question. Mr. Bessho says that the members of the Methodist Church are large-minded enough to appreciate such criticism as that of Dr. Takagi. Dr. Takagi and Mr. Aizan have done much service by the way in which they have denounced abuses. In the new editor, Mr. Bessho says, the Methodist Church has great confidence. Whether he is as progressive in spirit and so broad-minded as Dr. Takagi remains to be seen.

The Seikyo Shimpô dwells on the importance of the General Synod which has been convoked in Russia, to meet in November next. Nothing of the kind, it is stated, has ever taken place before. Great changes in the organization of the Russian Church are anticipated. Whether Archbishop Nicolai will attend as representative of the Japanese branch of the Greek Church is uncertain. It seems to be the wish of the Japanese Christians that he should do so. But the Seikyo Shimpô does not seem at all sure that Missionary Churches will be represented in a Russian Provincial Synod such as the one that is to sit in November next.

To the latest number of the Seikyo Shimpô Mr. T. Yamada contributes an article entitled "What is the chief reason of the Stagnant State of Religion?" Here is the substance of what he says on this subject:—All the various Christian sects are engaged in evangelistic work, but at present little headway is made anywhere. The causes assigned for this are several: (1) It is alleged that religious life is suffering from the influence of material civilization. Men's minds are said to be absorbed by things temporal. (2) Scientific progress has largely undermined religious faith, taking away people's sense of wonder, and so on. However much this may have been the case in Europe and America, in this country people are by no means so crazy about what is called modern civilisation. Of course as a nation we think more about it than we did in the Tokugawa era or even at the beginning of the Meiji era; but we are far from allowing it to occupy such a place in our thoughts as it occupies in the West. No; the real cause of the lack of Christian influence in Japan to-day is neither the overwhelming power of science nor the grinding despotism of the conventions and fashions of modern life, but the weakness of faith which is so evident among our evangelists. Persons who only half believe what they proclaim to others do not make converts. Faith produces faith. But the trouble is that the faith of our evangelists is very weak. (Genkon wa dentôsha misukara shinkô no otorekaru jidai nari. Shikaraba sunawachi misukara yonaki shinkô wo yû suru mono ni shite, nanzo ta wo kwa [12] shite shinkô no michi ni atsukarashimuru wo yen?) Among Japanese Christians to-day the Roman Catholics are the most numerous, but it cannot be said that they are the most active. The Protestants are undoubtedly the most active. Now the type of Protestantism that prevails here is the American type. To us it seems that there is much in this form of faith that is not really Christian at all and that it is positively injurious to Christianity. (Gojin no shoken (所見) wo motte iwaba, kono ryûfû sono mono ga shinsed wo Kirisutokyo wo gai suru tokoro sukoburu ôki wo miru.) In wealth and material development of all kinds America leads the world. But her religion has been seriously affected by its surroundings. It lacks elements that are to be found in a high state of development in this country. American push and energy do not succeed here in the religious world, for the reason that the energy is more than half worldly energy. When this form of Christianity fails to take into account our culture and the general tendency of Japanese thought. The Christianity that has been propagated among us here has almost invariably been mixed up with secular things—the teaching of English, foreign customs, music, and the like. These things have been used as calculated to attract notice, but to us it seems to be a mistake to mix up Christianity with secular things in this way, and the history of Protestantism in this country is now furnishing abundant proof of this. If it be true that Christianity has suffered on account of modern progress, it is owing to the fact that Christian teachers have adopted worldly methods in trying to propagate the creed.

In reference to the connection of science and religion many different views are held. (1) Some affirm that science and religion contradict each other and can't both be consistently followed by any logical mind. (2) Others maintain that they occupy quite different spheres and that they need not be allowed to transgress on each other's territory. Whichever view we adopt, it is true to assert that scientific knowledge can only be obtained by a small section of people, whereas religion concerns everybody and may be understood by everybody. If rightly explained, which cannot be said of science. The study of science has doubtless contributed in no small degree towards the bodily comforts, the health and the general welfare of mankind, but it has not done much to enlighten the mind on spiritual subjects. The influence of science over the masses is next to nil. It is only a select few who are well acquainted with its conclusions. How then can the spread of scientific knowledge constitute a hindrance to the spread of Christianity unless it be true that Christian pastors, most of whom have received a good education, have had their faith weakened by the scientific works they have studied? This we think to be quite possible. If this be so, the general public is not to be blamed, the majority of whom are ignorant of science, but Christian teachers themselves who have allowed their belief to be undermined by outside influences. It seems to me that there are many signs that what I have hinted at has actually taken place. It goes without saying that these remarks of mine will give offence in some quarters. It often happens that what makes people most angry is to be told what they know to be true. At any rate it is highly important that we as a church should succeed in discovering the real cause of our want of power, because we shall then be in a position to take steps to rectify what is wrong.

Archbishop Nicolai has informed one of the staff of the Tōkyō Asahi Shinbun that Maeda Seiji, about whose transactions so much has appeared in the daily papers was not, as he alleged, a Greek Church Christian, though his name may be found in one of the church rolls. Neither does the Archbishop think that Maeda was a naturalized Russian. He regards the man as an impostor.

An article from the pen of Dr. von Koerber on the relation of religion to art appears in the Shinjin (New Man), Mr. Ebina Danjō's organ. The mind of man is in search of three things, says Dr. von Koerber, truth, virtue and beauty. The philosopher is in search of truth, the moralist seeks to determine what is the highest form of goodness and the artist is absorbed in the study of beauty. In these three things the ideal is not to be confounded with the actual. The ideal of both religion and art is beauty, but the beauty which religion sets before it is of a loftier type than that which the artist studies and seeks to realize—it is transcendental beauty. Poetry and music are the highest forms of art and they give us glimpses of religious beauty. Art does not reveal to us the real origin of beauty. For that we must look to religion.

The Shinkōron under the title:—"Four causes of the Failure of Missionaries," quotes the views of a Mr. McCarthy. This writer says that want of success in mission work is to be traced to one or all of four causes: (1) Insincerity in the workers. (2) Love of money. (3) Inadequate culture and instruction. (4) Ignorance of and prejudice against Oriental religions, customs and habits of thought, and a tendency to speak in exaggerated terms of all Occidental institutions and ways of thinking and acting.

Religion and ethics are inseparably connected with each other, says Dr. Motora in the pages of the Nihonjin. Religion is the ethics of former ages; ethics* is the religion of to-day. The ethical ideas of each age are embodied in the religion of that age and are transmitted to posterity as part of its teaching. A new ethical system is now in process of formation. Modern scientific ideas are largely embodied in it. This is no other than modern religion—the only religion that exists for a large number of educated people. Religion in former ages, owing to lack of knowledge on the part of those who preached it, and those who believed in it was disfigured by many silly superstitions, which only form the subject for laughter to-day. Christianity has, like other religions, gone on altering age by age, according to the general progress of thought and inquiry. The Christianity of each age has reflected the spirit of that age. When forms of Christianity are manifestly behind the age, the tendency invariably is towards the withdrawal of confidence in these forms on the part of the educated sections of communities. The giving up of articles of belief that have been logically shown to be untenable is, however, no easy matter to a great number of people. Hence religious reform as a rule proceeds very slowly, not keeping pace by any means with ethical progress, observes Dr. Motora.

An article contributed to the Tōkyō Asahi Shinbun by Mr. Ishizaka Kameji on the Amalgamated Methodist Churches has attracted considerable attention in the religious world and has been reproduced in several Christian journals. It breathes a tone of disappointment at the lack of the spirit of real independence in the Methodist Church. It is with real regret, says Mr. Ishizaka, that we find that the independence of the Methodist Church in Japan does not extend to finance. For money the Church will still have to depend largely on the mother Churches in the West. The new church resembles a young married couple, whom the parents have settled under a separate roof but who are without the wherewithal to keep house for themselves. Food has to be supplied to them by the parents every day. How many years will pass before the Church will be able to dispense with the parents' help nobody can tell. (Iku-nen no nochi ni itaraba oya no yakka ni naruru; mattaku no dokuri su Kyōkai to nari ubeki ka! nikomu nashi.) There are not more than about 10 Methodist churches in the whole of Japan that are entirely self-supporting. The amount that has to be subscribed monthly by each self-supporting Church comes to 60 or 70 yen, 50 yen of this being the salary paid to pastors. The salary of the new Bishop, which, including travelling expenses and an allowance for entertaining (ryōhi, kōtaihi), has been fixed at 4,000 yen a year, will henceforth be paid by the native Churches. The total number of converts throughout Japan attached to the Methodist Churches is 13,000. Bishop Harris will remain on in Japan as honorary Bishop and adviser to the new Church.

The following announcements we cull from various sources. The report of the Nihon Kirisutokyoikai (Presbyterian) for last year shows that there were 1,820 baptisms, being an increase of 379 over those of the previous year. This brings the total number of converts connected with the Church up to a little over 16,300. The total amount of money subscribed was over 71,700 yen, being 13,500 yen more than was subscribed last year. The value of Church property is stated to be over 297,000 yen, an increase

* A few weeks ago a book reviewer objected in these columns to the use of a singular verb with "Ethics." There is unimpeachable authority for this usage—a writer on Ethics in the Encyclopædia Britannica, to begin with, and reliable lexicographers as well. of 34,400 yen over that of the previous year. Six new churches have been opened, and six churches have been added to the list of self-supporting bodies.

The Theological School connected with the Dōshisha has been thoroughly reorganized. The course is henceforth to extend over 5 years. The school will reopen in October and the following list of lecturers and subjects has been issued. Sermonizing, Mr. Harada Tasuke, the President. The New Testament, Ecclesiastical History and Greek, Dr. Learned. The History of Philosophy, Jewish History, Psychology and Logic, Mr. I. Hino. Evangelistic Work, and Christian Ethics, Dr. Davis. A General Outline of Christianity, Theology, and the History of Civilisation, Dr. Gulick. Sociology and the English Language, Mr. Kelly. English and Ethics, Mr. S. Imaizumi. The Old Testament—treated generally, Mr. T. Makino. Bible History, Dr. Yuasa. Psychology, Dr. Matsumoto. The last two lecturers are not connected with the college. Mr. Ebina Danjō will also lecture as a visitor. Other subjects will be taught, including German and music.

In Tōkyō a strong combination has been formed for the purpose of giving a high training to Theological students. The new school is presided over by Herr Pfarrer Ostwald, who will be assisted by Dr. Koerber, as lecturer on Philosophy, Herr Pfarrer Würfel, as teacher of Greek, Mr. Kozaki Hiromichi, as lecturer on Preaching, Education and Pastoralogy Mr. Ebina Danjō as lecturer on Early Christianity, Christian Doctrine and the History of Japanese Religions, and Mr. Hatano Seichi, as lecturer on the History of Philosophy. Mrs. Ostwald will teach German, music and singing.

As stated in a former Summary, the Koe is the only Christian organ that makes a practice of replying to the anti-Christian articles which constantly appear in secular magazines and Buddhist or Shinto periodicals. In the June and July numbers of the Koe Mr. Hasegawa Tenkei's Taiyō article against Christianity is discussed in considerable detail. Mr. Hasegawa's contention that the Roman Empire was destroyed by Christians and not by the Northern barbarians (Geni Roma wa horoboshitaru mono wa Hokuho minzoku ni arazu shite Kirisutokyo to tarishi nari) is confronted with quotations from Montesquieu's De la Grandeur et de la décadence des Romains. The Koe reminds Mr. Hasegawa that the date of the first attacks of the Northern barbarians on the Roman empire was A.D. 251. At that time the Christians were still suffering persecution. At a later date, when the Hun invasion took place, Christian Bishops did their utmost to stop the outrages committed by these savage warriors. The Koe goes into particulars on a number of other historical points touched on by Mr. Hasegawa and then concludes with the remark that Mr. Hasegawa's conception of the true essence of civilisation differs materially from that of the Catholic Church. The world's great men—men like Napoleon and Peter the Great—made more stir but did not benefit humanity as much as did many Christian teachers. Mr. Hasegawa, says the Koe, is an advocate of progress, but he seems to have no clear idea of the goal he is bound for nor of the rules subject to which alone real progress can be made.

The Koe has requested readers to state their reasons for accepting the Catholic faith, the result being the penning of a number of earnest replies to the query. These are appearing in the magazine. The writers lay stress on the oneness of the Christian faith as taught by Catholics, on the uniformity of worship, on the unimpeachable authority on which its teaching rests and on the absence of all those perplexing and irreconcilable differences of belief which are displayed among Protestants. They admit that other forms of religion are true to a certain extent, but they hold that in the amount of truth it embodies Catholicism surpasses every existing form of belief.

In the July number of a magazine called the Kaitakusha (開拓者) Mr. K. Wada writes on the connection of laughter with religion.

There is a tone of sadness about Christian preaching and lecturing, says Mr. Wada. This strikes one at all times. Man's deeper thoughts seem to be always markedly tinged with sorrow. The pensive state of mind caused by pondering over the darker side of life is as common among Buddhists as among Christians. But nevertheless sadness should not be nursed by Christians as though there were some special merit in it. It seems to me that we Japanese Christians are too much inclined to give way to grief and vain regrets. We are over sensitive about a great many matters. Things are apt to get on our nerves and rob us of all peace of mind. Compared with other animals we human beings are called upon to bear much suffering. It seems to be one of the laws of the universe that the more people think, the more will they suffer. The natural devices and instincts of brutes being gratified, they crave for nothing more. But the activity and complexity of man's mind have created for him a thousand wants and his desire to satisfy these keeps him in a perpetual state of unrest. So it often happens that the higher and the more delicate the organization the more intense is the suffering. In human society how numerous are the causes of mental disquietude! There is anxiety about reputation, there is pain caused by strong difference of opinion on serious questions among friends and relations, there is the unpleasantness of being tabooed by society when its conventions are conscientiously defied, there is the distress caused by the discovery that many of the problems of life are quite insoluble, and there are a hundred and one other forms of suffering. As a set-off to all this, continues Mr. Wada, a merciful God has given us one power which is not possessed by other animals—the power to laugh. Now, a great many people seem to think that there is something quite unreligious about laughter. Religion and laughter—the serious and the trivial—cannot go together, say they. It is true that laughter on solemn occasions would in the minds of most religious people savour of profanity. Nevertheless it is undeniable that laughter, instead of being inimical to religion, assists it in various ways. It is a fact that wit and religion have gone hand in hand in the careers of quite a number of Christian men. Of course there are various sorts of wit and fun. There are kinds that are incompatible with deep religious feeling. But it must never be forgotten that the mind that is capable of enjoying fun and of affording amusement to others is infinitely more healthy and contented than the mind which broods over trouble, envies the lot of others, perplexes itself about insoluble questions, and craves for things which are unobtainable. If it be the province of religion to make us contented with our lot and to believe that what is best, then laughter is a natural product of religious feeling. There are many people who seem to see signs in the animal and vegetable kingdoms of our world that the Creator is endowed with a sense of humour. Dr. Koerber said a short time ago "God is one of the greatest of wits" (Kami wa saidai naru kokkei nari). If God can mourn as we mourn; so also can he laugh as we laugh. There is laughter in Heaven as well as on earth.* Man does much to make God mourn, but he also does much to make Him laugh (Kami wa kanashimi no Kami nomi ni arazu; kokkei no Kami, mata warai no Kami su arazu ya? Ningen ga masu tokoro no oku wa Kami wo kanashimashimuru naran; saredo Kami wo warawashimuru tokoro no mono mo mata suku nokarazarubeshi).

The Scientific System of Morality: By G. GORE, F.R.S., London: Watts & Co., Fleet St., E.C.

THE supernatural basis for morality having been first undermined and then entirely destroyed by modern criticism and scientific progress, philosophers and scientists have during the past few decades been engaged in laying down new foundation stones whereon to raise a structure to last for all time. For many centuries morality in the West was based on what the universe and man were imagined to be; the scientific morality of to-day is based on what the cosmos and man are known to be. In 1889 Mr. Gore published an extremely interesting and closely reasoned treatise on the new ethical system entitled "The Scientific Basis of Morality" (Sonnen-schien). In the work I am reviewing he states the conclusions he has reached in a more popular and perhaps in a more striking way than he did in the longer work, where copious evidence for each new assertion made had to be supplied. This book is designed to show that all, or nearly all, the phenomena of human conduct can be rationally explained by means of the chief principles of science—such as universal causation, universal motion, continuity of motion, and the like—without the help of unproved statements of any kind. The keynote of the whole book is that the welfare of the universe takes precedence of all things. Man's comforts and pleasures and his very existence on the insignificant planet which he inhabits are of infinitely smaller importance than the welfare of the universe. This is said to be proved by the fact that the lives of multitudes of human beings are sacrificed annually by great terrestrial catastrophes and influences and by a host of diseases and accidents. "The true scientific explanation of the immense amount of untruth, error, pain, and misery around us, and of the great mystery of sin and evil is the fact that surrounding bodies are compelled to act upon and influence us as they do in consequence of their natural properties and of our own. Thus fire must burn us, and frost must freeze us, whether we are willing or not."

* The anthropocentric, anthromorphic and anthropitric dogmas have been pushed to their utmost limit in this article. Mr. Wada evidently believes in the most exhaustive apotheosis of the human organism conceivable.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY).

According to this book, man's boasted conquest of nature is confined to a very limited area. In most things we have to succumb to superior power. We are proud of our knowledge, but it is as nothing compared to our ignorance. From the beginning of his existence man has gone on believing a multitude of errors and suffering great pain and misery through his mistakes.

"The New Scientific System of Morality" is divided into six chapters, treating the following subjects: (1) How Universal Energy Governs Mankind. (2) How the World is Governed. (3) The Coming Scientific Morality. (4) A Scientific View of Consciousness. (5) A Scientific Sketch of Untruth. (6) Scientific Remarks on Human Misery. I will endeavour to state in a brief manner the conclusions which Mr. Gore reaches on morality generally. The unscientific view that we "govern ourselves" by means of "the will" is untrue in the form in which it is usually stated. The "will" is not the first cause. Its movements are determined by the energy of the ingoing nerve-currents and by cerebral oxidation. We cannot govern ourselves properly or morally unless we possess the requisite ideas or knowledge and are influenced by suitable training and environment. We fancy that we govern ourselves because the effects follow our volitional ideas, but they follow our ideas whether volitional or not. Man proposes and Energy disposes. We can not trace phenomena back to any "first cause" beyond energy. Energy can neither be created anew nor destroyed. It changes from one form to another. Each mass of matter is a collection of incessant molecular motions. Evidence on this subject is given in full in Chap. XLII of "The Scientific Basis of Morality." Mr. Gore holds that the world is governed by might. Weaker powers are compelled to yield to stronger ones everywhere. The sun governs the planets and all living bodies upon them; it governs the earth, and the earth governs us. In the government of nations by nations the same rule holds good. "He shall take who has the power, and he shall keep who can." Right is primarily and essentially decided by might. A volcano, a flood or an earthquake shows no mercy to men. All great terrestrial disasters to mankind militate against the theory that he is the most important entity in nature. He is crushed by the superior power with the indifference he shows when he kills a mosquito. Only in as far as the superior power of nature allows them to do so, can men govern themselves and one another. The latter they do chiefly through the pleasure they can confer and the pain they can inflict on each other; they govern through the property of consciousness. Pleasure and pain are the main factors in the government of mankind. While pain governs partly by prospect of punishment, pleasure governs partly by hope of reward; both pain and pleasure compel men to act rightly towards their fellow-creatures. Pain, too, compels us to seek the knowledge necessary to remove it. It warns us of danger, and the anticipation of it often keeps us from injuring or killing ourselves in many ways. It is a curious fact, but one abundantly attested by history, that men cannot be governed by pure truth alone; first, because they cannot sufficiently understand it and, secondly, because it is often too unpleasant for them to bear. For unpleasant truths most people have a great aversion. Hence it is that pleasant, flattering false beliefs have such a long existence. When men and women have to choose between truth and comfort, they usually choose the latter, because it helps them to get through life more easily. So there are still millions of unscientific people who believe in miracles, "supernatural events," "divine interpositions" and the like, contrary as these beliefs are to the abundantly proved theory of universal natural causation.* Men are governed primarily by their animal wants and passions, and secondarily by their knowledge and wisdom. The "will" is not, as some theologians maintain a, "supernatural power," "independent of natural law," an "original uncaused cause," but a faculty which has a purely natural origin. We are always thinking of ourselves, and we exaggerate our importance in the world, ignoring the fact that there exist countless millions of other worlds of greater magnitude, energy and governing power than our own, all governing each other and being governed by universal energy.

Science and morality, though apparently unlike, are closely allied, since the chief principles of science are the great guides of life. By "science" Gore means "knowledge derived from proper and sufficient evidence," by "morality" such human conduct as produces justifiable effects on sentient creatures; by "truth" statements consistent with all known facts. Science and dogma are, in his conception, incompatible. Dogma is not knowledge. In the coming scientific morality the notion that the world is governed by what we call "justice" will be abandoned in favour of the truth that material necessity governs all things. It is our mistaken views on the laws of the universe and our place in it that make us interpret great terrestrial catastrophes as unjust to us.

Since the existence of mind in the absence of nervous substance has never been proved, men who have studied science well, with few exceptions, cease to attribute human feelings to universal natural energy and worship it as a personal God. This energy has some of the qualities ascribed to the Deity. It is omnipotent, omnipresent, infinite and invisible. But it lacks personality.† The idea of the existence of a "mind" or "soul" as a separate entity has deceived millions of people. It is unproved and unprovable. Even if it could be shown that such an entity exists, we have no proof that it creates energy with which to perform mental actions. All actions are really caused by natural influences under physiological conditions and there is no need of a "spirit" to produce them. Morality, according to Mr. Gore, is entirely dependent on universal motion and universal causation. His general view of the world's government is that what is right, even pain and a certain amount of misery and discomfort. Of pain he writes "The belief that pain is evil is one of the greatest of human deceptions; nearly every person entertains it, and there is no false idea so firmly fixed or so easy to acquire." But pain is our great disciplinarian. It compels us to train ourselves, acquire knowledge, discover new truths, invent contrivances, seek new remedies. In fact, it is, as he goes on to show, one of the most indispensable of all existing conditions of human progress. The unrest and the improvement of the world are alike caused by it.

* Mr. Gore shows that belief in universal natural causation, according to which we all do as we must under all the conditions and circumstances of the case is not fatalism, because that implies that we do as we are compelled entirely independent of all conditions and circumstances.*

† This was overlooked by Rev. J. Carter in his letter on God as a spiritual-dynamo, published over the signature J. C. in these columns a few months ago. The churches will never address God as "O Spiritual-dynamo," whatever that term may mean to Mr. Carter.

According to the new school of scientific moralists neither ignorance, untruth, nor false belief are to be regarded as necessary evils. Untruths are often more useful to unlearned persons than truths, because more easily understood. Thus the idea of the existence of an evil deity, a hell and a heaven has been very useful in its time in influencing the minds of ill-informed people. Untruthful orators have induced multitudes to think and improve who would never otherwise have done so. Ignorance affords a livelihood to thousands of professional men, tradesmen and others. The scientific view of "Evil" is that it is a necessity and not, when regarded in connection with the whole system of nature, so bad as it seems. Hence the scientific view is, according to Mr. Gore, decidedly cheerful and bracing. "Though it may be wounding to man's pride, as it takes him off the lofty pedestal that he has erected for himself and represents him as only one among the countless atoms that go to make up the vast cosmos. Here are Mr. Gore's 12 reasons for denying that real "evil" exists in the world. Evil does not exist:—(1) because its existence would prove the universe to be imperfect; (2) if the physical constitution of the universe is perfect, as scientific evidence declares it to be, the moral arrangement, being inseparable from it, must also be perfect; (3) whenever a case of seeming evil is fully investigated, it is ultimately proved to be necessary and good; (4) it has been abundantly proved that pain is necessary to human existence and welfare in many ways; (5) as great calamities serve useful purposes, and many so-called "evils" prevent greater ones, they must be good; (6) "evil" acts are produced by natural agents in the same manner as good ones; (7) the greatest "evil-doers" are compelled to act the same as all other persons and all inanimate substances; (8) it would be inconsistent if all other animals suffered pain while man alone was exempt; (9) even the feeling of so-called "evil" is limited to an extremely minute portion of nature—viz., animal brain in the waking state, and in that only occasionally; (10) no consistent theory of life has ever been framed upon the idea that real evil exists; (11) the universe works so as to secure the greatest good to all things, and (12) belief in the existence of evil is easily accounted for by our frequent experience of pain. "Considering all this evidence," says Mr. Gore, "it is incomparably less likely that the moral perfection of the universe is defective than that we, with our very feeble minds and fixed belief in the existence of 'evil' are deceived in such a vast and complex question.

The wide existence of beliefs is no proof of their truth. Some of the greatest errors have been believed by nearly all men during many centuries till expelled by science. The coming scientific system of morality will far surpass all systems that have hitherto existed, as it will entirely be founded on truth. "Truthfulness is the basis of all the virtues." When men are guided by true principles they agree, because their leading ideas are the same. "The idea of universal goodness is an old one, and was originally a mere conjecture; but it is now abundantly supported by facts, and mankind will be gradually compelled by the pressure of advancing knowledge to accept it." At present it needs competent exponents. Like other great truths which mankind have been slowly compelled to accept, it is strongly at variance with some of our feelings, while perfectly in harmony with intellect. According to this view agnosticism, instead of being the gloomy creed some silly and ill informed theologians represent it to be, is infinitely more sunshiny than "the miserable sinner," "hell and damnation," and "salvation by faith" doctrines of orthodox divines. But we must never forget that comfort and discomfort have nothing whatever to do with truth and untruth. The reception or rejection of both truth and untruth is largely dependent upon the intellectual state of the brain, but perhaps with the majority it is still more dependent on sensation and feeling. Our environments act on our feelings, and the impressions we receive are usually decided by feeling. If pleasant they are accepted, if painful rejected. Feeling, uncorrected by evidence and intellect, then, is the great source of error. Untruth, however, according to Mr. Gore, is a cosmic and human necessity,—is essential to the general evolution of mankind. According to the widest scientific knowledge "whatever is right"; but according to ordinary narrow ideas, "this is a wicked world" and "there is something wrong in everything." Untruth has often more adherents than truth in complex subjects, because false explanations are frequently more pleasing and more easily understood than true ones. Truth and untruth, within certain fixed limits help man to fulfil his destiny. Truth and untruth limit each other. Too much truth stuns us; too much untruth repels us. Each excites resistance. The world goes on by means of compromises, and society is kept from taking the leaps which nature hates by the restraint which opposite ideas place on each other.

The Count's Chauffeur, by WILLIAM LE QUEUX.
London, Mr. Fisher Unwin.

Those who enjoy "thrills" will get them in plenty in this book, for it relates the adventures of Count Bando di Ferraris, as told by his chauffeur. The Count, like "Raffles" of immortal memory, moves in the best Society, but unlike "Raffles" he seeks the aid of confederates in bringing off his big jewel robberies, while again unlike "Raffles" he does not confine himself to England but ranges the whole European continent. Where the chauffeur comes in is to drive his scoundrelly master through the length and breadth of France, Italy, Germany or England in a 60 horse-power motor after the successful accomplishment of a grand coup. It is a peculiarity of the latter day criminal novels that the police are for ever baffled while the swell mobster lives a life of practical immunity amid the most delightful and luxurious surroundings. So the present book closes with the Count and his chauffeur "going strong," though wanted by the police of every country of Europe. There must be a demand for such stories else they would not be written and published, but frankly we cannot see what good they do. Their perverted moral sense alone condemns them.

THE YOKOHAMA WATER FAMINE.

Friday, August 30.

It is reported by Mr. Nakanura, second Alderman of the Yokohama City Office, who returned on the evening of Aug. 29th from an investigation of the damage along the River Doshi, the source of the Yokohama Water Works, that the work of repair is progressing and that temporary repairs by which water can be supplied as formerly will be completed within a few days. As to details of the work, he said that ten ken of the pipe at Kanegafuchi, which damage had not been hitherto reported, was thrown into the river by a landslide and the pipe can not be recovered as the river is still high. Reserve pipes were at once sent to this place, and the repairs were completed on Aug. 28th. The damage at a point near the iron bridge at the confluence of the rivers Doshi and Sagami was most severe. Forty ken of the pipe was thrown down here by landslides. The reserve piping has been placed on scaffolding fastened by stay ropes. The trouble at Misuyuki, affecting only about 120 feet and that not seriously, was easily remedied. Some 600 feet of piping at Benten-no-fuchi was washed away along with its bed and the reserve pipes are being laid on baskets filled with earth.

The police have made an arrest in connection with the poisoning of Mr. Kildyle's well.

Wednesday, September 4.

The water supply of Yokohama was resumed on Sept. 5th, under special arrangement, as the supply is still insufficient. In Nogemachi, Kanagawa, Hitanuma, and other western parts of the city, the supply will be turned on every morning between 5 and 8 o'clock only, and in the eastern part, including the Settlement, Bluff, Negishi, Kitagata, Umechi, the supply will be turned on every afternoon between 4 and 7 o'clock only. During the other hours there will be no supply of water.

In an interview with the representative of this journal, Mr. Saito, first alderman of Yokohama city, said that there are two main pipes between the water source and the reservoir, one being 22 inches in diameter, and the other 18 inches. The repairs to the large pipe have been completed and consequently a supply of 3,600,000 gallons of water has been obtained. The ordinary supply ranges between six or seven million gallons daily. The repairs to the smaller main have not yet commenced. The reason is that at one part of the road a wooden scaffolding has been erected along the cliffside near Benten-no-Fuchi on which the large pipe has been laid. Anxiety is entertained as to whether the large pipe will stand the pressure here for any length of time and naturally Dr. Hara, chief civil engineer and his staff hesitate to hazard the structure by laying the small main on the same scaffold. However, the engineering authorities are doing their best to deal with the situation but no definite estimate can be given as to when the water supply will be restored to its ordinary capacity. Mr. Saito further went on to say that water distribution at the several bridges, Ogi-machi, Yoshidamachi and on Bluff will be continued to-day, after which the supply will be entirely stopped.

On the morning of Sept. 4th, Mr. N. Mitsuhashi, Mayor, left for the district of Tsukui to investigate the damage and repairs to the water mains. After his return, detailed reports with regard to the affair will be laid before the City Assembly.

Thursday, September 5.

The water famine which has lasted in Yokohama for ten days was slightly ameliorated on Thursday through the temporary repairs to the 22-inch main pipe. Altogether some six million gallons of water were in the reservoirs and consequently the supply of water in the first and second divisions of the city was extended for a longer period than specified in the advertisement of the Yokohama Water Works. In the first division, the supply began at 4 a.m. and lasted to 11 a.m. and in the second division, it began at 1 p.m. instead of at 4 o'clock. Referring to the quantity of water supplied from the source to the reservoir, and that issued from the reservoir to the public, Mr. Doi, chief secretary of the Yokohama Water Works gives some detailed figures:

	Gallons.
Stock in reservoir	6,000,000
Water from source during 7 hours in the morning	1,120,000
Water supplied to the public during 7 hours in the morning	1,030,000

In the second division,—afternoon supply—the figures read differently, as the population is three times greater here than in the first division. The result is as follows:

	Gallons.
Stock in the reservoir	6,000,000
Water from source during 7 hours in the afternoon	1,120,000
Water supplied to the public during 7 hours in the afternoon	3,150,000

Mr. Doi further said that the supply from the source is very favourable in quantity and that consequently the foregoing special arrangements as to a seven-hours supply each morning and afternoon may be expected to be continued until the repairs of the 18 inch pipe are completed. As to the question why the water is not turned on throughout the city at the same time, the Water Works official said that the present arrangement was the best that could be made under the circumstances. Referring to the repairs of the 18-inch pipe, Mr. Doi said that no definite reports have been received from Dr. Hara, the chief civil engineer, at the water source. He was expected to return on the evening of Sept. 5th or the following morning. After his arrival details of the repairs are expected to be obtainable.

YOKOHAMA FOREIGN BOARD OF TRADE.

Committee:—Messrs. C. V. Sale (Chairman), Montague Beart (Vice-Chairman), D. H. Blake, J. Harmsen, V. R. Bowden, F. Strahler, E. C. Davis, and J. B. Gibbs.

We have received the following from the Board for publication:—

CERTIFICATES OF ORIGIN.

The Committee have been advised by E. F. Crowe, Esq., Commercial Attaché to H. B. M. Embassy, of a recent case in which much delay and trouble were caused to consignees owing to the fact that a certificate for goods produced in one town was granted by the Chamber of Commerce in another town (not the shipping port), the names of both towns being mentioned in the certificate. According to a strict interpretation of the Japanese Law on the subject, it appears that if goods are marked as having come from a special town the certificate should be granted by the Chamber or public authorities in that town. Therefore, it seems advisable for shippers to draw up the Certificates of Origin in such a way that only the word "England" or "Scotland," as the case may be, appears without entering into further particulars. If the town of production, and the town where the Chamber of Commerce granting the certificate is situated, are in the same county, there is no objection to mentioning that county.

TELEGRAMS FROM JAPAN.

In June the Committee wrote to various Chambers of Commerce, suggesting that steps be taken at the next International Telegraph Convention, to be held in April, 1908, for securing lower rates for telegrams from Japan. Attention was called to the fact that while telegrams to Europe are charged at the rate of yen 2.42 per word, it is possible to send messages from Vladivostok at 32 sen per word. The distance between Tsuruga and Vladivostok being only about 300 miles, the suggestion was made that communication between the two points could be effected by means of a "wireless" installation, when it should be possible to effect a very great reduction in the charges for through messages to Europe. The Tokyo Chambers of Commerce have investigated the matter and find that "wireless" telegraphy is not yet considered sufficiently reliable for a public service of this nature. Also, that under an agreement with the Great Northern Telegraph Co. and the Imperial Japanese Government no cables can be laid between Japan and foreign countries without the consent of that company. This agreement does not expire until 1912, so that it will probably be impossible to secure relief from the present onerous rates until after the year 1912.

PHARMACOPŌIA JAPONICA.

The printing of the translation has been completed, and delivery of the volumes is promised within this month.

THE STORM.

Further details with regard to the damage sustained in the country are reported in various telegrams. The River Otonase rose to an extent never hitherto experienced. The embankment was destroyed at several points and Fukushima was inundated. The soldiers of the 20th regiment of infantry manned about fifty boats and rendered assistance. Some twelve thousand persons were carried to safe places by the soldiers, but six hundred lives were lost. General Baron Kuroki, who was on his return from inspection of the barracks of the 10th Division, was isolated at the Kasugi Hotel in Fukushima. He was saved by a boat under command of Ensign Inagaki. Mr. Omori, Governor of Kyoto, who was also there on official business, was similarly stranded.

In the district of Takahama, Wakasa province, high waves were experienced, and a hundred houses were washed away. Owners of the floating buildings set fire to the roofs with a view to saving furniture and other property.

The Shidzuoka Prefectural Assembly has decided to spend yen 8,650 as a first payment for relieving people in distress.

Owing to the heavy rains a landslide occurred at the Nakano copper mine, in Fukushima prefecture. The factory collapsed, seven persons were crushed to death, and five were injured.

The following rough estimate was made on Aug. 28th at the Home Office:—

Tokyo.	Houses inundated.	Houses washed away.
Tokyo	28,233	5
Kyoto	1,200	124
Saitama	1,800	25
Gumma	1,200	16
Ibaraki	1,927	5
Yamanashi	1,070	555

The estimated cost of repairing the railways which were damaged by flood is as follows:—

Lines.	Yen.
Tokaido	200,000
Chuo	400,000
Shin-etsu	100,000
Nippon	100,000
Kyoto and Hankoku	100,000

Repairs to the Tokyo-Yokohama Electric Railway have been completed, and on the evening of Aug. 29th, through traffic was re-opened.

According to official investigations, damage done by the storm in Kanagawa prefecture is as follows:—3,389 houses swamped, 39 destroyed, six persons killed and one injured.

According to information sent by Governor Sufu to the Home Office, the area of land in Kanagawa prefecture which was swamped by the recent flood is as follows:—5,000 cho of rice fields, 130 cho of potatoes, 100 cho of beans and millet, and 50 cho of orchards (1 cho, equivalent to about 2½ acres). The damage sustained is not of such a nature as to reduce the crop very considerably.

YACHTING.

There was a light to moderate breeze in the early part of Saturday afternoon from about S.E., but it fell later on.

Two of the large boats went out to race for the Official Measurer's Cup. Kingfisher led Naniva all round the Lightship, Widow Buoy and Nagahama course and finished nearly 10m. before the latter got to the Lightship. She was only 20 seconds ahead at the harbour entrance; the Lightship was reached in one tack and there she was 2m. 43s. to the good. Both stood in, Kingfisher tacking inshore at 2.33, and Naniva about 5½ minutes later, just as the other got into trouble with her topmast stay which caused her to lose some ground. At 2.52 in a nice breeze Kingfisher tacked for the buoy and at 3.03 she passed it and at once went about and stood out, while Naniva passing this mark 8¾ minutes later preferred to stand in to Mississippi Bay. There was little tide to affect the boats but Kingfisher doubtless profited by what ebb there was. At any rate she was round the Nagahama buoy at 3.38, 17 minutes and 20 seconds ahead of her opponent. Spinnakers were set for the run to the Widow Buoy (which Kingfisher passed at 4.13, and Naniva 28m. 40s. later) being changed over to port side at that mark. The leader rounded the Lightship at 4.41, and 16 minutes later she passed the harbour entrance and crossed the line at 5.10.45, Naniva only passing the Lightship at 5.20.00. Official times:—

	Start.	Finish.	Hand.	Corrected.
	h.m.s.	h.m.s.	m.	h.m.s.
Kingfisher ...	2.00.02	5.08.00	—	5.08.00
Naniva	2.00.05	5.50.05	30	5.20.05

Kingfisher thus won the Cup easily by 12 minutes from Naniva.

Six of the Mosquito Club boats raced round the Mandarin Cliff and Lightship course for the Honorary Treasurer's Cup—the starters being Pet, Edna, Winsome, Elsa, Sunbeam and Knirla. So beam, Edna and Winsome after a good race finished in that order, Sunbeam winning the prize irrespective of her 6 minutes handicap.

The Lark Class sailed over Course No. 16 for a presented prize. There were twelve starters, No. 6 came in first, No. 12 second, and No. 10 third. No. 11 gave up in consequence of an accident.

BASEBALL.

The baseball game on Saturday was between the Y. C. and A. C. and a newly organized Japanese combination known as the Akebono Club. The new-comers, though keen on the game, were no match for the foreign team, as the score—13 to 0—shows, but they will undoubtedly improve in practice. A summary of the game reads:—Two base hit, McChesney. Three base hit, Gray. Home run, Becker. Bases on balls, none. Struck out by Frey, nine, by Furuya, seven. Left on bases, Y.C. & A.C., nine, Akebono, five. Wild Pitches, Becker, Kohara, Nakayama, Takayama. Passed balls, Kohara, three, Nakayama. Hit by Pitcher, Tomeya. First Bases on Errors, Y.C. & A.C., ten, Akebono, four.

CHOLERA.

Twelve new cases of cholera were reported at Moji on the evening of Aug. 30th. One case each has appeared among the crews of the sailing vessel Hiruko Maru and the steamer Oikawa Maru, now at Osaka.

One of the crew on the Awaji Maru at Ujina has been attacked by cholera.

On Aug. 30th, there were 9 new cholera patients in Yamaguchi prefecture.

A case appeared on Aug. 31st in Nara. The patient died the same day.

A case of cholera was reported at Saga on Aug. 28th. On the same day, three cases appeared at Shimonoseki and five at other places in Yamaguchi prefecture.

Twenty-seven new cases of cholera appeared at Moji on Aug. 31st. The same day, two cases were reported in Osaka. Dysentery is prevalent in Kanazawa. On Sept. 1st seventy-two cases appeared in the district of Kawakita.

About 160 houses in Takeya, Sascho, will be burned on Sept. 11th as epidemic diseases are still prevalent there.

A case of cholera has appeared among the students of the Toyotsu Academy, Fukuoka prefecture. The institute was temporarily closed.

On Monday morning a case of cholera appeared among the crew in the Takasago Maru, which arrived at Yokohama the previous day from Newchwang via Dairen and Korean ports. The patient is a Japanese tallyman. The passengers consisted of ten cabin, nine in second class, and 135 in steerage, and they all landed previous to the appearance of the case, but the ship was removed to Nagahama to undergo the usual disinfecting measures.

Nineteen new cases of cholera were reported at Moji on Sept. 3rd and twenty-seven cases on the following day.

YOKOHAMA AMATEUR ROWING CLUB.

The annual swimming and diving competitions of the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club took place on Saturday afternoon off the bathing barge. The weather and water were both favourable. There was a strong ebb tide.

The officials of the day were as follows:—Judges of Diving—Dr. Wheeler, and Messrs. H. Goddard and A. L. Robinson; Starter of Swimming Races—Mr. A. L. Robinson; Judge of Swimming Races—Mr. H. Goddard; Time-keeper—Mr. Cyril Allen; Committee—Mr. H. C. Litchfield, President; Mr. A. L. Robinson, Captain; Messrs. H. A. Poole, C. L. Tinn, B. J. Jackson, C. von Fallot, P. E. Nicolle (Hon. Treasurer), and J. L. Graham (Hon. Secretary).

The first event on the programme was

THE HUNDRED YARDS OPEN.—For this three men started, C. Gunn, S. R. Clarke, and D. E. Drummond. Clarke led at the outset but Drummond soon came up and a close race ensued, ending in the last named getting in front and winning by about 2 lengths, Gunn a bad third. Time 1.43.

HIGH DIVE.—Three competed, R. G. Holmes, S. R. Clarke, and M. Luther, each having three dives, and points being given for take-off, entrance, recovery and general elegance. Luther won with 47 points, Clarke second with 46.

FIFTY YARDS OPEN.—Four started in this event—M. Luther, D. E. M. Drummond, L. Stornebrink, junr., and C. Gunn. A good race resulted, Drummond reaching home first, Luther second and Stornebrink third. Time 46s.

LONG DIVE.—Three competed, A. Kingdon, P. Dentici and R. G. Holmes. Kingdon won, his dive being 42 yards.

RUNNING HEADER FROM SPRING BOARD.—A. Kingdon, P. Dentici, R. G. Holmes, S. R. Clarke, and M. Luther competed, the judging being by points. Luther won with 49 points, Clarke and Dentici tied with 45 points each, Holmes received 41 points and Kingdon 40.

ONE HUNDRED YARDS HANDICAP.—There were twelve entries but only six started namely B. Deveson (scratch), L. Stornebrink, junr. (2 secs.), S. A. Vincent (2 secs.), M. Luther (2 secs.), E. M. Barnby (6 secs.), and P. Dentici (7 secs.). Barnby assumed the lead, but was passed by Dentici, who in turn gave place to Vincent. About forty yards from the start Deveson, the scratch man, took the lead, with Stornebrink and Vincent close up, and retained the advantage to the end, winning a close race by about three yards from Stornebrink, who finished a yard ahead of Vincent, the third man. Time, 1m. 49 2/5 s.

RUNNING HEADER FROM TOP OF BARGE.—A. Kingdon, R. G. Holmes, S. R. Clarke, and M. Luther competed. Clarke was declared winner, with 52 points, Luther being second with 45 points, Holmes third with 42, and Kingdon fourth with 41.

QUARTER MILE HANDICAP.—Five started, G. W. Gregory (scratch), S. A. Vincent (25 secs.), D. E. M. Drummond (30 secs.), A. Kingdon (35 secs.), and P. Dentici (40 secs.). Gregory, the scratch man, drew well up on his competitors of whom Kingdon gave up on reaching the barge, Vincent and Dentici swimming together. On the second round Drummond took the lead and won easily by thirty-three seconds. Vincent and Gregory made a good race for second place but Vincent won by a couple of lengths, with Dentici a few yards behind. Time, 9m. 7 2/5 s.

FIFTY YARDS CONSOLATION.—Six men started—S. R. Clarke, G. W. Gregory, A. Kingdon, C. Gunn, P. Dentici, and S. A. Vincent. Clarke won, Vincent second, and Gregory third. Time, 45 1/5 s.

YOKOHAMA.

Fire broke out at 9.18 a.m. on Aug. 30th in the house of H. Shibata, a Japanese laundryman, at No. 190, Yamashita-cho. The flames were put out before causing serious damage. The cause was imperfect joints in a chimney.

Early on the morning of Aug. 30th, two persons attempted to commit suicide by drinking poison in a room of the Daini-Seishu, a house of ill-fame. One of them K. Sase (30) a banto employed by the Takashima-ya silk goods dealers, No. 81, Yamashita-cho, succeeded in ending his life. The other, a girl named Segawa (26), is in a serious condition and was once removed to the Jyuzen Hospital.

On Sunday morning, fire broke out in a house of a merchant named K. Kaneko, Munegae-cho, Yokohama. The flames were quickly put out.

About two hundred men on the evening of Sept. 1st attempted to destroy the Deido Kwan, a Baptist evangelistic preaching place, at Isezaki-cho, Yokohama. The mob did much mischief throwing stones, etc. Three of the crowd were arrested and the remainder dispersed. It is alleged that Mr. T. Inoishi, a member of the church, in the course of a speech condemned the conduct of military and naval men as well as the behaviour of students. Through this challenge the public, including some soldiers, became excited and trouble resulted.

The councillors of the Kanagawa Prefectural Assembly held a conference on Sept. 2nd at the Kencho and investigated the proposal to vote forty-eight thousand yen needed to repair the damage sustained by bridges, roads, etc., in the rural districts through the recent storm. The councillors decided to introduce the bill at an extraordinary meeting of the Assembly.

Traffic on the Tokyo-Yokohama Electric Railway was stopped about 8 a.m. on Sept. 2nd owing to damage which occurred in the engine department at Kawasaki. The service is expected to be re-opened this morning.

With regard to the proposed entertainment of Marquis Ito, Resident-General of Korea, by the citizens of Yokohama, Mr. N. Mitsuhashi, Mayor, says that His Excellency has accepted the invitation of the city. As Yokohama is still suffering from a water famine and as the weather remains sultry, the date of the banquet has not yet been fixed.

The net income of the Kirin Beer Kabushiki Kaisha, Yokohama, for the first half of this year was yen 100,101, and an interim dividend has been declared at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum.

On the evening of Sept. 2nd, the dead body of a man was found in the creek near Dojo bridge, Nakamura. As he was not identified, the corpse was removed to the City Office.

NEW STEAMERS FOR TRANS-PACIFIC TRADE.

It is now definitely announced that the two newest vessels of the Weir fleet will run in conjunction with the Boston Steamship Company's steamers Trenont and Shawmut on the Northern Pacific route from Seattle to Manila and Hongkong, via the usual ports of call. The Suvaric and Kumeric are the two largest steamships of the Weir fleet, and represent the highest grade of cargo carriers. It has been arranged that their sailings will alternate with those of the Shawmut and Trenont, and that they will call regularly at Manila, Hongkong, Shanghai, Moji, Kobe, Yokohama, Victoria and Tacoma. These two new vessels are of the largest class of freighters to engage in the Oriental trade, and have a cargo carrying capacity of 17,000 measurement tons, or 12,000 tons deadweight. The Suvaric, which will be the first to leave Yokohama for Tacoma on the new schedule, sailing October 15th, was built at Glasgow in 1906 by Messrs. Russell & Co. for Messrs. Andrew Weir & Co., and her dimensions are: length 450 ft., breadth 55 ft., depth of hold 29 ft. She is well known on the Pacific Coast, having already made one round voyage to North China ports. She is now en route for Manila with a cargo of flour and agricultural material for North China ports. The Kumeric is a sister ship of the Suvaric, and made her maiden voyage in June, carrying Portuguese emigrants to Honolulu.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Yokohama is full these days of residents who have returned from the mountains. They tell thrilling tales of the privations caused by the floods.

Whilst lying at Circular Quay, Sydney, a fire broke out on the M. M. mail steamer Ville de la Ciotat, and the lower holds had to be flooded before the outbreak was got under. The damage was not extensive.

An appeal is made to the foreign residents of Yokohama to send aid in the shape of food, tinned milk and clothing to the poor people who have lost their little all through the Hakodate fire. We feel sure this appeal will not fall on deaf ears.

Fifty Chinese labourers who recently arrived at Kobe to be employed in railway construction will shortly return to their homes. Their entry in to Japan has been prohibited by the local government on the ground that their employment is not in conformity with an Imperial Edict regarding foreign labourers.

It is reported by the Japanese consul in Canton that silk business became brisk on enquiries appearing from Europe. During the week ending Aug. 31st, three thousand bales were sold to foreign traders. There is no definite report as to the summer crop but the yield is generally believed to be about seven thousand bales.

Owing to the big fire, the prices of commodities and the wages of workmen have gone up remarkably in Hakodate. The wages of a carpenter range between yen 4 and 5 per day. Matting which hitherto could be bought at yen 1.20 or 1.30 per piece has now risen to yen 4 on the average. Cleaned rice costs yen one per 3-quarters of a bushel.

A Hongkong telegram says that on the morning of Aug. 29th, the British cruiser Flora went ashore near the Gundel (?) Rock and sustained severe damage. H.M.S. Flora, which is referred to in this telegram, recently sailed to Singapore for reliefs brought out by H.M.S. Crescent and after changing crews was to have left the Straits on Aug. 24th for Hongkong.

Some interesting details are given in a Civil Service supplementary estimate concerning the expenses of the recent Colonial Conference. The original estimate was £6,000, but this was later revised to £8,200, and finally, owing to the number of guests being increased and the period of the Colonial Premiers' stay lengthened, an additional sum of £2,200 was required, bringing the total to £10,400.

Kano Riozo, twenty-nine years old, of Korai-bashi-dori 1 chome, Osaka, who is said to be a graduate of a Higher Commercial School, is being prosecuted on charges of having exported Japanese pictures of an immoral character to England in co-operation with three foreigners residing in London. This says the Kobe Herald, appears to be the man of whose doings complaint was recently made some days ago.

The death is announced in London of Mr. J. W. Pakeman, who will be remembered by many travellers to India and the East as the genial and obliging head of the passenger department of the P. and O. Company. He had been in the service of the Company for over fifty years, and for the greater part of the time was in charge of the passage department, until his retirement, two years ago, at the age of seventy.

Koyama Rokumosuke, who may be remembered by some of our readers in connexion with the Shimonoseki Treaty, during the negotiation of which he attacked Li Hung-chang, the Chinese Envoy, and who has since then been detained at the Abashiri Jail, in Hokkaido, under sentence of penal servitude for life, was temporarily released on August 25th and at once left for Tokyo. He is still, however, under police surveillance. When the Empress Dowager died the term of his punishment was reduced in consequence of good conduct. He will live at the house of a well-known tashi named Kō Nitara, in Majima-cho, Shitaya, Tokyo.

H. E. Chang Ying-t'ang, Assistant Imperial Resident at Lhasa, is reported to have arrived at Simla, India, armed with full powers to conclude an Anglo-Tibetan Commercial Treaty.

As a carriage conveying a lady and a gentleman was proceeding along the Bluff road, about five o'clock on Friday afternoon, the horse got beyond control and bolted down Jackson's Hill. Halfway down it left the road and plunged over the bank. In its fall the carriage was badly smashed up and the betto received severe injuries, but the horse and the lady and gentlemen escaped anything worse than a shock.

It is reported by Tokyo papers that £22,000,000 of the first and second 6-per cent bonds, which were issued during the war, will be redeemed on Sept. 10th through the branches of the Yokohama Specie Bank in London, New York, Paris and Berlin. A portion of the loan will be liquidated with conversion bonds in accordance with the request of holders. The cash payments will not exceed ten million pounds sterling.

The negotiations between the Kobe municipality and the Mitsui Bank for the former's proposed loan of a million yen, which the city has to pay to the Department of Finance in September as a portion of the expenditure needed in the harbour improvement scheme, have been settled. The Kobe branches of the Mitsu Bishi, First, Sumitomo, and Naniwa Banks have consented to take up certain portions of the loan through the Mitsui Bank. The interest is fixed at 6 per cent, and the loan will be redeemed within two years.

The Toyo Kisen Kaisha's new steamer Tenyo Maru will be launched at 11.30 a.m. on Sept. 14th at the Mitsu Bishi Shipbuilding Yard, Nagasaki. The ship is built of steel and is 100' A 1 at Lloyd's and in accordance with the Shipbuilding Encouragement Law. She is 550 feet in length, 63 feet beam, and 38.6 feet in depth. The gross tonnage is 18,725 tons, and the net tonnage, 13,500 tons. For the engines the turbine system has been adopted. She is of 16,850 indicated horse powers, and her speed will be 19 knots.

During August, transactions in raw silk in Yokohama were as follows:—

	Filature. bales.	Re-reels. bales.	Orikaishi. bales.	Sundry. bales.

According to a silk expert, business is brisker than ever it has been before in Yokohama.

The war of science against consumption, the great white plague, is chronicled with the most scrupulous detail in an appendix to the second interim report of the Royal Commission on Tuberculosis just issued. It is a huge Blue-book of over 700 pages, and is filled from beginning to end with the results of many thousands of experiments on animals, conducted, chiefly by Dr. A. Stanley Griffith, at the Walpole and Blythwood Farms, near Stansted, Essex. All sorts of animals have been used for the experiments—goats, pigs, monkeys, dogs, cats, rats, mice, hedgehogs, rabbits, and lemurs—and, in order to prevent human suffering, they have been inoculated with deadly consumption virus, obtained from consumptive cattle. The first animals were inoculated on May 6, 1902. In the first nine months twenty cattle, four pigs, six monkeys, and over 300 luckless guineapigs were inoculated and reported on. Through all the five years the experiments have been conducted with wonderful care. It was found that monkeys were especially susceptible to the bacillus taken from diseased cattle, and it is not proposed to conduct any more experiments with these. The chief result of this wonderful commission, as reported early this year, has been to combat Dr. Koch's famous theory that it is impossible to transmit consumption from cattle to human beings. The commissioners found that this is possible, and that diseased milk is the commonest source of the dreadful scourge of consumption.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

Edinburgh University has conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws in absentia upon Dr. William Bayard, of St. John, the oldest living graduate of the university and the oldest living medical practitioner in all Canada. "In 1837, I received my degree," said Dr. Bayard, "so I have been in practice for seventy years, for I still attend some of my old patients."

More than 5 per cent. of all the United States pensioners whose pensions were paid at the Boston agency died during the year ending June 30, 1907, and it is assumed that this proportion held good throughout the country. Pensioners on rolls of the Boston agency at the beginning of the fiscal year, July 1, 1906, were 59,973, and on June 30, 1907, 59,236, showing a net loss of 737.

Mosquitoes are said to be responsible for the depletion of the ranks at Fort Lawton. They cause men to desert, they discourage men who desire to enlist, and they make things uncomfortable for everything and everybody in connection with the fort, including the mules. Dogs are often on the verge of madness through the pernicious activity of these little pests. The men say they would rather have Pharaoh's locusts any time than the insects that make New Brunswick famous.

Passing through New Jersey on August 5th, on an express bearing them to Utica, were 123 girl converts to Mormonism. They are ticketed and checked, herded and guarded. Eighteen missionaries, including four old men who were intimates of Brigham Young, are in charge of the party. Avoiding New York, the Mormon agents found it possible to land shipload after shipload of their foreign recruits at Boston without attracting public attention. No fewer than twelve steamships have come in since January 1st last, bearing parties of New Mormons. The records show 1200 arrivals in seven months.

The Navy Department at Washington has received a mail report of the accident aboard the cruiser Colorado, at Chefoo, on June 22. The muzzle of the right-hand gun in the forward eight-inch turret, was blown off while firing at a target at 550 yards. Some of the fragments struck the forecastle, but only such damage as the ship's crew could repair was inflicted. No one was injured. One of the pieces of the bursted gun struck the other eight-inch gun, which upon examination was found to be cracked. It is not known whether the crack resulted from the flying fragments, or whether the damage was done by the firing of the gun.

Dr. Kunz, the well-known authority on precious stones, is quoted as vouching for the genuineness of the diamonds recently discovered in Arkansas. Dr. Kunz is said to be fully satisfied that an American diamond field has at length been discovered. "This peculiar formation," he said, "is volcanic rock of igneous stock, very similar to that of the South African diamond mines. In extent it covers about 100 acres; the stones, however, have all been found in an area some five acres in extent between two dikes, where a roadway has cut up the decomposed rock. Last reports place the total number of stones discovered at 130. Many are white and of good water, while others are yellow and some are brown. The two largest stones weigh six and one-half carats, one exceedingly fine and white and the other brown. Of earlier discoveries in Wisconsin, Ohio, Indiana and Michigan, it has been found that the occurrence of the precious stone was so unusual that it probably could be traced to the deposit of a glacial moraine. Pike county is several hundred miles south of the glacier line, and there seems to have been no way for the stones to have appeared there, except that they are in their original places."

The probating of the will of Col. Thomas Snell is causing lively interest in Central Illinois and Northern Iowa, where he had property valued at nearly $2,000,000. Of five children, only one son, Richard Snell of Clinton, Ill., is living. Yet, Colonel Snell cut off this only son entirely. In fact, the entire estate is put in trust and is not to be distributed until twenty years after the death of the youngest heir. The youngest daughter of Mrs. William V. Dinamore of San Jose, Cal., is the youngest heir at law and should she live until seventy years of age, the estate will remain in trust for twenty years longer than that, or ninety years. It is estimated that if the directions of the testator are carried out to the letter, and the estate not divided for seventy-five or one hundred years, it will, with its earnings, amount close to a billion dollars.

Reports by the savings banks of New York to the Banking Department of the State, covering the year ending June 30, exhibit results calculated to attract attention. This returns indicate a healthy growth in the main. The number of depositors increased 103,573 over the preceding year, and the aggregate resources, which amounted to $1,490,760,675, represented an augmentation of $46,316,183. On the other hand, it is noted that the increase in the aggregate deposits was only about $5,000,000 for the year, and that the amount withdrawn by depositors was $389,508,985, or $32,598,764 more than in the year before. The total surplus of the institutions was $95,743,206 at the end of the fiscal year 1907, as compared with $108,671,735 a twelve-month before, this shrinkage of $12,928,529 representing the decline in market values of the securities held.

There is still a golden harvest to be gathered from the gravels of the Klondyke valleys. The Government has completed an examination and survey of gold-bearing gravels of both high and low levels. It is estimated that in neighborhoods where gold is known to exist, and from which gold to the value of $94,750,000 has been taken by crude placer methods there remains $53,642,620, which may be recovered at a profit by hydraulic mining, dredging and other advanced methods of gold recovery. An examination was made by Geological Surveyor McConnell, assisted by Joseph Keele, geologist, and F. H. McLaren and F. O'Farrell, topographers. The estimate does not cover the creeks on Indian River slope, which have produced gold to the value of $24,250,000, making the total output of the Yukon district $119,000,000 to date. It is estimated that there can be eight to ten millions of gold recovered from these gravels, making the certain future output of gravel gold from the Yukon over $63,000,000.

Professor Herbert Joseph Davenport, assistant professor of Political Economy at the University of Chicago, had a few things to say to his class in political economy on August 8, about Chinamen. He holds that there will be a time in the near economic future when the Chinese race will be the dominant factor in all human affairs. There are only two things to do, midway students who heard him say, in order to stave off the yellow peril, Eat less and raise fewer children, he said. In no other way can the American people combat the forces of Chinese citizenship which will eventually encroach on the American people. "The Chinaman is inevitably destined to be the ruler of the world," he declared. After his class had mastered its surprise he continued, basing his arguments on the economic theory. "Bye and bye the world's supply of food will be so lessened by increase of population that the survivor of these conditions will be the man who can exist on the least. This is pre-eminently the Chinaman. In the future it is fair to presume that the country's population will be so large that we shall fear to raise families—in fact, we won't dare to raise them—because there will be an insufficient food supply for their sustenance. Even the people who are grown up will have to curtail their food supply. Then the Chinaman will come in. He not only can subsist on less, but he can raise families—large ones—and these can live on the available food supply. The country may later be overrun with Chinese, and then the future of the white race will be doomed."

The legislatures of all but seven states convened this year in regular session. What the result has been may be fairly inferred from this compilation of bills offered and passed, made by the Dallas News:

	Introduced.	Passed.
Colorado	928	225
Illinois	1,400	240
Iowa	907	240
Indiana	1,134	123
Kansas	1,241	437
Minnesota	2,131	562
Missouri	1,489	280
Nebraska	1,004	221
North Dakota	686	209
Pennsylvania	2,107	773
Rhode Island	448	142
South Dakota	664	267
Tennessee	2,084	601
Texas	1,046	135
Utah	586	92
Washington	825	267

Legislative activity in New York, New Jersey and Wisconsin swells the total of bills introduced to about 23,000 and of laws enacted to about 7,500. All told, probably not far from 50,000 bills were presented in the various legislatures this year, about a third of which became law.

No Catholic in the archdiocese of Milwaukee may hereafter be married after 5 o'clock in the evening in the winter or 6 o'clock in the summer; no Catholic may be married in a private house nor with anything but religious music, solos and duets being forbidden. Wholly Catholic weddings must take place in the church and mixed marriages in pastoral residences. These are some of the rules laid down in the "Hand-book for Catholic Parishioners of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee," a 120-page booklet just issued by Archbishop S. T. Messmer. It is comprehensive in its scope. Intoxicating liquors are barred from picnics, fairs and other gatherings held for church purposes and socials and card parties are forbidden on Saturdays and Sundays; and lectures on profane subjects, organ recitals, sacred concerts, stereopticon exhibitions and entertainments of a similar nature are strictly prohibited in churches. "To abstain from voting is always poor politics and often poor Christianity," says the archbishop in his hand-book, and he immediately proceeds to warn Catholics to "be on their guard against political candidates who are Catholic in name only, without practising their religion or who look only to political advancement and personal enrichment. Sooner elect a straight, outspoken Protestant of good Christian principle and fair intention than a Catholic with less religion and probably less principle."

KINDERGARTEN UNION OF JAPAN.

The first annual meeting of the Kindergarten Union of Japan was held in the Auditorium, Karuizawa, Aug. 14-15, 1907. The attendance was good, the sessions full, interesting and profitable. Several excellent papers were read and followed by discussion especially helpful to all. Superintendents and directors of Kindergartens and teachers in them will return to their work not only greatly benefited by the first meeting, but will look forward with pleasant anticipation to the second, which the executive committee have decided shall be held in Karuizawa Aug. 12-13, 1908. The following is the programme for the sessions just closed.

August 14, 9:30 a.m.

- I. Devotional
 1. Reading of Scripture.....Miss A. L. Howe
 2. Opening Prayer.....Rev. D. W. Learned, D.D.

SUMMARY OF THE FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF THE KINDERGARTEN UNION OF JAPAN.

The first annual report of the Kindergarten Union of Japan is at hand. It came to us fresh from the press and just in time for the Karuizawa August meeting.

The report is nicely gotten up, neatly bound and well illustrated with pictures of different kindergarten buildings, graduating classes, training schools and pupils. We find the report beautiful, very complete and valuable indeed.

A glance at the contents shows us here is the information necessary for getting acquainted with the kindergarten work represented by the members of the Union.

First in order are the names and addresses of the officers and executive committee, following these the membership list, which consists of twenty active and seven assistant members; may the number speedily increase.

The report contains an interesting account of the organization of the Union at Karuizawa, Aug. 28, Sept. 3, 1905. The reason for the formation of the Union is given and the purpose, "that of co-operation among the foreign kindergartens of Japan for increasing efficiency in their work for the little children."

The constitution and by-laws, of which much might be said in praise, are also included.

But what will claim our attention most and hold it longest, are the reports from the different kindergartens and training schools, found here and there from Kiushiu in the south to the Hokkaido in the north.

In response to a call from the corresponding secretary, twenty onesuperintendents wrote telling of the work under their care. In some places as at Hiroshima, Nagasaki and Ueda, Shinshu, those in charge report not merely one but two or three kindergartens. Thus we find a total of thirty-two kindergartens and five training schools in the Union.

The report contains accounts of the founding of these institutions, tells where they are located, the names of the founder and the present kindergartner, the board with which the latter is connected, and the training school in the home land from which she graduated.

The equipment for work, too, amount of ground, buildings, furnishing and Froebel materials are given. Indeed one starting a new kindergarten could obtain much valuable help from these reports. The number of children in the kindergartens vary. Some report thirty, others forty, fifty—some a still larger number. Altogether we estimate, there must be at least fifteen hundred little people under daily Christian influence and teaching. Dear fellow workers, is not this fact encouraging? Every morning as we meet our own circle of bright-faced children let us be helped by the thought that there are so many other Christian kindergartens, where the little people love to come, and where they are not only made happy for the day, but also started right for life in this world and the world everlasting.

These facts should be sufficient to spur us on in the work, without looking for the other and great results contained in the reports. However the modesty of the writers when speaking of their own work is so marked, I had almost said their chief characteristic, that one must read between the lines and take into consideration numbers, dates and figures to gain anything like a correct idea of the wonderful things being done for and with the little people in our mission kindergartens. Yet notwithstanding the modesty of the supervisors, the brevity of many reports and underestimates, one feels sure they have made, still there are so many good things to be told. We are at a loss which to mention first.

All will be glad to know our kindergartens stand well in the estimate of Japanese educators. The heads of normal schools, seem to regard our methods and work worthy of study, by sending their training classes to make observations of the same. Well do we remember the times, when the principal of the normal school in Tokyo and a class of twenty or more have come in upon us of a morning. In their eagerness to hear and see, they would surround the circle and afterward press into the class rooms to observe the table work. They were interested and pleased and showed it in their manner and the many questions asked.

There are kindergartens in the union for different classes of society, some for the poorest, others for the middle and official classes. Even royalty itself is reached, for the children of the Crown Prince are being trained by Taka Adachi San, an enthusiastic kindergartner, and quite recently, a member in our training school in Tokyo.

The children are helped and benefited not only while they are in the kindergarten, but after they have entered the public schools; where they are well spoken of and usually are the honor pupils (Yuto) in their classes.

We see from the reports, and note it with great pleasure and satisfaction, that a large proportion of children continue to attend the Sunday School after graduation from the kindergarten and that a number from the older institutions are now members of the church.

Again we are told that kindergartens everywhere prove an effective means of opening homes, starting Sunday Schools, mothers meetings, Bible classes and Evangelistic work without end. Different supervisors agree in saying that parents often receive the good influences through their children when they would not from the missionary. These little ones so happy in the kindergarten are messengers of light and joy in their homes, where they prepare the way for the Christian teachers, obtain for them a warm welcome and, later on, hearty cooperation in the work.

Again we ascertain through the influence of the kindergarten that prejudice against Christianity in many places is being broken down, individuals helped, family life made better, neighborhoods improved, the progress of disease stayed and communities elevated.

An instance of this kind is found in a kindergarten located in what is known as darkest Kyoto, so-called because of the dense moral darkness there. The director says here the children of the very poor are taught manners and the much needed "love one another" doctrine. "At this place too, fathers attend the mother's meetings."

Another example is the ten rin kindergarten in Kobe. This was opened especially for poor children. It is said the children as they first came were dirty, unkempt, covered with sores, sometimes from head to foot. Almost all had eye trouble of a more or less serious character.

This kindergarten is now a little more than thirteen years old. During that time great improvement has taken place in the ten rin neighborhood. Now eye trouble and skin diseases are the exception among the older pupils. We are told during times of epidemics of cholera and plague the little kindergartens and their families have been wonderfully exempt. Indeed so marked has been the improvement in this respect, that it is often commented upon by Japanese and foreigners.

In other cases, especially among the better classes, the results of the work are not so clearly seen. They can only be known in a general way. But as one director writes, when child after child is sent from the same family, and the waiting list is ever far in excess of the accommodations, those in charge feel that the kindergarten is being blessed, and are sure that in God's own time there will be a gathering in of the harvest from the seed so faithfully sown day by day in the hearts of the little ones.

Kindergartens are rapidly increasing in number, and the demand for trained kindergartners so great that five Christian training schools have been opened in as many different cities. The oldest one is the Glory Training School at Kobe. This was started in 1889, with Miss A. S. Howe, our honored president, as principal. The others are the Baptist Training School in Tokyo, the Methodist institutions at Hiroshima, Nagasaki and Ueda, Shinshu.

Numbers are not always given in the reports but we gather, from the very first until now, something like eighty trained kindergartners have graduated from the different schools, and that there are forty or more in training at the present time.

Most of these kindergartners are teaching in this land. One or two are helping to start kindergartens in China. Some have been or still are in America taking an extended course of study. Others have married and gone from the kindergarten but, as one puts it "are helping in beautiful home making" in Japan.

There are many calls for our kindergartens. Christian teachers are most acceptable everywhere, and the supply is always far less than the demand.

We trust that a still larger number of the graduates from our girls' schools will give themselves to kindergarten and work for the little children.

Respectfully submitted, EYA S. ROLMAN.

KARUZAWA ATHLETICS.

The following report of the Karuzawa Young People's Tennis Club and Out-door Gymnasium for last season and also the Treasurer's report of the K.T.C. has been handed to us for publication.

Karuzawa, August 28, 1907.

The following is my Report of Receipts and Disbursements of Funds collected in the summer of 1906 in Karuzawa on behalf of the Young People's Tennis Club, the Children's Out-door Gymnasium, and of the enlargement of K.T.C. Grand Stand.

In making this report I wish to thank the givers in the Community for their unflinching kindness and splendid generosity in providing these three much needed and long wished for improvements. Those who gave may have the satisfaction of having added a feature to our summer resort that makes it unique among all other such places in Japan, so far as I have heard. The Young People are provided for. The movement was practically unanimous, not more than five who were approached refused to give. The names are given in the order of subscription except that the ladies come first: Miss Froste, Mrs. Lloyd; Messrs Mac Arthur, Seymour, Chappell, Denning Parrott, Emberson, Pedley, Goodrich, Cowan, Gubbins, Forrest, McNair, Dunning, Reifsnider, Woodworth, Wyckoff, Pierson, Learner, Oltmans, Lampe, Steiner, Steadman, Faust, Sturwalt, Brokaw, Landis, A. Friend, Harris, Gorbould, Newton, Guy, Stevens, Murphy, Sale, Jones, Cain, Brand, Smith, Winn, A. D. Hall, Scudder, B.C. Thwaites, Harrington, Van Home, G. M. Fisher, Burgess, Buyer, Hibbard Bros. Phelps, C. H. Ross, Gleason, Edwards, Gerhard, Allen, Soper, C. H. Fisher, Fretz, Clement, Hagia, A. Friend, Merrifield, Denning, Waller, Evans, Maynard, J. M. Davis, Olds, Tesize, Langsdorf, A. Friend, McGinnis, Cunningham, Nichols, Hennigar, Weaver, Madden, Cady, Coulson, and Frazar.

Total Subscriptions..... 215.00
Sale of wire netting to K.T.C. 1.20
Temporary loan from K.T.C. for swings and seats 30.00
Total Receipts up to Aug. 20th when the work was brought to a standstill by the organisation of the K.A.A. 246.20
Expenditures: K. J. T. Courts 35.80; Netting 61.59; Nets 11.84;

Two Swings 27.16; Three Saws 5.75; Ten Benches 12.00; Four Net Poles 4.80; Miscellaneous 4.235; Grand Stand enlargement 60.00

Total Expenditures 223.175
This left a debt of Yen 23.025 plus 3.875 mistake, total 26.90, due the K. T. C. also 50.00 cost of Y. P. Grand Stand, total 76.90 still to be raised when the accounts were turned over to the K. A. A. Owing to the lateness of the season the new Association decided it would be impossible to raise that sum of money so it voted to pay for the Y. P. Grand Stand out of the surplus turned over to them from the K. T. C. funds though they had raised Yen. 4.00 before they ceased the struggle.

On learning this, the work of clearing off the debt was again voluntarily taken up as the whole business had been done from the start. The K. T. C. was in no sense responsible for the debt which belonged to the Public solely. Only those were approached who had not had a chance to contribute, and again there was a ready response. The names of the contributors to the debt were: The Misses Scripps, Howe, Barrows, Cozad, Whitcomb, Keen, DeForest, Aldrich, 32 East, Dr. Reed, Case, Hail, DeWolf, Russell, Soper, Garvin, Riddell, Nott; Mesdames Kirby, Bowden, H. B. Miller, Austin, Nitobe, Learned, Walker, Neville, Komor, Messrs Cobb, J. C. Ross, Borden, C. S. Davidson, Gray, McWilliams, J. C. Davidson, Morton, Leland, Bowles, Moule, Pettus, Vincent, Dr. Maxwell, Wilkinson, Ashmore, Erskine, Houdelink, 31 East, Igleheart, J. E. Hail, Dr. Hayes, McCaleb, Reischaur, Brokaw, Holbrook, Hlebley, Painter, J. E. J. Hart, Howard, Stadel, Morse, Nevin, and Newell.

Total sum raised from the above named persons..... 92.00
From and through H. J. Bennett 5.00=97.00
Expenditures of this sum were: 76.90 pd. A.A. Treas.
Rent of 134 (subo of land north of court No. 4 for the Children's Gym..... 3.02
For taking up Swings etc. 2.50; Incidentals 6.08;
Bal. pd. Murray 8.50=97.00
Respectfully yours, C. M. CADY.

It has been thought by several that the Members of the old Karuzawa Tennis Club would like to know how much it cost to run the club last year. The following is an outline of Receipts and Expenses up to the end of Aug. and the balance turned over to the Karuzawa Athletic Association at that time.

(I give the totals as they appeared on the Treas. books, though really both sides were increased by 15.00 yen as a mere matter of book keeping, there is therefore a apparently a discrepancy of 7.50 between the summarised statement of expenses in this report and the itemised account on the books, the transactions having been as follows:—First, 15.00 was paid for the whole lot containing courts 5 and 6; then this 15.00 was paid back by Dr. Stadel, then a little less than half was rented from Dr. Stadel for Courts 5 and 6 for yen 7.50.)

Net Receipts from Welcome Entertainment 124.85

Grand Total..... 494.23

* This should be 7.50 yen less as explained above.

Expenditures:—
Paid to Dr. Langsdorf for Balls and Nets in 1905 182.92
Care of Courts Nos. 1-4 up to Aug. 25th 87.95
Cost of Serving Tea for the Season 20.09
Cost of making Courts 5 and 6 52.80
Rent of new tennis grounds for one year (7.50) plus (7.50) 15.00
Rent of old tennis grounds for one year 10.00
Subscription to Auditorium, an "Ore" for Welcome Entertainment 10.00
Temporary loan to the K.J.T.C. for swings and seats 30.00
Miscellaneous expenses 10.55

Total expenses..... 419.31
Balance given by K.T.C. to K.A.A. 74.92

Total funds paid out 494.23
* To balance the yen 7.50 in Receipts as explained above.

From the above statement it will appear plain, I think, that the Welcome Entertainment was a mighty good thing for the finances of the last year of the K.T.C., for without it there would have been a debt of yen 49.46 instead of a Balance of yen 74.92. The Committee felt that in view of having received free of debt the new Club House from the Tennis Club of 1905 it could do no less than close the year at least without debt though it did start with a debt to one of its members of yen 182.92. The Committee also felt that the much needed enlarged seating capacity of its Grand Stand should be raised by public subscription as the enlargement was for the benefit of the public. The public evidently felt so too for the 60 yen needed was easily raised (not by the Committee for the Club as a Club had absolutely nothing to do with it) in connection with the movement of the Public on behalf of the Children and Young People, so generous was the response to the unofficial appeal; nevertheless, the Committee wish here to express its gratitude to those who so heartily made the enlargement possible. It also wishes to thank most heartily its predecessor, the K.T.C. of 1905 and those individuals who built and turned over to the Club of 1906 the very convenient Club House that stands between the two Grand Stands and which adds so much to the comfort of not only the Club members but also of the public who share its hospitality. It pays even in dollars and cents to acknowledge one's "benefits and mercies" and evidently the continuation of that "open handed" hospitality which has always been the dominant attitude of the K.T.C. from the very first, met the reward pronounced upon those who, having freely received, freely give. "Welcome!" has been the universal word of greeting to "all members of the Karuzawa Summer Community" by the Tennis Club and, let us hope and pray it may never be, as it ought not to be, any other form of greeting than that. C.M.C.

CHARITABLE COLLECTIONS.

Governor Sufa, of the Kanagawa Prefecture, has issued regulations dealing with persons who intend to collect money and goods for charitable purposes. The regulations came into force on August 27th.

Art. 1.—These regulations shall apply to all those who collect money or goods by donation for festivals, educational, charitable and other purposes, and also through means of theatrical performances and other similar arrangements. Collections which are under special control of other laws or regulations are excepted.

Art. 2.—The present regulations shall not be applied to the collection of money by Government offices or juridical persons after accidental distresses, etc.

Art. 3.—The collection of money or goods is limited to the jurisdiction of the police office concerned, and permission must be obtained from that office; otherwise permission must be obtained from the prefectural government office.

Art. 4.—In the application asking for the foregoing permission, the following items must be set forth.

1.—The applicant's name, native place, place of residence, age, and general record of his antecedents. In the case of presenting an application through a representative, the power-of-attorney must be attached to the letter.

2.—The purpose for which the collection of money or goods is made.

3.—Means to be adopted in collecting money or goods.

4.—The amount of money or the quantity of the goods to be collected.

5.—The extent of the area where the money or goods are to be collected.

6.—The period during which the collection is to be carried out.

In the case of an application being presented by a juridical person, its appellation, the place where its office is situated, and the name of its representative, must be described, and the regulations of the society must be attached to the application.

Art. 5.—When any alteration occurs in the foregoing article, the change must be notified to the government office concerned, with the reason, and further permission must be obtained.

Art. 6.—If any person or body who has obtained such permission desires to employ persons to make collection, their names, native land and places of residence, Age, extent of area to which they are to attend and their antecedents must be notified to the government office and permission obtained.

Art. 7.—When the time of the collection has expired, a statement of accounts, etc., must be presented to the government office within ten days.

Art. 8.—In all cases where collections are made the facts must not be exaggerated and contributions must not be enforced from any one.

Art. 9.—The authorities may examine at any time the letters, books, etc., regarding the collection, and shall issue an order if necessary.

Art. 10.—If there is any infringement of these regulations or any anxiety lest the collection shall injure the public peace permission will be cancelled.

Art. 11.—Any one who infringes these regulations will be punished with Korya (police detention varying from one to ten days) or Kuwoyo (a fine varying between sen 5 and yen 1.95).

Art. 12.—In the case of an infringement of the regulations by a juridical person, its representative will be held responsible.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE WORK OF CATHOLIC MISSIONARIES

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR—In your issue of the 28th inst. you mention a certain letter of the Reverend Father Alexandre Bron appearing in the Etude, in which he finds fault with the missionaries of the Holy Roman Church in the Orient.

It is quite true that you very properly and politely demurred from the statements of the Reverend Father, for which all fair minded foreigners must thank you in their hearts, even if they are too modest to speak out in meeting. Disclaiming any sympathy with any distinctly Roman doctrine, and in the interests of truth only, I would venture to suggest that a nearer acquaintance with the Mission to the Japanese would bring out the facts that the Roman clergy are the only set of foreigners who are able to be in any real sense spiritual pastors to the people for any extended period, that in point of numbers their converts are almost, if not quite, half the whole number of Christians; that they more than any other missionaries place their sacred calling before all other considerations, and none of them are found in secular occupations; if here and there a little language teaching is done, a close scrutiny will reveal the deep religious purpose, all the more powerful because so carefully concealed, and always ultimately successful.

Who penetrate more deeply into the interior?

Who are more successful in acquiring the language?

Who are more in touch with the people through the sympathy that polite people naturally feel for each other?

Who have placed the greatest number of names on the roll of martyrs in Japan?

Who aroused us to help the famine sufferers in the N.E.?

Who was the only foreigner that perished in this seismic wave that swept the coast of Iwate?

Who care for the lepers?

Seven-eighths of the people still live in the villages and farming communities of the interior, only one in four hundred has been converted to any form of Christian faith, and the converts often find it difficult to conceal the desire to see their teachers sail away, for home.

Under all the circumstances it seems to your humble servant that we need the Roman clergy to set the pace for the rest of us.

Perhaps after all the letter of the good French father was merely intended to draw us out. If so this protest is perhaps a work of supererogation, and you are under no obligation whatever to insert it, but if from your natural goodness of heart you do put it in print, I beg that you use whatever influence you may have with the French fathers to induce them to let the rest of us know something more about their work and methods.

To instruct the ignorant is one of the spiritual works of mercy. It is all very well to write home in French, but we want to see something more in the Japan Mail from time to time about the details of their work in the interior. Yours, etc.

ROTAN.

THE SEAMEN'S INSTITUTE AT KOBE.

As was foreshadowed in the statements published in our last issue, said the Kobe Herald of Sept. 2nd, the question which unfortunately arose between the Committee appointed by the community and the Salvation Army with regard to the Seamen's Institute has been amicably settled, the Army fully withdrawing its claim that the belongings of the Institute were its own property. The officials of the Salvation Army frankly recognised that the terms of the resolution passed at the time of the handing over of the Institute by the community, of which they had been unaware until Saturday morning, put a different aspect on the matter, and later on that day Commissioner Estill at Tokyo, sent the following telegram to Superintendent Dodd:—"Consider Committee's action extremely arbitrary. Date of transfer of Institute is a matter of convenience of both parties. Furniture could have been discussed in a friendly manner. We should have yielded immediately shown we held Institute in trust for the community. Hand over the control; remain in the house. Show this to the Committee.—Commissioner."

This telegram was considered at a meeting of the Committee at the British Consulate this morning, and at noon the Rev. J. W. Platt and Mr. C. Crowther, on behalf of the Committee, proceeded to the Institute to take over the premises in accordance with the notice sent to Superintendent Dodd on Saturday. No further difficulty arising, Captain Dodd at once signed the following document:—

"I, Horace Dodd, Superintendent of the Seamen's Institute, an officer of the Salvation Army, in conformity with the instructions of Commissioner Estill, the chief officer of the Army in Japan, do hereby at noon of the 2nd day of September hand over to the Committee, appointed by the community of Kobe to receive the same, the Seamen's Institute, which has been held in trust by the Army since Aug. 9, 1903, and do hereby undertake to submit by Sept. 10, full and complete inventory of all furnishings and properties of the Institute at present in use, as acquired at time of transfer or during the Army's management."

"I further undertake to submit by the 10th inst. a full and complete statement of accounts up to midday of Sept. 2, 1907, and to hand over to the Committee any and all balance of funds as shown by said accounts."

"The residence of myself and family or any other officers of the Army within the premises of the Institute after noon of 2nd September, as per invitation of the Committee, and during period of accounting, shall in no way prejudice the complete restitution of the Institute, which is hereby undertaken, to the community of Kobe."

The members of the Committee thereupon expressed their gratification that the misunderstandings which had arisen had been satisfactorily settled, and Captain Dodd suitably responded, the matter thus coming to an amicable end.

DEATH OF MR. RIZZETTI.

It is with sincere regret, said the Kobe Herald of Sept. 3rd that we announce the death at the International Hospital yesterday evening at 6.40 of Mr. Alessandro Rizzetti, who for many years has filled the arduous position of Bandmaster here. For some time past Mr. Rizzetti has been in a very poor state of health, largely due, if we mistake not, to anxiety over financial matters, but his friends felt confident that a rest and short sojourn in the hills would restore him to his usual strength and good spirits. Unfortunately this optimistic forecast proved illusory and when he returned from Arima, rather more than three weeks ago, it was perceived that the trouble was more serious than had been generally supposed.

By the advice of his friends Mr. Rizzetti then entered the International Hospital, where, needless to say, he has since received all that the best medical skill and trained nursing could do for him. Mr. Rizzetti, who, despite educational disadvantages, was undoubtedly a musician of exceptional capacity—his success in training numerous bandmen during past years sufficiently attests this—has been a resident of Kobe for upwards of 15 years, and during the whole of that time he has done very much more than his share in contributing to the enjoyment of people here. In the face of exceptional difficulties, despite severe and repeated discouragements, Bandmaster Rizzetti stood to his post and, by his ill-requited devotion to his favourite art, won the esteem and friendship of many here. His ability in training Japanese bandmen was exceptional. Mr. Rizzetti, if we mistake not, came to Japan about 20 years ago in the U.S.S. Monocacy and, on being discharged from the double-ended which used to be so familiar to many an old resident, settled for a short time in Yokohama and then came down here where he has ever since remained. In the death of Alessandro Rizzetti Kobe has lost a good and faithful servant, whose merits the public may possibly not have quite fully recognised. The funeral took place on Wednesday.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

A semi-official statement issued at St. Petersburg denies the newspaper report that Russia has secretly agreed to make Japan further concessions in northern Manchuria, among others the inclusion of the Sungari Valley in Japan's sphere of influence.

PARLIAMENT PROROGUED.

Parliament has been prorogued. The King's Speech from the Throne said the relations with Foreign Powers continue friendly and it was trusted that the Hague conference would result in agreements tending to mitigate the evils of war and secure the peace of the world. His Majesty had reviewed the home fleet and been profoundly impressed by the efficient condition of the ships and the fine bearing and discipline of the officers and men. Referring to the visit of Prince Fushimi, the King said he was much gratified by receiving the visit of His Imperial Highness "who was sent on a special mission by my ally the Emperor of Japan to convey His Imperial Majesty's thanks for the Order of the Garter."

CRICKET.

Later.

The following are latest returns of county cricket: Lancashire beat Derby at Manchester by one wicket; Leicestershire beat Essex by 8 wickets at Leicester; Gloucester beat Hampshire by two wickets at Bournemouth; the Middlesex Kent match at Lord's was drawn and Yorkshire beat Sussex at Brighton by 5 wickets.

BRITAIN AND VENEZUELA.

It is reported from Georgetown (British Guiana) that the Governor has announced that regret was expressed to President Castro for the violation of Venezuelan territory by Capt. Calder and the gum seized had been returned.

BRAZIL'S NEW WARSHIPS.

Brazil has ordered three battleships and two cruisers from the Armstrong and Vickers-Maxim Companies.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.

The protocol modifying the Sugar Convention, which had been drafted by the Brussels commission and been accepted by the Powers, has been signed at Brussels.

THE "JENA" DISASTER.

A voluminous report of the commission of enquiry appointed by the French Senate ascribes the Jena disaster to spontaneous combustion of powder but says that in reality the direct cause of the disaster was the lack of cooperation in the Navy and the antagonism between various branches of the service. The report censures the naval artillery authorities for their remissness in fixing responsibility and condemns the administrative anarchy prevailing.

SINGAPORE AND ITS QUAYS.

London, August 29.

In the House of Commons yesterday Mr. Claude Hay drew attention to the opposition of the merchants of Singapore to the construction of the Tei Kayer quay.

The Colonial Secretary, Lord Elgin, said the question had been fully considered, the proposals approved, and the contract made for carrying out the work.

JAPANESE DECORATION FOR PRESIDENT FALLIERES.

At Paris Mr. Kurino, Japanese Ambassador, ceremoniously presented the insignia of the Order of the Chrysanthemum to President Fallières, who, in thanking the Ambassador for the gift, said he was convinced the Franco-Japanese Treaty would conduce to the cordial relations of the two countries and the peace of the world.

STUDY OF COTTON-GROWING.

A special commission from the republic of Colombia will shortly arrive in Great Britain for the study among other things of cotton-growing in the British Empire with a view to cotton-growing in Colombia.

The commission visits Ceylon, the Straits, and Japan.

WEST AFRICAN COTTON.

One thousand and fifty bales of West African cotton were landed at Liverpool yesterday. This is a record shipment.

DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has recommended the clergy not to celebrate "deceased wife's sister" marriages.

UNSETTLED MOROCCO.

News from Tangier says a garrison has been ordered to Fez.

The British Consulate has warned British residents to proceed to specified places in the suburbs in case the town is attacked.

Europeans from Fez have arrived at Larache (El Araische), and report that the Moors of the capital were clamouring for a holy war when they left.

JAPANESE AND THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

London, August 31.

The Oriental Exclusion Leagues of the Pacific coast of the United States and Canada are planning a convention at which delegates from every League will be present.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF COAL.

A rise in the price of coal is generally announced simultaneously with a five per cent. increase of wages. This is due to the extraordinary demand, especially by foreign countries, and to the shortage of miners.

CRICKET.

Essex has beaten Northamptonshire at Northampton by eight wickets.

BRIDGE DISASTER IN QUEBEC.

Sixty-one workmen have been killed at Quebec through the collapse of a section, 1,800 feet long, of the centre span of a railway bridge in course of construction. The accident was due to a construction train working on the bridge.

Original from

THE "COMMONWEALTH."

Later.
The repairs to the Commonwealth (which recently stranded at Lamlash) will occupy three months.

A ROYAL BETROTHAL.

Prince George of Greece has been betrothed to Princess Marie Bonaparte.

MOONLIGHTING.

Armed Moonlighters attacked a house at Athenry and fired at the windows. The police patrol returned the fire. There were no arrests.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN "ENTENTE."

London, September 1.

The Anglo-Russian agreement was signed at St. Petersburg to-day. Ratifications will be exchanged shortly, when the terms will be published.

THE ST. LEGER.

London, September 2.

The St. Leger betting is 5 to 4 on Wool-winder, 8 to 1 against Roi Herode.

MOROCCO.

There is a panic in Tangier. A special steamer to-day conveys many families to Algieras. Many Europeans are sending their families next week.

NATIVE RISING IN WEST AFRICA.

A cable from Mossamedes, Angola, West Africa, says that the Portuguese defeated 7,000 rebel natives near Rocades, inflicting heavy loss. The Portuguese had forty killed and wounded.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN ENGLAND.

Later.
Twenty passengers have been injured in a railway collision at Bowness, on the borders of Westmoreland.

EFFECT OF THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN UNDERSTANDING.

The papers welcome the Anglo-Russian agreement as further securing the peace of the world, though it in nowise imperils an entente like the Anglo-French.

The Standard's St. Petersburg correspondent says that the former spheres of activity in Persia are abolished, Russia making concessions, whereby Northern Persia is opened to British commercial enterprises, Great Britain making similar concessions in Southern Persia.

THE DOCKERS STRIKE AT ANTWERP.

London, September 3.

The dockers' strike at Antwerp is extending. It has now been proceeding for many weeks and has disorganized the shipping industry. There have been serious disturbances and much damage to property. Many English strike-breakers have been injured.

THE ANCHOR STROKE.

A special meeting of the Billiard Association has been held, at which it was decided to abolish the anchor stroke.

DEATH OF COLONEL FITZGEORGE.

Colonel Sir A. Fitzgeorge, third son of the late Duke of Cambridge, has died at Lucerne.

THE BELFAST RIOTS.

London, September 3.

At the inquest held on the victims of the shooting at Belfast during the riots, Major Thackeray, who ordered the firing, declared that the troops were confronted with the alternative of firing or running away.

SOLDIERS MUTINY.

It is reported from Pretoria that the field troop of the Engineers, while proceeding to Orangia, mutinied owing to the treatment they received from their officer. They slashed the saddlery. A troop of the Queen's Bays was requisitioned and the men were re-escorted to Pretoria.

RAISULI'S TERMS.

Later.

Reuter's agent at Tangier reports that the British Legation has received letters from Sir Harry Maclean, which are understood to notify Raisuli's terms.

MURDERS ON THE RAND.

There is a recrudescence of outrages among the Chinese on the Rand. Occupants of lonely houses have been assaulted and one killed. Twenty-three murders have occurred on the Rand since August, and these are mostly ascribed to the Chinese.

MOROCCO.

London, September 4.

The Spanish Government in agreement with France, has decided to send troops to Tangier, Tetuan, Larache, and Teltazar to protect the Europeans pending the organization of a police force.

During a reconnaissance on Sunday, five miles from Casa Blanca, the enemy charged in strength. They were repulsed but continued vigorously to harass the French as they retired.

PLAGUE AT SAN FRANCISCO.

There have been three cases of plague at San Francisco.

THE COST OF THE PHILIPPINES.

London, September 4.

Some American papers are agitating for the sale of the Philippines. Statistics are published showing that they have already cost the United States eighty millions sterling.

STRANDING OF THE "COMMON-WEALTH."

As a result of the courtmartial held to enquire into the stranding of H.M.S. Commonwealth at Lamlash, Captain Browning was found guilty of default, but not of negligence, and was reprimanded.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE C.P.R.

Later.

A Canadian Pacific Railway train bound to Toronto has been derailed. Five were killed and a number injured.

THE ANTWERP DISTURBANCES.

There have been serious disturbances in connection with the dockers' strike at Antwerp. Six persons, including women and children, have been shot by the police. Twenty-five policemen were wounded. Piles of timber lying on the quays were soaked in paraffin and fired by the strikers. The firemen had much difficulty in extinguishing the flames.

DEATH OF AN EMINENT COMPOSER.

London, September 5.

The death is announced of Mr. F. H. Grieg, the well-known composer, who was born at Bergen in 1843 of Scottish ancestry, his grandfather and father having been British Consuls at Bergen.

SHIPPING COMBINATION AGAINST STRIKES.

An international conference of British and continental shipping federations will be held in London in October with a view to combined resistance against strikes.

CASA BLANCA.

It is reported from Casa Blanca that a strong reconnaissance was made on the 30th, which was heavily attacked on all sides six miles out. After several hours fighting the enemy was finally driven off and the camp regained.

(By Special Arrangement with the "Tokyo Asahi Shimbun.")

CANADA AND JAPAN.

San Francisco, August 28.

The Canadian Government is conducting negotiations with Japan so as to limit the number of Japanese entering their territory irrespective of whether the immigrants come from Hawaii or from other places. The Canadian authorities propose to limit the number to five or six hundred each year. It is said that the influx of Japanese from Hawaii alone total several times the proposed number.

San Francisco, August 29.

Anti-Japanese movements are imminent in Canada. Mr. T. Nose, Japanese Consul-General in Ottawa, says that in the Canadian-Japanese convention which was concluded last year, it was stipulated that Japanese shall be permitted, as a privilege, to enter the Dominion in the same manner as Europeans. The proposed exclusion of Japanese will create a dispute between Japan, Canada, and Great Britain. The Japanese Government could not tolerate prejudicial treatment.

JAPANESE SEAL POACHERS.

A telegram from Alaska says that a number of Japanese landed on the Pribyloff islands and attacked the various villages. Subsequently, they robbed the villagers of their fish, etc. The American guards on the islands are insufficient to prevent the Japanese raids. The patrol ship Rush was destroyed. The Japanese left without meeting any obstruction.

NEW SHIPS.

Mr. Hoff, chairman of the naval committee in the Lower House, has said that he will introduce at the forthcoming session of Parliament a proposal advising the construction of four battleships varying between 20,000 and 25,000 tons.

THE NEW SULTAN OF MOROCCO.

London, August 29.

Muley Hafid, the brother of the reigning Sultan of Morocco, who has been proclaimed at Mazagan, has issued an Edict, expressing a desire to maintain amicable relations with the various Powers. He urges the people to refrain from creating disturbances and to remain peaceful.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Hague.

Certain difficulties continue with regard to enumerating the subjects whereon the Powers are to submit to obligatory arbitration. It is understood, however, that an effort is on foot to draw up a formula which will bring into a new convention all the Powers prepared to submit to the obligatory arbitration principle without reservation.

A special meeting discussed the question mentioned yesterday and practically decided that the Conference had competence to deal with the subject.

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

London, August 29.

The British Parliament was prorogued today.

The Bills to which the Royal assent has been given during the Session number sixty-two.

In the course of the Speech from the Throne, the King expressed gratification at the recent visit to England of H. H. Prince Fushimi, who was sent as "the special Envoy of our ally the Emperor of Japan."

At the close of the Session the Government's position is in no way affected. The Government's attack on the House of Peers has not progressed. Ministers hope to arouse the country during the autumn, especially in Scotland, by a series of meetings and open-air speeches. The country at present shows no signs of responding.

AMERICAN NEWS.

San Francisco, Aug. 29.

The Washington Chamber of Commerce has sent a reply to the letter received from Chambers of Commerce of Japan. The main feature of the American communication is that the recent steps adopted by the Californian people toward the Japanese were not the real wish of Americans as a whole. The majority of the American nation are desirous to treat the Japanese justly and impartially. In conclusion, the reply says that the Washington Chamber will exert their utmost efforts to maintain the friendship existing between the two nations.

JAPANESE IMMIGRANTS INTO NORTH AMERICA.

London, August 30.

New York wires that the Oriental exclusion leagues on the Pacific coast of Canada and America are arranging to hold a great meeting.

In British Columbia opponents of Asiatic immigration threaten to forcibly prevent the landing of Orientals. (Japanese have been of the greatest assistance in developing the country and the present panic is undoubtedly due to San Francisco agitators.)

The Boston Chamber of Commerce has passed a resolution deprecating the agitation as tending to embitter relations between Japan and America and opposing any legislation discriminating against the Japanese.

At Ottawa Mr. Consul Nosse states that Japanese immigration has been much exaggerated, the net immigration since the 1st of January being only 611.

THE HAGUE.

At the Hague animated proceedings took place in Committee with reference to obligatory arbitration. The possibility of ultimate agreement is indicated.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, September 1.

St. Petersburg reports that the negotiations for the Anglo-Russian agreement are practically concluded. The formal signature is expected to take place in a few days. It is understood that the publication of the text will be delayed for a short time, in order that it may be communicated beforehand to the interested Powers, so as to accentuate the fact that the agreement, while assuring the interests of the signatories is not directed against other Powers, also as a mark of international courtesy.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

The third committee of the Hague Conference has unanimously adopted a regulation enjoining that before hostilities are commenced a declaration of war must be made, with a statement of reasons or an ultimatum. Neutrals must be immediately notified of the existence of a state of war.

CASA BLANCA.

Two thousand Arabs fiercely attacked but were driven off after two hours' fighting.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, September 2.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that the Anglo-Russian agreement was signed yesterday. It is believed that it presages eventually a closer union between the two nations. The comments of the press are unquestionably favourable. The English Radical opposition is based upon the hypothesis that England thereby retards the constitutional regime in Russia. This causes surprise in Russia. The Times, recognizing Russia's preponderance in the north of Persia as unassailable, says that the agreement has assured British interests in the south of Persia, and the peace of Asia, and adds that the prospect of the eventual reduction of military expenditure in India is worth some sacrifice.

THE HAGUE.

The Committee's report with reference to submarine mines has been passed subject to reservations made by certain powers. The British proposal for prohibiting mines anchored in the high seas until the discovery of some method of rendering them innocuous, has been carried by 12 votes against Russia, Germany and Austria. America did not vote. Japan led the opposition to Russia's proposal to allow the use of mines as a temporary measure pending the discovery of some contrivance to make them innocuous. Admiral Shimamura pointed out that this proposal meant the unrestricted employment of uncontrolled engines of destruction for a series of years.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, August 31.

At a dinner given last evening by Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, Mr. Schwerin, Vice-president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, said that the privileges given to the whites must be extended to the Japanese. Should the proposed expulsion of the Japanese be enforced, Japanese would have a right to recover their national reputation through proper measures. Mr. Irish (?) a prominent politician, said that Japan has become the Great Britain of the Orient. Americans must pay more attention to the position of the Japanese than they had done. The right of naturalization must be granted to the Japanese if requested. Americans must not mind what prejudiced people from other countries said regarding Japanese. Many more Japanese were needed in America to-day. This address was received with applause both by Americans and Japanese.

The Japanese fishing vessels Kaio Maru and Nitto Maru, which were in custody on suspicion of having engaged in poaching near Alaska without permission of America, have been acquitted after examination by the American Department of Justice.

Mr. Glass, vice-president of the Telephone Company, who was undergoing trial in connexion with the San Francisco city scandals, has been convicted of having bribed the Mayor and former municipal authorities. He will be sentenced to grave punishment.

As already reported, the Superintendent of the San Francisco Education Board lodged a petition in the California Supreme Court asking the Court "to give an order to the Mayor and city council to decide by votes of the citizens whether the laws are to be revised with a view to separating Japanese and Chinese pupils from other scholars in the common schools." The Court dismissed the petition.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, September 4.

The Anglo-Russian agreement causes the greatest satisfaction in Paris as testifying to the improved relations, as conducing to the maintenance of peace and as fortifying the diplomatic situation of France. The Echo de Paris says that the Powers are encouraging Spanish inactivity at Casa Blanca, deeming French activity to be a transgression of the Algeiras agreement.

THE HAGUE.

It is reported from the Hague that there is a growing insuperable difficulty with regard to the distribution of judges among the Powers. This has thwarted the labours of the Committee dealing with the new permanent court. The committee have been compelled to confine their discussions to other features of the scheme. While fruitless negotiations continue with the American States regarding the liability of neutral residents to serve in war time, a British amendment has been carried to the effect that the laws of the belligerent State must be taken into account.

RAISULI.

Reports from Tangier state that Raisuli's influence is growing. He is now settling the Tangier district, and much anxiety is felt everywhere.

THE AMERICAN BATTLESHIP SQUADRON.

London, September 5.

It is reported from New York that preparations for the cruise of the battleship fleet are proceeding energetically. It is stated that the majority of the captains will be replaced by younger men. An uneasy feeling undoubtedly prevails as to the real purpose of the cruise.

"NEW YORK HERALD" COMMENTS.

The New York Herald, in announcing the reported hoisting of the Japanese flag over a small island immediately adjoining the Philippines, says that the incident may probably prove to have been beyond the ken of the Japanese Government, but imaginative people will recall the announcement that the next Japanese budget provides for a new squadron between Formosa and Hongkong.

THE HAGUE.

The Hague Committee has adopted the provisions prohibiting recourse to armed force for the recovery of contractual debts unless the debtor State rejects arbitration, or after arbitration fails to conform to the verdict.

THE FIGHTING AT CASA BLANCA.

There was sharp fighting on Sunday at Casa Blanca. The Arab losses were considerable.

THE GERMAN NAVY.

The demands for a strong German navy are growing daily.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

THE GRAIN VETO.

The prohibition of grain import into or export from Kwantung was issued by the Chief Commissioner of Customs in Peking without reference to the Chinese Government. Japan's protest was the first intimation the Waiwupu had of the fact. Mr. Na Tung is in favour of rescinding the prohibition, and that will probably be done soon.

MOJI.

The Military Governor of Vladivostok has declared Moji to be a cholera-infected port.

STEAMSHIP PROPULSION.

The White Star Line have sent the following to the press:—Owing to the advance of the steam turbine, the question of propulsion is prominently in the minds of shipbuilders, shipowners, and the general public whenever a new steamer is announced, and, although some companies have adopted the turbine system in its entirety, a general agreement has not yet been arrived at to dispense with the system of reciprocating engines. It was recently announced that Mr. Ismay had placed an order with Messrs. Harland and Wolf on behalf of the Dominion Line, which, as is generally known, is in association with the White Star Line, for a large passenger steamer to be constructed at Belfast for the trade between Liverpool and Canada and later it was announced that this steamer would be quickly followed by another. It is of interest to learn that in the first of these steamers a new principle in marine engineering has been decided upon in a combination of turbine machinery and reciprocating engines. The proposal which has just been adopted is to fit two sets of quadruple expansion engines balanced on the builders' usual system with the addition of one low pressure turbine. Each will be quite independent of the others, and will have its own shaft and propeller, so that the steamer will have three distinct installations of machinery and three separate propellers. It is expected that this combination will have many advantages for ocean liners, embracing the merits of quadruple engines carrying a high steam pressure and the benefit obtainable from a greater expansion of steam in a low pressure turbine. Many have expressed surprise that in the new White Star steamer Adriatic the example of other lines was not followed in adopting the turbine system, and it is now proved that the managers of that line referred to adhere to reciprocating engines in view of the combination above referred to having been still under consideration, and now for the first time adopted. Should this prove the success which is expected, it is fair to assume that future vessels to be built for the associated companies, several of which are in contemplation, will be similarly engined.

MARIE CORELLI'S "CUTTING" CRITICISM.

"By Jove," exclaims Lord Carlyon to his beautiful novelist wife, in Miss Marie Corelli's latest volume of short stories, called "Delicia," "by Jove, you are cutting, you know Delicia."

"Cutting"—the word may as well be taken out of his lordship's worthless mouth and applied to Miss Marie Corelli's purpose in her latest book. Her purpose is the exposure and castigation of the society men, who, like Lord Carlyon, spend their time—

"First in accumulating debts and then in looking about for a woman with money to pay them—a woman upon whose income they can afterwards live comfortably for the rest of their worthless lives."

There is the position stated, without unnecessary beating about the bush, but with all the plain sincerity and deep conviction which give authority to Miss Corelli's statements. Men, the "great majority" of them, are too cowardly nowadays to earn their own livings. They want to "sneak behind a woman's petticoats to escape the general fray."

NOVELS THAT PAY.

And behind what sort of petticoats, you ask, is the sneaking to be done? Naturally the victims chosen by men of this type are generally women like Delicia "a lady novelist," as the reviewers used once to put it, but better styled a noble "woman-worker." For Delicia has made a fortune by her work, and this—not his admiration for the work—is what attracts Lord Carlyon to her.

Ten thousand pounds for her last book!—paid down without a murmur, even before work was finished! Surely "these be excellent qualities," he mused within himself, afterwards falling into a still more profound reverie when he heard that the royalties alone on her already-published works brought her in an income of over £5,000 a year.

So Lord Carlyon, the tall, handsome, penniless guardsman, fascinates and marries Delicia.

But that is not all, and not enough. You might think that he would remain devoted to her, be grateful to her for "keeping him" with the income made by the popular books. No; the type painted by Miss Corelli (so she tells us in her introductory note,) these very men,

"When they have secured the ignoble end of their ambition—namely, the rich woman to live upon—under matrimonial suzerainty, are the first to run down women's work, women's privileges, women's attainments, and women's honour."

WORD OF REPROACH.

And the reproach such creatures bring against these women-workers is that they are "unsexed."

"The woman who paints a great picture is 'unsexed'; the woman who writes a great book is 'unsexed'; in fact, whatever woman does that is higher and more ambitious than the mere act of flinging herself down at the feet of man and allowing him to walk over her makes her in man's opinion unworthy of his consideration as woman; and he fits the appellation 'unsexed' to her with an easy callousness which is as unmanly as it is despicable."

Yet how tolerant he is, this man so afraid of the unwomanly women, how infinitely tolerant of another sort of woman who may be described, in Miss Corelli's "cutting" phrase, as all "Body and Grin."

"A beautiful Body, trained to walk in a look well—an affable Grin, expanding at the sight of champagne and other mundane luxuries—these are all that is necessary. If this beautiful Body be well-nigh stripped to man's gaze night after night on the boards, he will never call the woman who so exposes herself 'unsexed,' nor will he apply the word to her if she drinks too much wine and brandy."

Never so plainly, perhaps, as in this burning preface, and the illustrative story that follows it, has Miss Corelli lashed the cowardice and vanity of man, or the heartlessness and atheism which she tells us, are "making of 'upper class' England a something worse than pagan Rome was just before its fall."

"Delicia" was issued, some years ago, under the title of "The Murder of Delicia." Several new stories are now added.

FIRE broke out at 1 p.m. on Sept. 8th in Takeshima-cho, Koishikawa, Tokyo. Owing to the strong southeasterly wind the flames spread at once to the adjoining houses. Forty-two houses were burned down and nine damaged.

THE betrothal has been concluded of Mr. Kishi chiro Okura (26), first son of Mr. Kihachiro Okura, and Miss Kuni (19), the fifth daughter of Count Mizoguchi, the match having been made through the agency of Marquis and Marchioness Ito. The wedding will take place on Sept. 19th.

BERON DE SENDAL, new Portuguese Minister to China and Japan, was received on Sept. 9th by the Emperor, when His Excellency presented his credentials. Subsequently he was received by the Empress in audience. The Minister will stay in Tokyo for a few months after which he will leave for Peking.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha's steamer Jinsen Maru (2,900 tons), with a timber cargo, went ashore at 4 p.m. on Sept. 6th in the neighbourhood of Soya promontory on her way from Saruwatari, Hokkaido, to Taku. She was floated by the assistance of the steamer Hikoyama Maru. The ship and cargo are safe.

THE steamer Oshima Maru (1,400 tons) went ashore at Pigeon Bay near Port Arthur and sank. She was on the way from Newchwang to Yokohama carrying bean cake. The ship was insured with the Tokyo Marine Insurance Co. for eighty thousand yen and the cargo by two or three other insurance companies for the same amount.

ON the evening of Sept. 8th an attempt at murder was reported at Yoshiwara, Tokyo. H. Nishizawa (35) an employee of the Rinsui ro, attempted to kill Y. Emura (53) the proprietor of the Kawachi-ro, his wife named Hatsu (47), a girl named Asa Iida (23) and her father, Sajiro, inflicting severe injuries on them with a sword. The culprit was arrested while trying to escape.

SEPT. 5th being the second anniversary of the mass meeting held in Tokyo in connexion with the conclusion of the Portsmouth Peace Treaty, when disturbances occurred, Mr. Kono Hiro-naka, M.P., and some leaders of the socialists promoted a meeting at 5 p.m. at Hibiya Park. It turned out a fiasco, only about thirty persons being present. Mr. Kono opened the meeting, and two or three gentlemen followed him. At 8 p.m. the meeting dispersed quietly.

KOREA.

Friday, September 6.

The Chuo Shinbun has an article on the subject of Korean finance with special relation to the assistance that the Japanese Treasury will have to extend to the Peninsular Empire. We read there that under the new regime the annual expenditures of the Residency General, which now amount to something less than one and three quarters million yen, will be reduced by one-half or one-third, and that if the policy of State monopolies be adopted in the case of salt, tobacco and sau-shu, the Japanese Treasury will very soon be relieved of all burden in connexion with Korea. In this context it may be mentioned that for the sake of developing agriculture and commerce Marquis Ito is said to contemplate the establishment of a Kwangyo Ginko in Seoul with branches in important places throughout the provinces.

We think it right to reproduce the following from the columns of the Japan Times :—

The Koreans in America have recently organised a new society called Tai-tong Po-kok Hoi (Great National Preservation Union). The following is our translation of a circular sent out by the society and now being secretly distributed in Korea. It has an apt caption "Mak Roi" or "Bursting Thunder" and reads :—

"In a great voice we declare to the world Korea is the Korea of 20,000,000 Koreans and not private property in the hands of a few villains. Nor is it an object of theft for foreigners. How, then, can we bear to see 3,000 miles of our beautiful rivers and mountains and twenty millions of our noble and enlightened race thrown away of a morning to feed ferocious tigers and savage lions, through the conspiracy of a few traitors and villains? Who would submit to the fate of falling into the hell-prison of a thousand depths and undergoing the cruel torture of eternal damnation? With swords drawn we roar at a few traitors and villains.

"Did your mothers bear you by foreigners? Do your wives bring you the children of foreigners? You, who desire the ruin of your country and court your own ruin, why do you busy yourselves day and night scheming for the ruin of your country and conclude agreements to sell it? If you are not bastards by foreigners, how dare you to breathe the Korean air and live on its soil? Where were you born? Where do you expect to die? Dare you deny that you are perpetrators of crimes against twenty million Koreans, or that you are treacherous scoundrels condemned by public justice for a hundred million years? That you have secured your offices is not by the fair choice of our twenty millions. Nor is the convention you have concluded from the public desire of 20,000,000 Koreans. It is only a mad convention and the wild view of you few villains. In these days of the twentieth century, public justice is more and more clearly recognised in all the civilised countries and public law, too, is greatly flourishing. Behold! the state is the public property of the upright people and should never be turned into an object of secret dealing for a few villains. The choice, be it of a single official or the decision, be it of a single affair, can only be null and void unless supported by the public mind and consent of the nation. This is heaven's law and man's path, always beholden and never changing. Now, we twenty million Koreans not only regard you, few villains, as mere lunatics, but have long known of your traitorous crimes. Every word, each character of the seven articles of the Japan-Korea convention so called by rumour, is but a part of the scheme of enslaved knaves bent on selling their country. What an insane convention! What an absurd idea! It is something to which none of our political parties or national organs, no class of our people, not one of the twenty million Koreans has ever lent ears. Boiling and gushing are our twenty millions. The breath of their anger fills the air and their manly blood floods the seas. You, villains, your houses we may burn down, your heads we may cut off, your flesh we may chop into twenty million slices, and let our compatriots feed on them. Yet we would not feel satisfied. Your blood we may pour into twenty million cups and let our compatriots drink of them. Yet cheerless and heavy in heart, we would not be merry. You have committed crimes against man's race of heaven and earth and have no heads to hold up. Rat-like you lurk concealed in a foreign embassy and fox-like you visit the foreigner's war camp. Even a child of three feet knows how to be ashamed of such conduct and thinks it beneath contempt to talk of such exhibition. Even little boys and girls would laugh at and regard it madness to believe the words of such lunatics and outcasts. And who of the civilized world with public spirit and eyes of justice place any reliance on the false agreements and wild absurdities? Here is a point too plain for any thinking. Suppose Japan is an absolute monarchy and a few of her traitorous subjects enter into secret and arbitrary treaty transferring all her national rights to Russia. Her political parties, other classes of people, the whole nation will never acquiesce in such an arrangement. It will merely be a mad convention by a few traitors and lunatics and not even the stupid and barbarous Russians would accept it as a legitimate treaty. Not even the cowardly Japanese would blindly submit to such an absurd arrangement. They will only mete out just retribution by chopping off these few traitors' heads. This is plain, because an act clearly not constituting the crime of a country cannot bring a calamity to it. This truth is known not to the Japanese and Koreans alone, but equally to all under the sun. Now the twenty million Koreans loudly declare to the world :— In view of the situation the Koreans do not wish to remain aimlessly on earth and join the criminals ruining their country. Vowing death we will cut our traitors' heads off and put to flames the insane villains' conventions. Let our flesh be pickled and our blood turned into a sauce; we are determined that our Korea of Koreans shall be governed by Koreans and we Koreans' children and their children's children shall obtain liberty in an independent Korea. This is the reason why we first fight for our liberty. At this hour of great national crisis what Koreans are there to think and act otherwise except they be the few villains bent on selling their country?"

"Seizing our sword we call out to our twenty million nationals who love their home and land under the disam eastern sky: 'Should you wish to escape from the netting and live anew, you shall in all haste organise a great union and follow the footsteps of those righteous and noble men who have shed their blood for their country. When you receive this (circular) let each of you rouse your patriotic zeal to its hottest and day and night engage in the dissemination of the following among our twenty millions :—

1.—Organise a nation-protecting body and build up a national movement.

2.—Shoot to death the insane villains who concluded the mad convention.

3.—Let each give his name and address and vow with death to oppose the seven articles of the national enemy's mad convention.

"The carrying out of these three measures bears vitally on the welfare of our millions for millions of years to come. By signals or telegrams report to this society their progress.

"The traitors' heads uncit Korea will become enslaved forever.

"The vile enemy's convention unrevoked, Korea will become ruined forever.

"Grand union unformed, the nation cannot be preserved.

"Righteous and patriotic blood unspilt, there will be no independence."

The circular is signed by 13 Koreans and the society's address is given at No. 1,507 Ellis Street, San Francisco, Cal. U.S.A.

The above is certainly one of the most frankly ferocious and blood-thirsty documents ever published. It openly incites to murder and assassination and it is not sparing of opprobrious epithets applied to other nations. One must suppose that the thirteen signatories know what kind of language is best calculated to appeal to the sentiments of their countrymen. On that hypothesis any sympathy one might be disposed to feel with Korea is chilled. The Koreans never showed any of this fanatic patriotism in former times though their country's independence was scarcely less mythical than it is at present, and we are forced to the conclusion that much of this violent ebullition is due to the teaching of foreign agitators. It is a curious reflection that the political advisor of men who declare themselves the disciples of such methods should be a Christian missionary.

Saturday, September 7.

The Asahi's Seoul correspondent sends rather a dispiriting account of the state of affairs in Korea. He says that it is difficult to restore good order. The military expeditions against the insurgents do not make any conclusive impression and the Koreans, abandoning their futile attempts at armed resistance, are devoting themselves to destroying the instruments of communication, as railways and telegraphs, and to slaughtering Japanese civilians wherever they can find them. From the beginning of the disturbance until the end of August the number of peaceful Japanese subjects who had been assassinated totalled 17 and in addition to this seven were missing and nine wounded. There is evidence that the Koreans are behaving like the very worst type of savages. They are torturing to death in the most shocking way any that fall into their hands alive and they are mutilating the corpses of those they kill in a manner that evinces brutal ferocity. Several thousands of Japanese are said to have been obliged to abandon their property and fly to places of refuge; trade between the capital and the provinces has been so much interrupted that not a few Japanese merchants are said to be in an embarrassed condition, while many are threatened with the loss of money lent by them to provincial borrowers; traffic on the railway is largely reduced and altogether a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs exists. What steps the Japanese will take in these circumstances the correspondent does not suggest, but it is evident from his account that the Koreans are placing themselves beyond the pale of any except drastic measures.

It is now said that Marquis Ito will return to Korea with all possible expedition. He is expected to leave Tokyo on the 24th inst., after attending on the 16th another State Council, at which his financial proposals will be finally decided.

Sunday, September 8.

The limits of the insurrection in Korea are said to be spreading and reinforcements of troops have been sent from several of the Japanese military centres in the Peninsula.

On the evening of the 6th a considerable body of insurgents attacked Ansong and compelled the Japanese residents, some 40 in number, to withdraw precipitately. There are said to have been some casualties. Ansong is to the south of Seoul in the province Hwanghaido. On the same day a body of 300 insurgents attacked the Japanese detachment at Yangju, a place about 12 miles north of Seoul. The result of the attack is not stated but two Japanese soldiers were killed.

General Hasegawa has issued a proclamation assuring law-abiding folk of full protection; declaring that the insurgents shall be extirpated in the interests of the Throne and of the people; saying that full pardon will be accorded to any who, having been induced once to join the insurgents, subsequently dissociates himself from them, and promising that ample rewards will be given to all who inform against rioters.

The Mainichi Dempo's Seoul correspondent wires that a different system of distribution is henceforth to be adopted by the military authorities in Korea. Hitherto the main strength has been concentrated in the north, but hereafter this will be reversed: the south will be the principal field of operations, and, instead of massing troops in a few places, small detachments will be scattered about in many localities. Special care will be devoted to guarding the instruments of communication.

It is understood to have been in contemplation for a long time in Japan that a frontier military station should be established in Chientao. So at least say Tokyo newspapers, and from our study of topographical features during the Russo-Japanese war we can easily appreciate the object of such an arrangement. Of course there never was any idea on Japan's side of encroaching upon the territory which has hitherto been regarded as China's portion of Chientao, nor was there originally, it is said, any idea on the part of the Residency-General of raising the question of the region's ownership. So far as the despatch of the gendarmes was concerned, the intention was merely to provide protection for Korean subjects, but since China insists upon opening the radical question, Japan will of course suspend all action that is not essential, pending a settlement of the dispute.

Monday, September 9.

The news from Korea this morning continues to be of the old character; namely, outrages or preparations for outrage on the part of the insurgents and drastic action on the part of the Japanese troops. The greater part of the north of Kyongsan-do seems to be in a very disturbed condition, and it is thought probable that limitations will have to be imposed on the issue of passports to foreigners who desire to travel in the interior. Of course there can be no doubt that order will be eventually restored, but in the meanwhile the financial effects of the disturbance may be serious.

Tuesday, September 10.

From Korea comes the same weary record of outbreaks directed against the persons and properties of Japanese civilians. The impression produced upon anyone who follows these events closely is that the limits of the insurrection are spreading and that a great deal of trouble must be incurred before peace and good order are restored. We observe that certain critics condemn the Japanese troops for resorting to drastic methods and take the ground that such procedure must tend to permanently estrange the Koreans. This is an easy verdict. Human folk, even supposing them to be impartial, must be more or less revolted when they read of the burning of villages and other steps of such a nature as necessarily to involve the innocent as well as the guilty. We do not observe, however, that those critics find anything to condemn in the savage tortures and the assassinations resorted to by Koreans against unarmed Japanese men and women, nor do we find that the burning of a Japanese civilian's residence by Korean rioters provokes any expression of condemnation. Undoubtedly the situation is very unhappy. The Koreans know of only one way of asserting themselves. It is a brutal way but unintelligible if we assume that the deliberate motive is to render the country too hot for Japanese trade or residence. Great suffering will be entailed by that fruitless attempt and there can be only one ending. In the meanwhile much that is shocking will certainly be heard of.

Mr. Arai Kentaro, now Chief of the Accounts Bureau in the Finance Department of Japan, has been nominated Vice-Minister of Finance in Korea. There has been an interesting question connected with this appointment. Mr. Megata, as everybody knows, became Financial Advisor to the Korean Government at the time of the organisation of the Residency-General, and in that capacity he has done splendid work. He went to Korea with the reputation of being one of Japan's ablest financiers, and he has amply vindicated the justice of that estimate by his Korean record. In fact it is not too much to say that after the Resident-General himself, Mr. Megata has done more for Korea than any man living. When the recent Convention was signed, one of its provisions was the system of Japanese advisors to the Korean Government should be abolished, their places being taken by duly appointed Japanese officials. The handing of the portfolio of Finance to Mr. Megata seemed to be one of the natural consequences of that provision, but, on the other hand, Marquis Ito had determined that the portfolios of State should all remain in Korean hands. What then was to be done with Mr. Megata? The position of Vice-Minister would evidently have been unworthy of his acceptance, and the Resident-General shrank from offering it to him. The expectation now is that when a central bank is established in Korea, which step can not be long delayed, Mr. Megata will be appointed president of the bank, remaining unattached meanwhile.

Wednesday, September 11.

Fiscal reforms of a drastic nature are spoken of as having commenced in Korea. We gather that the system of special taxes to provide revenue for the Imperial Household is to be wholly abandoned, and that the privy purse will henceforth depend entirely on whatever portion of the State revenue is allotted for the purpose of plenshing it. There are said to be over forty of these taxes, many of them being of a special nature and some being merely duplicates of the public taxes. All, without distinction, are now to be handed over to the Treasury.

The telegraph continues to convey the same wearisome details of bands of insurgents routed by detachments of Japanese soldiers, and of peaceful Japanese subjects assaulted or murdered by Korean mobs. It is to be hoped that this unhappy situation will not last much longer.

It has been decided to open to foreign trade the Bay of Changjin, which lies on the northeast coast of Korea some eight miles north of Kyongsong. The new port is not marked upon any map in our possession, but its position is sufficiently indicated by the above description. It is the nearest port to Chientao, and it will probably prove an important place when the resources of the latter come to be developed.

The Fiji Shimpō has a leading article strongly advocating that the privilege of owning real estate should be extended to foreigners in Korea. The development of agriculture is one of Korea's pressing fiscal needs, and her own people seem to be without either capital or energy to carry out this enterprise on a vigorous scale. Many Japanese subjects have become land-holders, but as the right of ownership is not legally recognised their tenure is necessarily precarious. The Fiji does not suggest that there should be any discrimination in favour of Japanese. On the contrary it is careful to insist that if the privilege be granted to any it must be granted to all alike. There is of course a familiar old difficulty that if foreigners were allowed to own land and settle in the interior of Korea, their extraterritorial immunities would greatly complicate the situation. To meet this difficulty our contemporary suggests that consular jurisdiction should be abolished so soon as the new legal tribunals are duly organised.

Thursday, September 12.

It is said that the Japanese authorities consider it necessary to adopt a more drastic policy in dealing with the Korean insurgents. Hitherto, as a rule, no attempt has been made to push attacks to an extreme point:

the troops have adopted the attitude of policemen; that is to say, they have limited themselves to dispersing any bodies of insurgents which appear to have an organised shape. Moreover they have not attempted to punish people who harboured or concealed insurgents. It is in fact one of the great difficulties of the situation that immediately on the approach of a Japanese force, the insurgents doff everything which distinguishes them from ordinary citizens and thus escape the consequences of their excesses. The upshot is that the various Japanese detachments find themselves engaged in fruitless marches hither and thither, and the insurrectionary spirit develops rather than diminishes. For these reasons General Hasegawa issued his recent proclamation. Its main feature is to hold all classes of the people responsible for any assistance rendered to insurgents. Thus if rioters be found concealed in a village, the crime of harbouring them will be charged against the entire village and the punishment will be equally comprehensive. By adopting these tactics it is hoped that the respecting and law-abiding sections of the populace will recognise the necessity of clearly differentiating themselves from the insurgents, and that the final quelling of the trouble will follow rapidly.

The 5th of October will witness the first use of a railway train by a Korean Sovereign. When the line from Seoul to Chemulpo was opened the Emperor was invited to ride in the train, but nothing would induce him to take such a step. The new occupant of the Throne, however, is less conservative. He has signified his intention of going to worship at the tombs of his ancestors on the 5th of October at Suwon, whither he will travel by train, and he has also promised to visit the Exhibition in Seoul at a date which is not yet fixed.

MARQUIS ITO AND COUNT OKUMA.

Various and sundry rumours have been put upon wheels by the recent interchange of calls between Marquis Ito and Count Okuma and by the meeting of the two statesmen at the Dojin-kai's entertainment on the evening of the 4th inst. It is stated for example that Marquis Ito invited the Elder Statesmen to a banquet at his residence on the 2nd instant, which event seems to be altogether apocryphal, and that the "Waseda Sage," has consented to proceed to China as Japan's representative. A member of the Asahi Shimbun's staff waited upon Count Okuma to ascertain the truth of these rumours and is said to have found the Count much amused at such exaggerated reports. He explained, what everybody knows already, that he and Marquis Ito had been colleagues and co-operators for many years and that, if their views had occasionally clashed in the fields of politics and administration, Marquis Ito was not one of those men who nourish a grudge in perpetuity, but has on the contrary a heart sufficiently large to forgive and to forget. He had therefore been kind enough to call at Waseda on his return from Korea and the Count had returned the call. That was all that need be said. The two had renewed their ancient friendship. As to the idea of his proceeding to China in the capacity of envoy or representative, the Count indulged in such a tirade against the conduct of Japan's foreign affairs from the negotiation of the Portsmouth Treaty to the present day that he evidently cannot be credited with any intention of working in union with the Saionji Cabinet.

CHINA.

Friday, September 6.

The Emperor of China is said to be seriously ill. Reports of this nature have been constantly spread, and it will be remembered that a few years ago the Empress Dowager was blandly accused by a foreign local journalist of having poisoned his Majesty, a rumour which did not cease to circulate until the evidence of a foreign physician had been published.

There are naturally various rumours about the removal of Viceroy Chang and Yuan from their important satrapies. The most explicit story is that the Empress Dowager believes and has stated that these two statesmen are incomparably the strongest politicians now to be found in China, and that the Central Government has urgent need of their assistance in carrying out its programme of reform. Viceroy Yuan is said to have declined the new appointment at first, but the Empress Dowager would not admit his objections. As for his nomination to the position of Minister of Foreign Affairs, the idea is that the Empress Dowager has been considerably alarmed by the various ententes recently formed and also that she views the relations between her country and Japan with uneasiness. In these circumstances the only man competent to deal with the situation is thought to be Yuan.

The tongue of conjecture is busy with reference to the real motive of the above changes and to the successors of the two Viceroys. The general impression seems to be that Tuan Fang and Tieh Liang will succeed to the vacant viceroys, but as to which will get the Metropolitan Province and which the Yangtze post, there is a difference of opinion. It need hardly be said that one rumour regards the changes as part of a scheme to weaken the system of local autonomy and strengthen the Central Government. The Mainichi Denpo's correspondent does not speak of Tuan as a likely candidate for either of the great viceroys. It indicates Tsen Chun-hsuan and Tieh Liang. If this forecast be correct, it has special interest, for Tieh Liang is said to be the pivot of Manchu power in China and Tsen is strongly allied with him. Therefore the accession of these two men to the vacant viceroys would mean an enormous extension of Manchu influence.

Some Japanese papers regard these changes with uneasiness inasmuch as they consider that Tieh Liang is anti-Japanese and pro-German.

Saturday, September 7.

According to a telegram to the Kokumin Shinbun, the new Chinese Central Government will be composed as follows:—

GRAND COUNCIL.

Prince Ching	President	Manchu.
Tieh Liang	Member	do
Na Tung	do	do
Shih Hsu	do	do
Lu Tienlin	do	Chinese.
Sun Chanai	do	do
Chang Chih-tung	do	do
Yuan Shih-kai	do	do

MINISTERS OF STATE.

Finance	Prince Li	Manchu.
Home Affairs	Prince Su	do
Army	Tieh Liang	do
Agriculture and Commerce	Pu Ting	do
Education	Jung Ching	do
Foreign Affairs	Yuan Shih-kai	Chinese.
Communications	Chen Pi	do
Board of Rites	Lu Junhsiang	do

With regard to the Viceroys, the following list is given:—

Viceroyalty.	Name.	Nationality.
Unkwai	Shih Liang	Manchu.
Liangkiang	Tuan Fang	do.
Sienkau	Sheng Yun	do.
Aliehe	Sung Shou	do.
Chihli	Yang Shihhsing	Chinese.
Hukwang	Chao Erhsun	do.
Liangkwang	Chang Jenchuen	do.
Szechuan	Chen Kueiling	do.
Manchuria	Hsu Shihchang	do.

It is said that Viceroy Chang Chih-tung talks of not proceeding to Peking for two months, and that the Throne has urged him to use more expedition, but it is not probable that the great satrap will consent to be hurried.

It is evident that the preparations for these changes must have been for a considerable time on the tapis. The proofs of that are that Viceroy Yuan has succeeded in getting his own protégé, Yang, to be appointed as his successor in the Metropolitan Province, and Viceroy Chang has done the same in Hukwang by his disciple Chao, formerly Governor of Mukden: and, further, that this same Chao must have been contemplating these changes when he declined to proceed to his Viceroyalty in Szechuan. The great question is whether Yuan and Chang will be able to work together. The former is for moderate progress; the latter for radical. There has never been any symptom of weakness or sacrifice of opinion on the part of Chang, and it can scarcely be doubted that the conservative elements in Peking will do everything in their power to set him up as their representative and champion. Tieh Liang also is an element of potential disturbance. He has long been recognised as the pivot of Manchu influence, and it is difficult to regard him as a placable member of any ministry including Yuan. The brightest spot in the whole programme is the transfer of the portfolio of Foreign Affairs to ex-Viceroy Yuan. Only quite recently this eminent official memorialized the Throne in the sense that China's relations with foreign Powers required to be handled in the most astute manner and that it would only injure to her own disadvantage if she allowed herself to be swayed by the giddy policy of "rights recovery." There are already outstanding between China and Japan a number of problems which the former shows no disposition to settle, and since these problems may be regarded as the inevitable outgrowth of the closer contact which has been established between the two Empires in the sequel of the recent war, China's indifferent or obdurate attitude towards such problems is disquieting. Ex-Viceroy Yuan thus takes charge of the Foreign Office at what may be called a critical period of his country's career. Speaking broadly, this big reconstruction of the Peking Government may be regarded as a heroic effort to centralize the administrative power. The Throne, instead of attempting to extend its arm to distant provinces, has brought under its own shadow the two men who have hitherto shown themselves most capable of establishing local autonomy. We observe that the Japanese press is tolerably unanimous in welcoming the above changes from this country's point of view. The outlook is that Viceroy Hsu of Mukden will no longer be hampered by Peking conservatism and will be able to give effect to his own liberal and conciliatory policy.

Sunday, September 8.

Japanese newspapers comment on the fact that the newly formed Cabinet in Peking may be said to consist of three persons, namely Prince Ching and the two ex-Viceroys Yuan and Chang. As to the relations between the Central Government and the Provinces, it is to be noted that the new Viceroys of Pehchili and Manchuria are adherents of Yuan Shih-kai and that the new Viceroys of the Two Kwang and of Kiangsu are practically nominees of Chang Chih-tung. As for Chang's own successor in the Hukwan Viceroyalty, namely Chao, he is credited with having been mainly instrumental in bringing about the entente which led to the organisation of the new Central Government. The other principal satraps are all well affected towards Prince Ching, and it would therefore seem a fair hypothesis not only that the administration in Peking will be exceptionally powerful and united, but also that its relations with the provinces will be friendly and smooth.

Several causes are said to have contributed to the reduction of the number of Chinese students in Japan. No accurate statistics are forthcoming, but apparently there are not more than five or six thousand of these students now in Tokyo, whereas at one time there were as many as twelve or thirteen thousand. It would seem that the principal reason for this falling off is that the system of "rapid finishing" (sokusei) has been abandoned. Under this system students were put through a course of a year and a half or two years, necessarily a superficial course, and then received a diploma which entitled them if not to an immediate appointment in China, then at any rate to the right of competing in examinations for office. Evidently this method was very convenient for men who had to leave their wives and families in China and who therefore desired to complete their studies in the shortest possible time. But naturally such students could not expect to compete successfully with youths who had gone through a thorough course in western countries, and this inability, which the public was not in a position to analyse carefully, brought Japanese education into discredit. Second, perhaps, in the list of causes is to be put the suspicion—greatly accentuated by the Anhui assassination—that lads educated in Japan imbibe revolutionary notions and become enemies of the present dynasty in China. Want of money is also spoken of as a contributory factor, for now that the sokusei system has been given up, each student must make provision for remaining a greater number of years in Japan. At all events the number of students has diminished greatly and promises to diminish more, nor are we by any means certain that this diminution is to be regretted from Japan's point of view.

Monday, September 9.

Rumour is very busy with recent events in Peking. Some Japanese publicists think that it will be impossible to carry out the new regime. They say that already a strong undercurrent of resistance to ex-Viceroy Yuan has been developed, and that Yuan himself, conscious of the force of this movement, is seeking to have his appointment to the Council of State rescinded. These observers further allege that Chang Chih-tung has announced his unwillingness to remain for any length of time in the capital. On the other hand, there is news that Chang left Wuchang on the 8th inst. for Hankow, whence he will proceed by train to Peking. It will be remembered that he was supposed to have announced his intention of not proceeding to Peking for two months longer, and we can thus see that rumour as usual is very untrustworthy in these matters.

The gist of a lengthy statement made to the Asahi Shinbun by an anonymous diplomat is that the supreme hour to test Viceroy Yuan's capacity has come. This diplomat is described as having spent many years in China and as being a man of very high reputation. What he says is certainly consistent with appearances. Yuan may be considered to have burned his ships. Last year he made a great effort to centralize the Government and thus prepare the way for a constitutional system. But he wrongly estimated the materials with which he had to deal. He imagined that example alone was necessary to induce the local satraps to surrender the powers of the purse and of the sword into Peking's hands, whereas the result of his essay was merely that he found himself deprived of a large part of those powers by his own act, his fellow viceroys remaining undisturbed on their old provincial thrones. Evidently then Yuan felt that no route was practicable except that of organising a new Council of State which should not only be pledged to carry out his programme but should also include the greatest figures on the stage of administration, whether provincial or central. He has succeeded in the preliminary stage, and the success is signal enough to obliterate many of the traces of his previous failure, but the question is, are there any materials available for the reforms that Yuan contemplates—reforms which amount to little less than a revolution? The Asahi's informant seems doubtful of this point. He recalls the fact that the great doings in Japan on the eve of the Meiji movement received their sanction from the Throne and derived immense strength from their association with the Sovereign. May such a factor be expected to solve the situation in China? The question must remain unanswered for the present, but what is at all events plain is that we are witnessing a most interesting crisis in the history of the Middle Kingdom.

The Nippon publishes a kind of résumé of events which appears to us to be a collection of the tag-rag and bob tail of the rumours published during the past few months. The comet and German diplomacy figure in this analysis as the most potential factors which have influenced China's mood.

Tuesday, September 10.

Japanese newspapers state that Chang Chih-tung has received an assurance that if he obeys the Imperial summons to become a member of the Council of State in Peking, and if the new administration proves to be unworkable on account of lack of harmony, then he shall be allowed to resume his old position as Viceroy of Hukwang. This message is said to have been sent to him in order to hasten his visit to the capital. If this be correct it may perhaps be taken as accounting for the fact that whereas Chang was at one time reported to be determined not to proceed to Peking for two months, he actually left Wuchang on the 7th inst. and was expected to reach Peking on the 9th.

Wednesday, September 11.

Official business seems to be almost at a stand-still in the Chinese capital. At the instance of ex-Viceroy Yuan daily meetings are held by the State Council to discuss reforms of the administration and sweeping changes in the personnel of the Government. This has naturally thrown the administrative machine out of gear, especially in the case of the Foreign Office where all diplomatic problems are virtually shelved for the moment. The Jiji Shimpō's correspondent, from whose telegrams we take this information, says that when the Japanese Representative asks the Waiwupu why Imperial sanction is not given to the agreements already concluded in Mukden, the answer is that no intelligence has been received from the latter city. On the other hand, when Viceroy Hsu is approached in Mukden, he declares that he is waiting for instructions from Peking. Thus both sides succeed in shirking responsibility. As to the grain-veto problem, the Chief Commissioner of Customs avows himself to be entirely in accord with the Foreign Office, but the Foreign Office refrains from making any announcement to the Japanese Legation. His Excellency Yuan is to meet the Foreign Representatives at the Waiwupu on the 13th inst. but it is expected that some time will elapse thereafter before he actively assumes his new functions at the Foreign Office.

There is another telegram about Viceroy Chang's movements. He is now said to have left Hankow for Peking on the morning of the 10th inst. Possibly this may be contradicted by the next news.

It is stated that China has decided, at the suggestion of his Excellency Yuan, to send another commission to foreign countries for the purpose of studying constitutional institutions. Some publicists suggest that there is a good deal of political manipulation in the matter, and that among the men nominated as commissioners there are several whom it is thought desirable to keep at a respectful distance.

Press laws have just been enacted in China. They seem to contain the usual provisions as to what must not be published, but they invest the administration with powers of suppressing, suspension and punishment, and they provide no legal appeal against a decision of the Home Office in such matters. The publication of this law is said to have evoked much discontent.

The Kokumin Shinbun has a significant article embodying the alleged views of a prominent diplomat. China's foreign policy is very severely criticised. She is charged with a conspicuous lack of sincerity in her dealings with other Powers. Instead of recognising that her territorial integrity is preserved by foreign suzerainty, not by her own prowess, she has adopted for motive the recovery of rights, many of which are not rights at all and the obstinate assertion of which must soon wear out the patience of other Powers. This is conspicuous in her treatment of Japan. Totally blind to the fact that Manchuria was preserved to her by Japan's intervention, she has apparently made up her mind to regard every Japanese demand as necessarily unjust, and, even in the case of matters clearly provided for by treaty, she declines reasonable discussion and acts as though she laboured under a sense of wrong and even outrage. Not one of the pressing problems that have been on the tapis in Mukden during the past year has been settled or seems likely to be settled, and Peking's extraordinary attitude towards the Chientao question is the latest example of this impossible mood. The diplomat to whom these views are attributed describes China's policy as suicidal. Every close observer of events must have formed this opinion long ago: it has indeed been frequently advanced in these columns. China can not afford to treat Japan as a negligible quantity still less as an enemy. In fact no necessity is so pressing for the Middle Kingdom as that of cultivating Japan's friendship, for in existing circumstances the Middle Kingdom lies practically at the mercy of its strong neighbour, and no foreign hand will be stretched out to interfere between China's unreason and Japan's just resentment. The only hope is that his Excellency Yuan Shih-kai will radically change this evil policy when he takes vigorously into his hands the reins of the Foreign Office.

The former Tairo Dashi-kai, a society whose title is hard to translate, since it means neither pro-Russian nor anti-Russian, has now formed itself into what is called the Chohakuzan-kai. The original Tairo Dashi-kai ceased some time ago to exist as an organised body, its raison d'être having disappeared. But it possesses among its archives a mass of valuable topographical information, and among its members a number of persons who have had much experience in collecting such information. Our readers know that Champai-shan is the name of the mountain in north-western Korea where the principal Chientao boundary stone stands. This name becomes "Chohakuzan" according to Japanese pronunciation, and has been taken as the designation of the new society. In other words, the organisation aims at collecting such data as may be useful for the solution of the Chientao question.

There is again news of disturbances in the south of China. The town of Fangchang is said to have been taken without offering any resistance and conflagrations are reported as having broken out. Troops have been sent from Canton to the scene.

Thursday, September 12.

A telegram from Peking states that China has entered a formal protest against being excluded from the ranks of the great Powers in connexion with the Hague Tribunal. No Chinese representative appears among the names of the standing committees, and naturally Peking feels much hurt at the omission.

There is talk of ex-Viceroy Yuan going to preside over the War Office and being replaced at the Foreign Office by his protégé, Tang Shaoi who is now Governor of Mukden. The present Minister of War is Tieh Liang, a reputed enemy of Yuan, and thus if this change were made, Yuan's position would be appreciably strengthened.

The news is confirmed that Viceroy Chang left Hankow for Peking on the 10th inst.

It is understood that the Waiwupu has, in response to the request of the British Minister, instructed the provincial governments of Kiangsu, Kiangsi, Hupeh and Szechuan to delay starting official bureaux for the sale of prepared opium, pending negotiations with the British Government.

It is reported from Peking, says the N.-C. Daily News, that both the Japanese and Russian Ministers in Peking have approached the Waiwupu about the proposed advent of Japanese and Russian priests into China with the view of gaining converts to their respective faiths.

The German Detachment at Shanhaikuan has been entirely withdrawn and Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai has deputed Taotai Li Tin-lsin, of the Peking Military Secretariat, to take over the place vacated.

A Peking dispatch states that there is every prospect of Prince Pu Lun being chosen Heir-Apparent, upon the arrival of Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai and Chang Chih-tung in Peking.

Mr. Albert E. Prebble, an old resident of Shanghai, died at the General Hospital of that port on Aug. 30th, after a brief illness. Mr. Prebble was for many years connected with Messrs. Hall & Holtz, Weeks & Co., Lane Crawford & Co. and subsequently founded the Broadway Drapery. More recently still he has done business as a broker and commission agent.

One of the difficulties of Chinese law was exemplified in a case which came before the Mixed Court at Shanghai on Aug. 30th. The British American Tobacco Co., desired to proceed against the owner of the San Sing Cigarette Manufactory on a charge of infringement of trade marks. A summons could not be issued as H. E. Sheng Kun pao is the proprietor and he, of course, is a mandarin of higher rank than the magistrate. A summons was, therefore, issued against the hong and an accountant put in an appearance and secured the services of Mr. Morgan Phillips for the defence. The complainants, thereupon, asked for a remand in order to secure legal representation. The Court granted the request. The charge is in connexion with several well known brands of the complainant's cigarettes.

The off-season, says the China Mail, is the bloom-time of the fish-story teller and the snake-yarner. A man in the hospital bears evidence of the truth of one fish story, however, and a bottled cobra at Mr. E. J. Hughes' office does likewise on behalf of the snake specialist. The couple of feet of cobra alluded to was killed at Mr. Hughes' residence at the Peak the other day—and it is not the first. Others have been laid low in the vicinity, and climbers of the Peak sides—if there are any—should keep their eyes open for reptiles.

Viceroy Chang Chih-tung is reported to have peremptorily stopped a project of members of the Hupoh foreign-modelled Army and representatives of Education in that province for putting up a bronze statue of His Excellency in some conspicuous place in Wuchang.

The Peking Ministry of Civil Appointments have, with the Imperial sanction, deprived of his present rank and titles Viceroy Ting Chen to, formerly of the Yan Kwei provinces, who was denounced the other day by his successor Viceroy Hsi Liang for having so neglected the welfare of the viceroyalty during his incumbency that it was in a state of collapse and chaos.

Viceroy Chang Chih-tung is reported to have written to the Waiwupu protesting against the "interference" of Sir John Jordan in relation to the proposed Government monopoly for the sale of prepared opium, and urging that the Central Government "stand firm" on its rights and start the scheme without reference to outside opposition.

The German Minister in Peking is stated to be opposing a project among Chinese merchants to construct a railway between Chefoo and Weihien, Shantung.

What is believed to be the first steam turbine in China used for the generation of electricity was started on Sept. 2, at the Shanghai Municipal Electricity Work on a trial. The turbine runs at a speed of 1,500 revolutions per minute and develops 1,350 horse power. It was built by Messrs. Parsons & Co. of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

A notification from the Peking Government has been sent to the various Viceroys and Governors throughout the Empire intimating that the Chinshu Kuanpao, or Government Gazette, which is intended to succeed the suspended Peking Gazette is to be financed by all the provincial Governments.

The representatives of thirty two Guilds, members of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and the Chinese Press Association, etc., met at Chao Garden, Range Road, Shanghai, on Aug. 31 in response to a circular issued by Tao-tai Y. C. Tong. It was unanimously decided to extend an invitation to Mr. Taft, upon his arrival in October next, to attend two functions as the guest of the organizations mentioned above. The first function will be the formal opening of the new building of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. in Szechuen Road, and the second is to be a garden party at the International Institute.

Mr. Samuel H. Shorrocks, machinery importer and consulting engineer, of Shanghai, and one of its most popular residents, died on Aug. 31st of acute dysentery. Mrs. Helen Turner, who had been three years in the employment of Messrs. Weeks & Co., Ltd., was taken ill with cholera the same evening and died the following morning.

The British Syndicate which has agreed to lend the funds for the construction of the proposed Tientsin Chinkiang Railway is reported to have notified the Chinese authorities that the Railway Company will be expected to make an annual repayment of four million taels on account of interest and instalment on the loan.

In support of the old Chinese maps extant which make Chientao, or Middle Island, in the Tumen River, Kirin province, to be in Chinese territory, the N. C. Daily News understands that Mr. Ma Ting-liang, the Chinese Consul-General at Seoul, has sent an officer of his Consulate, Mr. Liu Sze-t'ung, to Mukden with copies of a number of Korean maps, all of which make Chientao a possession of China.

Tieh Liang, the reactionary Manchurian Minister of the War Department in Peking, has been denounced by H. E. Ch'en K'uei-lung, the enlightened Governor of Kiangsu, on the ground that when Tieh Liang was in the central provinces a few years ago, he drew out all the reserves in the provincial treasuries for the use of the Central Government. The result has been that there has been no money to carry out the reforms ordered by the Throne. He is also charged with creating barriers between Chinese and Manchus.

A Censor named Chiang has sent in a memorial impeaching Viceroy Chang Chih-tung for having without reference to the Waiwupu made an agreement with the Japanese Consul-General at Hankow for the extension of the Japanese Concession at that Treaty Port. As a certain part of the agreement concerns the sovereign rights of China the memorialist requests that it be cancelled, lest other Powers regard it as a precedent for their future dealings with China. A copy of the memorial has been sent to H. E. Chang for his perusal and answer.

We learn on trustworthy authority, said the N. C. Daily News of Sept. 3rd, that there is strong probability that Sir Robert Hart, G.C.M.G., the Inspector-General of Customs in China, will be seen in Shanghai early in October, passing through on his way to make a long deferred visit to Europe. During his recent stay at Peitaiho which he cut short to return to Peking at the close of August, Sir Robert Hart was under doctor's orders which cuttailed his movements considerably. In fact his health for some time has been such as to make a complete change and rest desirable. Sir Robert Hart entered the Consular Service in China in 1854, and has been Inspector-General of Customs since 1863. A visit to Europe has been talked of for many years; but the great responsibilities of his post have hitherto proved too strong for him to put it into execution. There is no one in China but will wish him a speedy return to sound health, and, if it may be so, to the Far East.

A Chinese correspondent in the China Times of Tientsin gives a shocking description of a veritable plague spot in the French Concession, and adjoining the Japanese Concession, where, as he points out, the Tientsin cholera outbreak has been most marked. Spurred to action by the epidemic the French authorities have cleared away great heaps of filthy rubbish on certain vacant ground in their Concession where coolies gather daily to take their meals, but the surrounding hovels and poor tenements are liable still to harbour infection, their roofs and walls reeking with filth. Unless these premises are destroyed, he adds, further sickness will take place. He says that people living in the British, German and French Concessions take little notice of this central plague-spot because they seldom enter this district, but they should not forget that nearly all their Chinese employees pass that way.

THE NEW ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

The new Orders in Council on the subject of British consular jurisdiction, reference to which was made in our last issue, are shown by later telegrams to have exceptional interest. They deal in the first place with the subject of protection of trade-marks, patents and copyright, concerning which they provide that the British consular courts in China and Korea shall be open to foreign suitors in so far as the latter belong to nations which extend similar treatment to British subjects conventionally, or, failing that, in so far as they agree to submit to British jurisdiction for the purposes of the suit. It is not in this, however, that interest of the Orders consists. It is in the fact that they contain exceptional provisions for the control of newspapers published in China or Korea by British subjects. It is laid down that if the contents of such journals are of a nature to imperil the peaceful relations between the country of their publication and any foreign Power, the consular court shall have competence to suspend the newspapers, confiscate their property, and deport their editors and proprietors. It is scarcely to be doubted that the motive for this legislation must be sought in Seoul where for a considerable time one of the most mischief-making journals ever published has been striving to create international trouble. No thoughtful person can have any sympathy with the theory that editors and proprietors of newspapers should be exempt from control which is considered essential in the case of all other persons. The law of libel is all very well in its way, but its influence does not extend to the realm of politics, and it is there that newspapers can do most mischief. The new Order in Council, if we may judge from translations of it telegraphed to Tokyo journals, is very explicit and comprehensive. It covers not only writings calculated to disturb peace and good order, but also those calculated to impair the good relations existing between the country where publication takes place and any nation with which Great Britain is on terms of friendship.

DEATH OF MR. H. C. LITCHFIELD.

It is with great regret that we chronicle the death on September 11th of Mr. Henry Charles Litchfield, who for so many years has occupied a prominent position in the life of the foreign community of Yokohama. Mr. Litchfield was taken ill with an attack of cerebral apoplexy last Saturday and though everything possible was done to relieve him, he gradually sank. He had long been a resident of Yokohama, arriving here in the early seventies, and followed with great success the profession of the law. When Mr. Montague Kirkwood relinquished the position some twenty years ago, Mr. Litchfield was appointed Crown Prosecutor in the British Court for Japan, in which capacity he took part in many law suits which had more than a local reputation. A shrewd cross-examiner, and successful pleader he won the respect of all with whom he came in contact for his probity and chivalric courtesy to all frequenters of the Court. After the abolition of the British Court, consequent upon the coming into operation of the new treaties, Mr. Litchfield still followed his profession here, his work being confined to chambers, where his sound judgment and firm grasp of commercial law were seen to the greatest advantage. In his early years Mr. Litchfield was a great oarsman and took a prominent part in the sports of the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club, of which he was, for many years President, and to the end of life he took a deep interest in the affairs of the Club. He also filled most acceptably, some year or so ago, the position of President of the Y. U. C. To his sorrowing widow we respectfully offer our sincere condolences in this the hour of her great bereavement.

THE WEATHER.

Sunday, September 8.

The centre of depression which began to move from Riukiu towards Japan on the 5th inst., struck Kyushu on the afternoon of the 6th and developed great force throughout the 7th. It seems to have swept over the whole of Kyushu, and involved Shikoku also, but the latest reports suggest that it will affect the western sections of the Empire only, leaving the eastern unscathed. Telegraphic communication has not been actually stopped, but it is more or less impeded, and accurate information as to the damage suffered by the rice crop is therefore not forthcoming. There will certainly be some damage, however, for the regions attacked by this storm are precisely the principal rice-producing centres.

Speaking of rice, we notice in all the Japanese newspapers a paragraph saying that the Department of Agriculture and Commerce has undertaken an investigation into the causes of the appreciation of the cereal. If it be found that human agency is responsible, corrective measures will be unhesitatingly adopted.

We may mention here that, according to investigations made by the Bank of Japan, the average prices of commodities in Tokyo during the month of August showed an increase of 1.34 per cent. as compared with the preceding month. Out of seventy-nine articles on the Bank's list, 56 showed appreciation, 15 were stationary and 8 declined in price. There can be no doubt that this was largely due to the floods which destroyed great quantities of vegetables and fruit cultivated in the neighbourhood of the capital. But something is also to be attributed to a reaction from the low prices ruling in June last.

Monday, September 9.

The Riukiu storm raged over Kyushu and Shikoku throughout the 7th and the 8th inst., but with gradually decreasing violence, and finally emerged into the Sea of Japan. It did not affect the eastern side of the country further than to produce a strong southerly wind with occasional dashes of rain. Another centre of depression developed in the neighbourhood of Sado on the 8th inst. and, travelling in a north-easterly direction, has probably swept over Hokkaido. There are as yet no telegrams giving any accurate information as to the damage done to the rice crop. But in various places the heavy rain produced floods which carried away bridges and burst through embankments. These are perennial incidents in Japan which recall her semi-tropical affinities. Judging, however, from the fact that no fresh interruptions of railway traffic appear to have resulted from this storm, we infer that the effects were not of a drastic character.

On the evening of the 7th inst. a whirlwind struck the village of Ogo in Gumma Prefecture and tore the roofs off several houses, injuring six or seven people. A similar phenomenon is reported from the neighbouring prefecture, Fukushima, on the same day.

Tuesday, September 10.

The Riukiu centre of depression, which swept over Kyushu and Shikoku, emerged at the Bantan Straits into the Sea of Japan on the afternoon of the 8th inst. and thence pursued its northward course, with, however, rapidly diminishing intensity. There are symptoms of another centre of depression near the Mariana group south of the Bonin Islands, but no certain indications have yet been obtained. Elsewhere everything is quiet so that the 220th day (the 12th inst.) is expected to pass off peacefully.

We have as yet no particulars as to the damage done to the rice crop by this last gale, but in such a case it is perhaps fair to assume that no news is good news. According to the Shogyo Shimpo, the best authorities—three of whom are quoted by name—agree in saying that after full allowance has been made for the damage wrought in Kwanto by the inundations and in the south and west by the last storm, the crop will be fully 47 or 48 million koku. The average crop being 40 millions, the above estimate means an increase of some 20 per cent. What that signifies to Japanese agriculturists becomes plain when we observe that the value of 8 million koku of rice is from 130 to 140 millions of yen.

THE NEW RUSSO-JAPANESE COMMERCIAL TREATY.

Japanese journals publish what professes to be a semi-official statement of the differences between the new Russo-Japanese Treaty and the old one. The first is that the new treaty grants to the subjects of the High Contracting Parties the right of burying or cremating their dead in places duly assigned for the purpose. This provision is said to have been dictated by the fact that Japanese residing in Russia's dominions have not hitherto been allowed to cremate their dead and have been put to considerable inconvenience accordingly. The second difference is that the subjects of each of the Powers are placed on the most-favoured-nation footing with regard to agriculture and the ownership of fixed property. This provision may sound rather impracticable seeing that, in a general sense, the ownership of real estate by agents is not permitted either in Russia or Japan. But it appears that in certain parts of Siberia, Russia, with the view of attracting settlers and developing the country, does grant that privilege and it will now be extended to Japanese subjects. The third difference is that freedom of manufacture is now guaranteed to the subjects of each of the contracting parties within the dominions of the other, whereas by the former treaty freedom of commerce alone was granted. The next point is that the two Powers have pledged themselves to conclude a convention for the mutual recognition of laws relating to shipping. The fifth difference is that most-favoured-nation treatment is extended to the consuls of each state and their functions in the territories of the other. The sixth difference is interesting. It is a provision which practically subjects to Russian jurisdiction all newspapers or books published in the Russian language by Russian subjects within Japan, the Japanese authorities having similar jurisdiction within Russia's dominions. This provision seems wise, if the censorship of literature in any form be considered necessary. It is unreasonable to hold that the dominions of any Power should be made a place for publishing matter inimical to the interests of a friendly State. The seventh difference is that whatever protection the laws of either of the contracting parties provide for trade marks, designs, and patents shall be extended to the subjects of the other provided that all the forms prescribed by those laws are satisfied. All the above may be regarded as additions to the old treaty. There are also some excisions. For example, the provision relating to perpetual leases within the limits of the former settlements. But this part of the subject can not be well understood without direct reference to the text of the treaty and its accompanying documents.

The Japanese newspapers are much pleased with these new agreements. They regard them as a distinct recognition by Russia of Japan's special position in the Far East, and they attribute this recognition to the friendly sentiments of their recent enemy. Japan on her side has shown a similar spirit of amity in the concessions she has made to Russia. It is also remarked that with the exception of the boundary in Saghalien and the satisfaction of the account for the maintenance of prisoners, all questions arising out of the war are now disposed of. The newspapers further express a strong hope that this treaty may inaugurate a new fraternal era for the two countries. It is almost comical that two great nations living side by side should have such petty commercial relations as those now existing between Japan and Russia.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

We have again to ask who is the criminally unscrupulous correspondent responsible for the telegrams sent to America about Japan's attitude. It must be confessed that some of the Americans themselves are showing a certain want of dignity and self-reliance. A country which knows its own greatness, which the United States ought to, does not constitute a field adapted for the circulation of such rumours as are now bruited abroad in America. Japan appears to bulk so largely in the vision of the strong men beyond the Pacific that they seem to have lost their sense of proportion, and even a journal like the New York Herald is too much perturbed to consult its atlas before publishing a blunder like its recent assertion that Pratas Island is in the immediate vicinity of the Philippines. As for Senator Stone, his assertion that he saw evidence of anti-American feeling in Japan is too surprising to be worthy of serious comment. Through all the vicissitudes of her modern career Japan has never wavered in her uniquely friendly attitude towards the United States, and not even the untoward happenings in San Francisco affected her mood in any perceptible degree. Senator Stone must therefore have been looking designedly for what he affects to have discovered. But how are we to stigmatise the Yokohama correspondent who wired that Japan is about to establish a naval station on Pratas Island? It is almost impossible to believe that this correspondent credited his own story. Certainly he had no evidence whatever to support it. Can there be anything more hideously criminal than the action of a publicist who deliberately sets himself to injure relations between two great nations? Such a person ought to be picking oakum or walking a treadmill instead of serving as a newspaper agent.

Notice is given that the three Buoys moored in the Bay of Dairen, have been changed as follows:—The Buoy moored at the end of the easternmost jetty has been changed into a conical, iron, black buoy, surmounted by a cylindrical topmark, and 10 feet high above the water. Each of the two Buoys, one at the end of the shoal extending from the West-Basin; and the other on the south side of the shoal lying southwest of Hosan Tao, have been changed into a conical, iron, red buoy, surmounted by a triangular topmark, and 10 feet high above the water.

FINANCIAL AND BUSINESS NOTES.

Friday, September 6.

The whalers of Japan have just held a general meeting for the purpose of debating two projects. One was for suspending whale-fishing during the summer months, so as to form a close season for the purpose of increasing the stock of fish. This idea was rejected on the ground that whale-fishing in Japan being still in its infancy, the time was inopportune for such limitations, and further investigation would be necessary. The second proposal was the formation of a subordinate company, whose functions would be the handling of the whales captured by the associates of the original union. This was approved of, and it was resolved that the curing company should have a capital of a million yen, and should establish five stations, four in Japan and one in Korea.

It will be remembered that the region called Taito in Formosa was the principal objective point of the recent advance by the Aiyu troops. We now read in Japanese papers that since 1899 this place has been the scene of an enterprise on a very large scale by the Kada Guild of Japan. The region is rich in camphor and offers great facilities for agriculture and for the pasturing of cattle. The area available for these two latter purposes is said to be 50 million tsubo (over 40,000 acres) and 2,000 cattle are already grazing there as a result of the Kada Guild's industry, while 60,000 cattles of camphor are collected monthly and large areas are growing peppermint, sugar-cane, and rice. Great facilities are extended to Japanese immigrants, of whom there are now said to be about 3,000. All this industry and effort were seriously checked by raids on the part of the savages, and it was mainly to protect such a flourishing enterprise that the recent advance of the Aiyu lines was projected. The operations of these troops are said to have exercised a most beneficial effect and the Kada Guild's work is now proceeding vigorously in all branches. We may add that Taito is on the east side of the island, whereas all agricultural and commercial essays have hitherto been confined to the west coast.

At a meeting of the directors of the Tanko Steamship Company on the 5th inst. it was announced that the first instalment—namely 2½ million yen—of the capital to be devoted to the construction of the new steel foundry in Hokkaido would be paid up on the 15th of October in equal portions by the British shareholders and the Japanese.

The Kyoto Municipality is still struggling to obtain a 6 per cent. loan of 9 million yen, repayable in 30 years, for the construction of electric railways, waterworks and drains. But in the existing state of the Japanese money market the banks do not seem disposed to lend such a sum at such a rate.

On the 14th instant at 11 a.m., there will be launched at the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard in Nagasaki the largest steamer ever built in Japan. She is a vessel of 18,000 tons and her keel was laid in November, 1905. She is being constructed to the order of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha and she will ultimately have two sister ships built at the same yard.

Saturday, September 7.

The Yomiuri Shimbun says that the condition of ease which was expected to supervene in the money market after the settlement of the half-yearly accounts has not arrived. On the contrary the demand for money exceeds the supply. This is said to be due to the unusually large needs of the silk trade and to the withdrawal of sums deposited in the banks by companies which were formed in the time of the boom and are now being dissolved. It must be confessed that neither of these causes seems sufficient.

As to the question of companies organized in the early part of the year or in the closing months of last year, several have already wound up their affairs and ceased to exist, but, according to the Shogyo Shimpō, there are many companies which, though they ought to follow this example, have held on and incurred expenses such as render it difficult now for them to repay any reasonable proportion of the bargain money put up by subscribers for shares.

On the 6th inst. the Tokyo share market showed some vitality in the forenoon session but fell back again in the afternoon owing apparently to exaggerated rumours of the advent of another typhoon.

Sunday, September 8.

It is stated that the new iron foundry at Muroran, which, as our readers know, is a joint Anglo-Japanese enterprise, will be in working order by July of next year. The steel factory, however, is not expected to be in operation before 1910. According to present estimates, 4,000 hands will ultimately be employed, and if the families of these men be included, the population of Muroran will probably receive an increment of 20,000 people.

The Fiji Shimpō has rather a lugubrious paragraph about the autumn silk crop. The gist of it is that whereas, prior to the recent inundations, a yield of 20 per cent. above the average was expected, the havoc wrought by the floods was so great that the actual harvest will probably be 20 per cent. below the average. Of course it will be understood that these figures refer to the autumn crop only.

One of the recent features of the Tokyo Stock Exchange has been a decline in the market price of the shares of the Exchange itself, which are now quoted at something less than 149 yen, whereas they had risen in August to over 170. Some authorities find an explanation of this in the fact that the volume of business now done is not sufficient to provide for a really substantial dividend, on the capital thus increased. During the past three months the shares handled by the Exchange averaged only 27,000 daily, and these authorities allege that such a small business will not produce a dividend of more than 10 per cent., whereas the last dividend was 40 per cent. The Shogyo Shimpō, however, flouts this pessimistic view. It says that if things once begin to move, as they are pretty certain to do, the shares of the Exchange will mount rapidly, and in all probability the figure of 200 will be reached within the current year.

On Saturday the tone of the stock market was very weak owing to the receipt of telegrams showing that the Riukiu typhoon had invaded Japan.

Rice was the only thing that showed an upward tendency. The closing quotations were 18.27 yen for immediate delivery; 17.18 yen for delivery in October and 16.58 yen for delivery in November. It is interesting to compare these figures with the quotations on the same day of last year, namely 14.16 yen, 13.93 yen, and 13.67 yen, respectively. Considering that the rice crop last year was below the average, whereas this year it is tolerably sure to be above the average, it is evident that these prices are influenced by some factor independent of the yield of the cereal.

The Shogyo Shimpō quotes an anonymous informant, whom it describes as an influential figure in the business world. His calculation of the rice crop for this year tallies with that recently made by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, namely 48 million koku prior to the recent inundations, and at least 47 millions subsequently to them. This of course takes no account of the damage that may have been done by the status now passing up the Sea of Japan.

Monday, September 9.

It appears that the managers of the Tokyo Railway failed to obtain official sanction for their scheme of an all-night service of goods transport. They have now consequently modified their programme in the sense of carrying mail matter and parcels only. Their investigations are said to have shown that a handsome profit may be expected in this line of business.

There will be no keen competition between the Tokyo Electric Light Company and the Tokyo Railway Company. The former announces the intention of reducing its rates from 30 sen per kilow. to 20 sen, with deductions in case of the use of large quantities. Moreover the Electric Light Company will give up its half-night system in favour of a whole-night one, but will charge 1.40 yen against the Railway Company's 1.20 yen.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun gives some figures showing the state of Japan's national debts at the close of August. Her domestic indebtedness then amounted to 1,056,569,702 yen and her foreign indebtedness to 1,303,147,666 yen, making a grand total of 2,359,717,368 yen. Since the beginning of the Meiji Era, the debts contracted by this country have totalled 2,965,609,250 yen, out of which the amount of domestic debts repaid has been 605,891,892 yen. Our contemporary mentions as having been repaid in the field of foreign debts a sum of 67,577,534 yen, but it is obvious that this cannot refer to the whole of the Meiji period.

Mr. Soyeda, who has just returned to Japan from Europe, is quoted as saying that the tendency of European capitalists at present is to invest in short-period loans rather than long-period. There have been so many loans floated, however, during recent years, that people's accounts are pretty well filled, and therefore the time is not at all favourable for borrowing. Mr. Soyeda denies emphatically that the state of Japan's national finances has had anything to do with the difficulty of obtaining money abroad. For his own part he claims merely to have opened a route which will be utilized when more favourable market conditions present themselves.

It appears probable that there will be keen competition on the Tsuruga-Vladivostok line between ships of the Russian Volunteer Fleet and the Osaka Shosen Kaisha. The former intends to increase the number of its weekly services and to lower its rates to figures appreciably smaller than those charged by the Osaka Company. There are already two services weekly and it is presumable that these will soon be augmented. These things make very much for facilities of correspondence with Europe.

Tuesday, September 10.

We read in Japanese journals that the attempt to effect a compromise between the Jōshū sericulturists and the Yokohama silk exporters has ended in failure. The Yokohama exporters did not stand alone in their opposition to the direct-export programme of the Jōshū men. Several of the Japanese middlemen were ranged on the side of the Yokohama exporters, in view of the obvious fact that the competition of the latter is one of the most potent means of keeping up the price of these re-reels. It appears, however, that this scheme of direct export is not a sudden freak on the part of the Jōshū sericulturists; they sent commissioners to the United States last year for the purpose of investigating the situation, and it was owing to the favourable reports thus obtained that they decided thenceforth to entrust the staple to three Japanese firms for direct export. They have already suffered by a marked decline of the prices locally obtainable, but they are said to be resolved to test the new experiment thoroughly, whatever temporary loss may be entailed.

The estimate of loss resulting to the autumn silk crop from the recent inundations has now reached such a figure that instead of a crop 20 per cent above the average, there is talk of one 50 per cent below that figure. Of course the autumn crop of silk in Japan is only a fraction of the spring crop, so that the losses caused by the inclement weather will not seriously affect the whole year's yield.

The Dai Nippon Seltō Kaisha (Sugar Refining Company), which was recently formed by amalgamating several minor concerns, has just issued debentures to the amount of 3 million yen. They have been taken up by the principal banks in Tokyo and Osaka, the issue price being 98, the rate of interest 7 per cent, and the period of redemption 13 years.

From the 10th inst. the Government's financial agents in London and New York will begin to pay off the war loan of £22,000,000 sterling which was contracted at 6 per cent. Out of this total amount the sum accounted for by computations was £6,920,200, and a further sum of £5,000,000 worth is in the possession of the Japanese Treasury so that the total to be now paid off is £10,079,800. We may recall the fact that the above £22,000,000 sterling represent the two first loans raised by the Japanese Government during the war, namely, one of 10,000,000 and one of 12,000,000. Both carried the same interest, 6 per cent., and in the case of the first the sum actually received was £690 per bond and in the case of the second £86. In the spring of this year a new foreign loan of £25,000,000 sterling was contracted at 5 per cent, the Treasury receiving 95½ net per bond for the purpose of commuting the 6 per cent loan.

The Tokyo Stock Exchange remains in an exceedingly depressed condition. The weather may have something to do with this, but such an explanation can only be regarded as very partial considering that the rice quotation fell half a point on the morning of the 9th, a clear proof that the recent gale is not considered to have injured the crop appreciably.

Wednesday, September 11.

The 10th inst. saw a slight improvement on the Tokyo Stock Exchange. Nearly all shares rose more or less, though the upward tendency was decidedly small. There were, however, three exceptions. The Toyo Kisen Kaisha's stock fell by as much as 5½ points. This is easily explained by the fact that the Company's last half-yearly returns show a total net profit of only 90,000 yen, and in order to pay the usual dividend of 12 per cent., a sum of 150,000 yen had to be taken from the reserve which is thus reduced to 100,000 yen. These incidents were certainly enough to bring the Company's shares into disfavour, but they are scarcely sufficient to account for a quotation of only 41 yen for shares having a face value of 50. It is pointed out by Tokyo newspapers that the present may be regarded as a transition period in this Company's history. On the 14th inst. there will be launched at Nagasaki, to order of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, the Tenyo Maru, a steamer of 18,000 tons with a speed of 19 knots. This will be by far the finest vessel eastward of Suez and as she is one of a fleet of three which the Company has decided to build, the moment is not very opportune for declaring dividends. There has been some talk of amalgamating the Toyo Kisen Kaisha and the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, but no credence attaches to that rumour. Mr. R. Kondo, in one of the able speeches habitually made by him at the half yearly meetings over which he presides, clearly predicted the advent of a time of keen competition and small profits in the maritime carrying trade of the Far East. The Nippon Yusen Kaisha is trimming its sails to this temporarily unfavourable wind and is not thinking of any large schemes of amalgamation. We observe that the Shogyō Shimpō takes a pessimistic view of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha.

The other two exceptions to the general rise were the new shares of the Tankō Railway Company and the stock of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. Both of these declined, but only by a small amount. In the case of the Tankō shares the explanation is that a considerable time must elapse before any profit is derived from the steel factory, and in the case of the Yusen Kaisha the reason assigned is that the half yearly accounts of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha suggest a generally unsatisfactory state of the maritime carrying trade.

Owing to the comparatively settled state of the weather and to the certainty that the 220th day will pass off quietly, quotations on the rice exchange fell appreciably on the 10th inst., and this helped to create the feeling of confidence which was observed on the Stock Exchange.

On the 10th inst. the Industrial Bank made its tenth issue of debentures to the amount of 1,300,000 yen at 6½ per cent. The whole sum was taken up by the Deposits Bureau of the Finance Department.

The Kwangyō Bank is not deterred by the failure of its recent issue of prize-hearing bonds. Another attempt will be made next month. During the war the denomination of these bonds used to be 5 yen and the highest prize was 500 yen. Thereafter the Diet passed a law limiting the denomination to 10 yen. The highest prize, however, remained as before, and this fact is thought to have militated against a successful issue. There has been some talk of raising the highest prize to 1,000 yen, but we gather that the idea of the authorities is to increase the number of prizes rather than to augment their dimensions.

The Yokohama Specie Bank held its half yearly meeting on the 10th inst. and declared a dividend of 6 yen per share. The President, Mr. Takahashi, made a speech in which he dwelt chiefly on the prosperous state of the country's foreign trade, which had grown largely in volume, as compared with last year, in spite of the very depressing conditions which existed in Japan during the first half of the current year. Owing to this trade development the bank had not suffered from the bad times which caused so many disasters in other directions, but was able to declare a dividend of 12 per cent. Mr. Takahashi spoke also of the state of the foreign money market which he considered to be now recovering its normal tone.

Thursday, September 12.

The Shogyō Shimpō publishes some interesting figures showing the monthly volume of transactions on the Tokyo Stock Exchange since December, 1905. These figures are as follow:—

1905.	shares.	1906.	shares.
December.....	733,010	December.....	1,417,950
1906.		1907.
January.....	683,280	June.....	1,750,280
February.....	1,219,020	July.....	1,200,670
March.....	1,077,810	August.....	1,559,650
April.....	650,590	September.....	1,057,570
May.....	630,790	October.....	883,260
Totals
for 6 months.....	4,978,460		7,959,380
June.....	582,260	June.....	581,670
July.....	1,258,690	July.....	908,620
August.....	1,363,540	August.....	640,970
for 3 months.....	3,204,540		2,131,260

It will be observed that the volume of transactions for the 3 months ended August 31st was very greatly less than the volume for the corresponding period of 1906, though the latter was not a period of special activity. In fact, the depression witnessed since the spring of the current year is quite unprecedented. The market on the 11th inst. continued to show the signs of recovery which had commenced on the previous day. There was a general upward tendency. The shares of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, which had suffered a panicky drop, recovered by more than two points, and the shares of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, which suffered from the same cause, also went up.

The weather has much to do with the Stock Exchange in the present nervous mood of speculators and investors, but although some minor centres of depression are reported from various parts of the country, they are not considered to be of any consequence. There is still, however, the centre of depression which shows signs of slowly approaching the Riukiu Islands, but has not yet assumed any definite direction.

Considerable interest attaches to the debentures issued by a syndicate of banks on account of the Dai Nihon Sugar Refining Company. This is the first time that the Bank of Japan has associated itself with such a syndicate, and if the experiment prove successful, it is expected to be a forerunner of several similar essays. Thus far subscriptions are said to be flowing in rapidly, and there is every prospect of the list filling without delay.

There has been a meeting of the principal shareholders of the Imperial Hotel. They decided, according to Tokyo newspapers, to raise the present capital of 1,200,000 yen to 2 millions, to pull down the existing hotel, to rebuild it on the site now occupied by the official residence of the Minister of State for Home Affairs, and to convert the site of the old hotel into a garden. It is intended to complete this work before the year of the Exhibition, and application has already been made for the new site.

MANCHURIA.

Friday, September 6.

Viceroy Hsu and the high Chinese officials of Mukden are reported to be treating General Oshima with extraordinary courtesy. A staff of foreign cooks has been summoned from the Astor House in Tientsin to provide meals for the General and his suite. The best available official building has been placed at their disposal, the roads along which they pass are newly strewn with sand and guarded by constables, and altogether the arrangements resemble those made for a prince of the blood.

Saturday, September 7.

The Chinese "braves" at Changchun continue their outrageous conduct. On the night of the 4th they attacked a Japanese letter-carrier and beat him badly, finally tying him up and holding him prisoner. When the local police-inspector, wearing uniform, came to the rescue, the Chinese threatened to shoot him, and it was not until the constables attached to the Japanese Consulate arrived upon the scene that the unfortunate letter-carrier was released. It is impossible for the most prejudiced person to suppose that these numerous outrages by Chinese soldiers find justification in the conduct of their Japanese victims. The men must be a very unruly lot. Probably among their number there are some hot-headed propagandists of the rights-recovery doctrine, and the teachings of these agitators have roused among the soldiers a spirit of riot and violence. The wisest course in the circumstances would be to replace the present force by a different body of men. The Chinese police seem to be almost as bad as the soldiers. Instead of preserving order they are apparently bent upon making things hot for the Japanese residents. It is certain that this state of affairs has not the approval of an enlightened statesman like Viceroy Hsu, and we may fairly assume that no effort on his part will be wanting in the situation.

Monday, September 9.

The police affair at Mukden seems to be assuming troubling dimensions. At the instance of the Japanese residents who met for the purpose of passing resolutions, the Japanese Consul-General is said to have addressed a very strong protest to the Viceroy, but as yet this has not produced any fruit: on the contrary it is stated that the Chief of Police has issued an order strongly anti-Japanese in spirit, and that the police office directly connected with the Japanese has remonstrated against the order, avowing inability to carry it into effect. Meanwhile the Japanese at Mukden have formed a union for purposes of self-protection. They held a preliminary meeting at the Chamber of Commerce on the 7th inst. and passed resolutions in the sense that the recent outrage must be fully investigated and the responsibility for it fixed; that an indemnity must be demanded, and that the police should not be allowed to carry arms. A general meeting of all the Japanese subjects in Mukden was to be held on the 8th inst. for the purpose of confirming and if necessary supplementing these resolutions.

THE LATE EDVARD GRIEG.

Norway has lost one of her foremost sons by the death at the age of 64 of Edvard Grieg. A delicate child, he never grew into a robust man and the reason his years extended beyond three score is to be ascribed to the tender care of a most devoted wife and the thoughtfulness of an appreciative Government, which, in 1874 granted him a pension, thus freeing his mind from financial anxiety. Of Scottish descent, his grandfather being an Aberdeen merchant, Grieg was the most Norwegian of Norwegians, and through him, to use Bjornson's words, "Norwegian moods and Norwegian life have entered into every music-room in the world." Mr. W. Kail Vincent, an enthusiastic admirer of the composer, speaking before the Yokohama Literary Society last March, said that "Grieg's compositions are unmistakably Norwegian, but there is more of Grieg in them than of Norway. The melodies, though redolent of their native soil are emphatically his own—such melodies you do not find in Norwegian folk-songs—and still more unmistakably his own are his bold harmonies. Folk-music in its primitive state has no harmonies at all, whereas Grieg's music represents the very latest phase in the evolution of harmony. I believe I am correct in stating that among his 73 works (i.e. up to the present time, 1907) there are, beside three volumes of pianoforte arrangements of popular tunes, only three, viz. Op. 30, 35, and 64 in which he has incorporated Norwegian melodies, the rest are his own. On the whole there is more Norwegian colouring in Grieg's pianoforte pieces than in his songs; but the more one studies Norse folk-songs and Northern composers before Grieg's time, the more are we surprised at his originality." Again, later in his lecture, Mr. Vincent remarked that all Grieg's pianoforte pieces are artistic specimens of musical workmanship, and polished as any exquisite Japanese vase. "It would be a matter of great difficulty to single out a few of them and label them as 'the best'; individual tastes differ, what may please some, may not be to the liking of others. In them the trivial and commonplace you will not find, and in all the composer's works there is not exhibited a trace of morbid or mawkish moods. As previously said there is no doubt more of the Norwegian colouring in Grieg's pianoforte pieces than in any of his other works. Theorists have used their spectroscopes to analyse this 'local colour' but in so doing they have not made clear what is Norway's and what is Grieg's." Tchaikovsky had the highest opinion of Grieg's gifts and in one of his recently published letters he wrote:—"Hearing the music of Grieg, we instinctively recognise that it was written by a man impelled by an irresistible impulse to give vent by means of sounds to a flood of poetical emotion, which obeys no theory or principle, is stamped with no impress but that of a vigorous and sincere artistic feeling. Perfection of form, strict and irreproachable logic in the development of his themes, are not perseveringly sought after by the celebrated Norwegian. But what charm, what inimitable and rich musical imagery, what warmth and passion in his melodic phrases, what teeming vitality in his harmony, what originality and beauty in the turn of his piquant and ingenious modulations and rhythms, and in all what interest, novelty and independence are exhibited in his works."

The University of Cambridge conferred the degree of Mus. Bac. honoris causa, on Grieg in 1893, on the same day that it similarly honoured Tchaikowsky, San Saens, Max Bruch and Arrigo Buto, and of course he was the recipient of honours and decorations from Sweden, Germany, France, etc.—but he was never known to ever wear one of his orders. Indeed, there is one amusing story told about him in this connection which bears re-telling. Grieg was "concertising" in one of the smaller German states when the reigning Duke invited him to the Hofburg. In due time, in the course of conversation, the Duke presented the composer with a badge of his Order. Grieg simply said, "Thank you," put the decoration into one of his rear pockets, and continued the conversation. The Duchess, who was present, saved the somewhat awkward situation; she went up smiling to the composer saying, "Please let me show you where to wear such a badge," and proceeded to fasten the decoration to the lapel of his coat with her own hands.

JAPANESE FINANCE.

Tokyo journals give some particulars about the state of the Treasury. From them we learn that the accounts for the last fiscal year, which ended on the 31st of March, 1907, have now been made up. They show a total income of 514,852,318 yen, and a total expenditure of 463,867,135 yen, so that there was a surplus of 50,985,183 yen. This surplus was mainly due to increments of the ordinary revenue. Thus the actual receipts from taxation exceeded the estimates by 31 million yen, the stamp tax produced 6.8 millions more than had been anticipated, and the State industries 7.8 millions. Out of the above surplus 35 millions have been allotted to various purposes in the current year, leaving 15 millions to be carried forward to next year, and to this has to be added a large surplus from the year ended March 31st, 1905, so that if the money due by Russia on account of the keep of prisoners be added, there is a total sum of more than 100 million yen for the purposes of next year. The Treasury had received the Diet's permission to issue domestic bonds to the amount of 79 million yen, but in view of the above figures this issue was dispensed with, and it is believed that there will be no occasion to float bonds next year either.

THE VANCOUVER RIOTS.

The only Japanese newspaper which has commented thus far on the Vancouver riots is the Asahi Shimbun. It recalls the fact that the local assembly of British Columbia has frequently endeavoured to legislate in an anti-Oriental sense and has been restrained only by the refusal of the Governor General to extend sanction to such laws. This suggests that the racial feeling is very strongly developed in British Columbia. The Asahi while sympathising with its countrymen, whose stores were the objects of the raiders' attacks, urges that the only wise course for the Japanese to assume in the circumstances is to cultivate patience. They must not meet violence with violence even under the plea of self-defence, and they must persistently endeavour to behave in such a manner as shall afford no excuse for racial discrimination. It seems to be felt in Tokyo that all essential steps will be taken by the British authorities.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

It appears to have been a mistake to say that the recent advance of the Aiyu line in Formosa was partially a final operation, or at any rate would not be renewed until next year. The return to Tokyo of the Court Chamberlain recently sent by his Majesty to convey the thanks of the Throne to the successful troops has dispelled the above error. Mr. Shirai says that the advance is to be resumed as quickly as possible. The savages are still in possession of regions rich in valuable products, to say nothing of the fact that so long as these truculent spirits are not brought under complete control there can be no security of Japanese life and property in their vicinity. The last advance placed the Japanese in occupation of mountains which are regarded as the keys of the positions, and therefore the next forward movement of the Aiyu lines will be quicker and even more effective than the last was.

We read in Japanese journals that all the men who completed two years' service with the colours will be released from duty next November. It had been supposed that a portion of them would be retained for further training. But such is not the case. The total number thus released will be 34,560. Another piece of news with regard to the Japanese army is that opinion is gradually trending in the direction of abolishing the institution of soldier servants. This question has been for some time on the tapis, the obvious reason for the abolition being that by assigning soldiers to act as servants to officers, the available fighting force is considerably reduced.

We reproduce elsewhere an epitome of an interesting sermon delivered by the Rev. Dr. DeForest of Sendai in Plymouth Church. It is a sermon which may be endorsed in full with the exception of one minor point where we are inclined to suspect that the learned divine has not been rightly reported. He is made to say:—"If one member of a family commits a crime, the whole family, children and all are subject to punishment." That was true in ancient times in Japan, but it has long ceased to be the case, and Dr. DeForest is not at all likely to have made such a mistake.

A great deal has been heard from time to time about a claim set up on behalf of three owners of fishery privileges in the water of south Saghalien. It was asserted on behalf of these claimants that the ten-years' lease held by them with regard to certain fishing stations ought to be included among the rights of private property secured by the Portsmouth Treaty. On Japan's side it was denied that the language of the Treaty could properly be extended to such a case, and although the discussion has been going on in a more or less fitful manner for nearly a year and a half, no settlement has been reached nor does any seem likely to be reached. Tokyo journals now allege, however, that this troublesome matter will be disposed of by granting a sum of money to the claimants in such a form as to leave the rights and wrongs of the dispute undecided. It is understood that the Japanese Foreign Office has always been willing to adopt this course.

Any Briton who desires to put himself into a cheerful mood should begin the current Quarterly Review by studying the article on "British Investments Abroad." The figures for 1906 are £3,220,000,000, showing an increase on those of 1897 of £670,000,000.

Any one troubled by the "exports v. imports" scare may be reassured by the remark which follows:—"These figures do not support the general allegation that we are living on our capital because our imports exceeds our exports. On the contrary, they afford conclusive evidence that the accumulation of wealth by this country is so great that it is necessary to find an outlet for its profitable investment abroad." The amari aliquid is the frequent difference on the wrong side between nominal amount and market value. In American investments the first stands at 750 millions, and the second at 569, the South American figuring with the portentous discrepancy of 39 millions against 6.7. In the Edinburgh Review another writer demonstrates from recent trade returns "that Britain has been subjected to a fierce competition and is coming out of it, and this in spite of certain national defects, with increasing success."

On the 8th inst. the railway from Tokachi to Kushiro in Hokkaido was officially opened. This line runs up the east side of the island and is now brought into connexion with the Sapporo railway on the west side so that the island may be said to be girdled by iron roads. The total length of line now open to traffic in Hokkaido, is 651 miles. It is expected that the Kushiro-Tokachi road will have much effect in developing the resources of the eastern coast.

Our readers are aware that various rumours have been afloat of late with regard to the House of Peers and Marquis Ito. It was commonly said that although the Lower Chamber had welcomed the Resident General, the Upper was not disposed to do anything of the kind, and in fact had no special sympathy with the policy of the Marquis. This was emphatically denied by the Chief Secretary of the Peers, who declared that the sole reason for the apparently reserved attitude of the Chamber was that only a very small fraction of its members were present in Tokyo at this season. Those that wished to regard the Chief Secretary's explanation as a mere excuse doubtless did so regard it, but an unanswerable denial is now furnished by the Peers themselves, for they have invited Marquis Ito to a banquet and he has accepted the invitation for the 17th inst.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The "Kokka."

Mr. S. Taki, writing in the last issue of the Kokka, concludes his interesting essay on "Present-day Japanese Painting." The impression left on us by his essay is not reassuring. He says that no intelligent student can entertain an optimistic view of the present tendencies of Japanese art. Alike the modern school and the classic school, or as they are generally called the New School and the Old, come in for very severe criticism at the hands of Mr. Taki. He takes the pictures at the recent Tokyo Exhibition as material for discussion, and certainly he appears to be justified in doing so when we remember that no less lights than Kawabata Gyokusho and Araki Kampo were among the exhibitors who represented the Old School, and Terasaki Kogiyo and Kawai Gyokudo among those that represented the New. The public has been accustomed to consider that almost anything from the brush of Kawabata or Araki must be regarded with admiration, but Mr. Taki is by no means of that opinion and we are strongly disposed to agree with him. The fact is that the Old School is in a partially decadent condition and the New in an embryonic. As for the school which frankly essays to paint in purely Occidental style—a school which recalls the names of Wirmian, Fontanesi, Ragusa and others—it certainly has achieved some successes, but it has also produced numerous pictures which suggest eminent failure rather than partial success. Mr. Taki's criticism of a picture which attracted great attention in the Exhibition, seems perfectly just. We refer to the "Founding of a Nation" by Mr. Nakamura. How to represent such an event might well tax the imagination of any artist. Mr. Nakamura's method is to paint a group of naked figures standing on the brow of a hill and looking down into a fair valley where presumably they contemplate fixing their habitations. But there is just this to be said about the picture, namely that it is absolutely incapable of self-explanation. The impression suggested by it is in the first place bewilderment, and in the second admiration for the fine painting of the human figures, though it must be confessed that a nude man wearing a helmet somewhat shocks one's sense of congruity. We ourselves have not the slightest doubt that the eclectic genius which the Japanese have shown in all their dealings with foreign civilization will ultimately assert itself in the field of art as it has already done in so many other directions. But the task is here eminently difficult and much time will certainly be needed.

"L'Art Public."

The first number of "L'Art Public" appeared on June 1st. It is a monthly periodical containing 85 pages and profusely illustrated. The place of publication is Brussels, and the publishers are the "Institut International d'Art Public." There can be no doubt that this magazine will prove a signal addition to the art literature of the time. The editing committee contains nineteen names of men already more or less famous, and the collaborateurs make a long list of distinguished men and women in every great city of the Occident. At their head is her Majesty Elisabeth, Queen of Roumania. Nothing can be finer than the illustrations and the general technique of the work, nor can we question that the demand for the magazine will be very wide. If we may judge from this first number, the essays are to be in two languages only, French and English, but as several names among the collaborateurs are those of men resident in Italian, Spanish and Portuguese cities, it may be that other languages will be represented later on. The publication is to be most heartily welcomed and strongly commended to all lovers of art in any of its numerous forms.

DEATH OF MR. T. P. TYLER.

The death took place in the General Hospital, Yokohama, on Sunday, of Mr. T. P. Tyler, one of the oldest foreign residents of the port. For many years he was connected with the firm of Fraser, Farley and Varnum, but latterly has been engaged in superintending the timber business of Messrs. Varnum and Arnould in the Hokkaido. A genial companion and staunch friend his loss will be mourned by many.

The funeral of the late Mr. T. P. Tyler took place at Yokohama on Tuesday afternoon, the officiating clergyman being the Rev. H. B. Walton. Mr. R. M. Varnum, brother-in-law, was chief mourner and the pall-bearers were Capt. Weston, Messrs. E. Andreis, E. V. Thorn, H. Grimble, O. T. Gillon and Dr. Hall.

NATIONAL ETHICS.

THE differences between the ethics of nations are generally very difficult to trace, and this is particularly true in the case of an Occidental essaying to fathom Japanese ethics, the literature of this country being for the most part closed to him and even intelligent intercourse with the people being generally beyond his competence. Nevertheless the study has numerous attractions and consequently tempts many publicists. Thus we observe that a local contemporary, discussing the "ethics of assassination," arrives at the conclusion that "assassins are regarded as national heroes" in Japan. That is to us a surprising verdict. In speaking thus of "assassination" the Japan Herald is careful to distinguish between the crime of murder when its victims are looked upon as tyrants, and the same crime in private life, but the language of the analysis is so obscure that we are unable to discover whether the private assassin is said to occupy the higher moral position in Europe or in Japan. Be that as it may, we are confronted by the unequivocal assertion that "the peculiarity in this country lies in the fact that assassins are regarded as national heroes." What evidence is there in support of such a singular assertion? We may be referred to the graves of the SOGA Brothers and of the Forty-seven Ronin, who were certainly assassins in one sense of the word and who have always been highly honoured by their countrymen. But have they not been honoured by foreigners also, and is there any historian who will class the vendetta with the crime of assassination, or undertake to affirm that assassins were regarded as national heroes in any country where the vendetta was practised? Our local contemporary then goes on to say:—

The Japanese seeking to avenge an insult or to maintain what he regards as the national honour seems to have no idea of any supernatural power befriending him, such as the knights of the Middle Ages in Europe appealed to. He is not ready to meet his opponent on equal terms in the belief that the justice of his cause will enable him to win. He will not even rest his honour on his superior skill. The death of his victim alone is the object he seeks, and he sees in that death honour and glory for himself.

This is absolutely at variance with our own reading of Japanese history and our own knowledge of Japanese customs. We do not for a moment pretend to say that we detect anything noble or praiseworthy in the practice of invoking the aid of heaven for the better performance of some deed of violence. In fact the prayers for victory that are offered to the same deity by different nations engaged in war with each other have always seemed to us little short of an insult to heaven. Be that as it may, however, the fact is that so far from being without any idea of supernatural power befriending him, there has probably never yet been a case of a normally constituted Japanese who undertook a deed of blood without previous supplication at some shrine or temple. Indeed it is precisely because of this belief in the supernatural that Japanese men and even women do not hesitate to burn incense and place flowers at the grave of a criminal like NISHINO BUNTARO. Asked why they make such a demonstration, they will one and all answer that they do homage to the success of the dead man's deed, quite irrespectively of its nature, and that they invoke on behalf of their own affairs the assistance of the influence which promoted that success. At NISHINO's tomb the worshippers were mostly students, actors, danses, professional musicians and so forth, and it appears to us that if any general inference as to Japanese character may be drawn from this and cognate incidents, it is that the nation has a tendency to consider results irrespectively of processes or projects. Nor can we admit that a Japanese "is not ready to meet his opponent on equal terms in the belief that the justice of his cause will enable him to win, or even to rest his honour on his superior skill." These strange dicta are entirely opposed to history. It is quite true that there were many cases where the kataki-uchi was carried out in such a manner as to leave no chance to the victim, who was taken by surprise or otherwise foully dealt with. That method of executing vengeance was not peculiar to Japan. But there were also numerous cases where the avenger of a relative's blood met his adversary fairly in the lists and each of the combatants trusted to his own skill in arms. In fact no other course was possible where the person from whom reparation was sought happened to be in the military service of some feudal chieftain. A regularly sanctioned duel then took place in an officially guarded arena. There was thus in the practice of the Japanese samurai nothing to warrant the assertions that he was "not ready to meet his opponent on equal terms," and that he had "no belief in the justice of his cause enabling him to win." Generalizations of that kind are very dangerous, especially when they are not prefaced by a study of history.

CHIENTAO.

NEWS from Peking says that the Chinese Government has presented to the Japanese Legation a document covering many pages, which aims at showing by historical references that the region called Chientao has always been a part of the Chinese Empire, its boundary being the Tumen River; that is to say, the main stream, not the branch as claimed by Korea. The difference between the two assertions is easily understood by observing that the Tumen forms with its branch a V-shaped area, and if the main stream be taken as the boundary the whole of the portion within the V goes to China, whereas if the tributary be taken as the boundary the portion within the V goes to Korea. The Chinese claim hinges upon an ideograph. The Peking Government seems to entertain very strong views on this subject, but the Japanese authorities are said to view the matter with considerable sangfroid. They see no occasion for precipitancy, their view being that in due process of time China can not fail to acquire a thorough perception of Japan's intentions and motives. After this knowledge has been imparted, the problem may be approached with greater advantage. Meanwhile it is denied that there is any intention of establishing a large military station in Chientao. What the future may bring forth nobody of course undertakes to predict, but for the time being this country does not intend to send any troops to the region in dispute. Colonel SARRO has a small force of gendarmes, who are designed solely for the protection of Korean subjects, in accordance with the desire of the Korean Government. It is possible that barracks may be built for these men, but that is all that is now contemplated. It would be very misleading therefore to assume that this problem has reached or is likely to reach an acute phase.

Without entering into all the details of the above dispute, we may mention an apparently conclusive contention put forward on the Korean side, namely, that in the first place, the principal boundary stone erected 195 years ago on the summit of the mountain Petou-shan, clearly indicate the branch stream as the eastern boundary of the Korean territory and the Yalu River as the western boundary. In the second place, the branch stream has its source in this very mountain, so that the cliche of Petou-shan as the site of the principal boundary stone constitutes in itself a strong piece of evidence even though the ideographs on the stone were not what they are. In the third place, there are documents extant which prove that, one hundred years after the erection of the boundary stone, the Governor of Kirin, being anxious to restrain the immigration of Korean subjects into Chinese territory, directed that all such immigrants should be returned across the Tumen River; that is to say, the branch river, according to the ideographs used in the instruction, not the main river. At that time therefore the Governor of Kirin plainly regarded the branch river as the boundary of China's possessions in that region. Reference has been made more than once to the fact that this question formed a subject of discussion between the Governments of Seoul and Peking. The historical facts are said to be these:—Forty years ago Korea suffered from a famine, one effect of which was to drive a number of her subjects beyond the river into Chientao. No cognisance was taken of this state of affairs until 1883 when Ming An, the then Governor of Kirin, addressed a remonstrance to the Korean Government and for the first time set up the claim that everything westward of the Tumen River belonged to China. The Seoul Government denied the justice of this claim and in 1885 sent a commissioner to Peking to discuss the question. But the relations of Korea to China at that time were such as to render it impossible for the Peninsular Kingdom to assume a firm attitude towards its great neighbour. The matter was left in abeyance, but the Chinese Government took the very practical step of despatching a force of 1,500 troops in assertion of Peking's contention. Thenceforth the Koreans residing in Chientao found themselves heavily taxed and subjected to much oppression. They made to the Seoul Government repeated appeals for protection—but these produced no fruit until the period immediately antecedent to the Russo-Japanese war, when Korean officials were despatched to the scene, only to be withdrawn, however, when the war broke out. It is stated that a large part of the supplies needed for the left wing of the Russian army were drawn from Chientao. Colonel SARO is stationed at Tungsheng-yung, which is between 7 and 8 miles distant from the principal Chinese station.

JAPAN'S CRITICS.

IT is noticeable that serious charges are preferred against Japan's conduct in general in Korea and particularly against her doings in the present campaign against the insurgents. The general charges come from the Rev. Dr. R. P. MACKAY, who, in his capacity of General Secretary of Foreign Missions for the Presbyterian Church in Canada, recently visited Korea on a tour of inspection, and, returning to Canada, communicated his impressions to a Toronto barrister by whom they were published in the Montreal Witness. Dr. MACKAY claims to have been strongly pro-Japanese before he went to Korea, but he says that in spite of himself he had to change his mood, the Japanese treatment of the Koreans being "barbarous and atrocious—scarcely less atrocious than the horrors of the Congo." What happens in the Peninsula would be, he declares, "incredible if I did not see it before my eyes and hear it from every missionary on the ground" and he adds:—"I have not yet met one foreigner who is not intensely indignant at the cruelty and injustice of Japan in this land." It will be observed that this is very strong language. It is by no means the language of a calm or judicial mind. Not for that reason, however, should we be justified in rejecting Dr. MACKAY's testimony. His ardour may have been kindled by honest indignation, and if he has really seen and heard of "barbarous and atrocious" acts on the part of the Japanese, he does a public service in exposing them. Nevertheless his assertions are vitiated by the fault of excess. For on what does he base his terrible affirmation of proceedings "scarcely less atrocious than the horrors of the Congo." He bases it on two things: first, on acts witnessed with his own eyes, and secondly, on evidence given by "every missionary on the ground." Need we premise that we have not the least desire to read into these assertions any deliberate lapse from veracity.

Nevertheless they can not escape the reproach of being at once partial and exaggerated. Exaggerated, because no one paying a merely cursory visit to Korea, as Dr. MACKAY did, can have witnessed incidents warranting such wholesale allegations, unless indeed there exist in the Peninsula conditions of an altogether incredibly appalling character; and partial, because Dr. MACKAY claims to have obtained his information from "every missionary on the ground," whereas we know from the public declarations of a majority of the leading missionaries that they approve of Japan's doings in Korea and see in her the nation's one potential guide along the paths of enlightenment and prosperity. Dr. MACKAY, therefore, must have consulted only a narrow circle of missionaries, and he consequently over-steps the mark when he cites in support of his accusation "every missionary on the ground." It will be well, therefore, to receive his assertions with due caution, and to recognise their exaggeration. They certainly show that there exists among the missionaries a divergence of views as to the quality of Japan's conduct in Korea, and in the face of such divergence final judgment must be suspended. Those that follow Bishop HARRIS in supporting and applauding Japanese doings in the Peninsula are at least as worthy of credence as are Dr. MACKAY's informants.

The special charges alluded to above, as distinct from Dr. MACKAY's wholesale accusations, come from a very dubious source through a very tainted medium. They are based simply on "reports from the country," and they are published in the columns of a newspaper which, after long examination and thorough acquaintance, we have no choice but to declare the most inveterately prejudiced and uniformly unfair journal that ever came under our notice. The testimony of a witness who is known to be swayed by strong bias does not command full credence in any court of justice, and a corresponding correction must be applied in this instance. The charges themselves are practically insignificant. They are that a Japanese officer in command of a squad by which two Korean prisoners were fusilladed, thrust his sword into the bodies of the prisoners after their execution; that a Japanese soldier fired at an inoffensive party consisting of a man with his wife and child, killing the wife and wounding the child; and that the Japanese troops are compelling the Koreans to act as baggage-carriers without due compensation. The third of these charges may be dismissed as frivolous, since it is the invariable habit of troops on campaign to requisition local labour; the second sounds much more like an accident than a deliberate act of slaughter; and the first is probably a misconception. Yet if by any chance the Japanese troops are departing from the admirable record established by them in the Manchurian War, it is well that the fact should be brought to the notice of commanding officers. We do not observe, however, that there is any corresponding disposition to censure the Koreans who have murdered and are murdering peaceful unarmed Japanese civilians in cold blood, with shocking accompaniment of torture and mutilation. Is prejudice to be carried so far that an epidemic of barbarity on one side is to be passed over in complete silence, while a few sporadic excesses on the other are to be paraded as typical and damning? Neither do we observe that there is the least hesitation in accepting any anti-Japanese stories which come from Korean sources. It would not be fair to impugn the veracity of Koreans in general because the representatives sent by their Sovereign to the Hague have shown themselves wholly regardless of truth; but it is strictly fair to note that neither has a word been written in condemnation of the Hague Delegates' flagrant falsehoods, nor have these falsehoods inspired any reluctance to credit the obviously biased tales carried by other Koreans. It is not from Korean provincials who naturally sympathise with the insurrection that we look for true appreciations of those engaged in suppressing it. Time and research have again and again saved the pages of history from being disfigured with falsehoods which had gained wide credence originally on the strength of ex-parte evidence. We need only recall the case of Japan herself in Formosa, where her enemies well-nigh succeeded in fixing upon her at the outset a character of the blackest description. She lived down that slander so completely that the world scarcely remembers it any longer, and the story of her doings in Korea will have a similar sequel.

There is one other point. What should be the attitude of the Japanese towards these accusations? We observe that some of our contemporaries counsel public refutation, and even predict very evil consequences unless that step be taken. Surely such advice can not be seriously offered? When has any Government undertaken to correct the statements of every newspaper, however petty, and where would the responsibility cease were such a system inaugurated? Everything left without contradiction would necessarily pass for true, and an administration's most onerous duty would be that of censorship. No, in all these matters there is nothing for it but to trust in the invincible potentiality of truth to prevail ultimately.

YOKOHAMA SUBSCRIPTION LIBRARY.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of this Library was held at the Rooms the other evening. The Secretary reported that despite the summer holidays the attendance had been exceedingly good during July and August. In July there were 340 visitors to the library, 375 magazines had been taken out and 159 books; in August the figures were 246 visitors, 250 magazines and 160 books. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Otis A. Poole for the gift of 26 recent books, a set of science lectures and some copies of the Bookman magazine. It was decided to issue, in the course of a few days, a list of the numerous recent additions to the library.

WHEN HEARTS WERE YOUNG.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN WEEKLY MAIL.")

There are moments in life when everything centres into a brief second of time, as though all one's previous life were once for all focused in a word, in a girl's smile, in the perfume of a flower, in the touch of a delicate hand—so sensitive are we to the influences that surround us. It was an afternoon in summer time—time is of no consequence. I was paddling a canoe down the sylvan C— river. Sitting, ensconced amidst delicatest hued cushions, was a young girl, trailing her hand in the water as the canoe quietly glided under the tremulous, over-spreading pendant, summer foliage. I see her again—now years since—as vividly as though we were once more vis à vis, and time, for once, had retraced its steps. But, alas! there is no turning back to scan the experiences of life, except in reverie. She speaks a word to point out some common sight, and all Nature takes on the love-light she offers it; it is ever thus—it is the spirit within that gives the light; Nature only waits upon the eyes to see her in all her spectral beauty. She has plucked a fragile floweret from a passing bough, and in her merriment of heart tosses it to me from stem to stem of our little craft; I catch it in fear and trembling. How the flower throbs to speak the message it brings!

We are now ashore, the canoe pulled up under the hanging boughs, to be there till we have ventured into the mystery of the things about us. She guides me like a spirit; I cannot realize, I am her slave, a willing one enough, and worshipping the very ground she treads. Neither does she know the power of her influence, the grace of her personality, "the light that was never yet on land nor sea." I fear to speak and yet my heart is trembling as though it never can contain the love it holds. I fear to speak, lest the very act of speaking will lose her, and my heart remain vacant and bereaved for ever. We are now returning to our tiny craft, weighted for me with so much of the essence of life, but even now my mouth is closed though the pulsing of my heart must soon stifle me. The evening is fast closing, the comforting balm of approaching night is near at hand, and as we leave the canoe and return once more to the point we started from, I suggest we walk up to the heights of a hill, a look-out-spot, embracing a wide view of the river we have left and the now darkling hills retiring in the approaching gloom. Oh, how my heart almost bursts as I contemplate the word I long to ask and fear to ask. In a few moments we are sitting in the still summer breeze. Silently wondering at the glowing sunset, our twin hearts hungering for the fulfilment of what we both know has brought us together. At last the word is spoken, and my fate cast on the decision of a single word. Like lightning from a cloud, like a fleecy cloud coming up from the horizon, she tells me her heart is mine, that she has loved me from long ago,—and in the gathering darkness we seal our vows. Nature surrounds us in one embracing fellowship as though she too had part in the wonder of it all. I have declared my love and as I ponder for a moment over the few gifts I have to bestow in return for such love, my soul trembles as though an arrow of remorse had entered it. So strange is the fate of life.

YOKOHAMA.

Dr. Hara, chief civil engineer of Yokohama, on the evening of Sept. 5th returned from Tsukui, the source of the Yokohama water works, in company with Mr. Mitsuhashi, Mayor, who has been investigating the extent of the damage. Dr. Hara said that the repairs to the 18-inch pipe were commenced on Sept. 5th and are expected to be completed within a week. On their completion, the supply will be turned on in the ordinary way. The cost of the repairs already paid amounts to ten thousand yen. Dr. Hara will leave tomorrow, Sept. 8, for Tsukui, to supervise the works now going on there, and also to make an investigation as to the completer repairs to be carried out hereafter. The River Doshi is still very muddy and the water is about three feet higher than usual.

A telephonic report to the Yokohama Central Police Office says that a wealthy farmer named S. Takahashi (72) and his daughter, Kei (20), residing in the village of Takeyama near Kamakura, were found strangled at their house. An examination Judge of the Yokohama District Court has proceeded to the place. The culprit is still at large.

Owing to the recent damage sustained in the suburbs of Tokyo, the supply of vegetables to Tokyo and Yokohama has been considerably decreased. As a result, prices have gone up remarkably, in some instances between 50 and 70 per cent. There is also a shortage in the supply of fish. The demand for poultry and beef has considerably increased in Yokohama and prices for these has accordingly risen.

The bye-election of a member of the Upper House to represent Yokohama will take place at 9 a.m. on Sept. 14th. It is thought probable that Mr. Otani Kahei will be elected.

About 4 a.m. on Saturday, a man, apparently a coolie, armed with a large knife, broke into the house of a merchant, named M. Yokomizo, Nakamura-machi, Yokohama and having frightened the occupants stole a small amount of money.

Early on the morning of Sept. 7th in Aioi-cho, Yokohama, T. Kato (20) formerly an employee of a merchant named K. Nishikata, broke into the house of the latter. The intruder attempted to murder the master of the house, his younger brother, Kamejiro (18) and an employee, K. Ozawa (25), inflicting on them severe injuries with a short sword. Subsequently he set fire to the house. The flames were put out before they could spread throughout the building. The culprit committed suicide by throwing himself into the creek near Minao-cho. About 3 a.m., his body was found near Toyokuni bridge.

K. Kato (32), a farmer from Aichi prefecture, and a woman named Matsuo Kiriyama (26) committed suicide on the morning of Sept. 7th by drinking poison in the Yawata-ro at Yairaku-cho, Yokohama. The cause is reported to have been monetary difficulties.

On Sept. 7th and 8th, rain storms were experienced at Tsukui, the district which includes the source of the Yokohama Water Works. The water of the rivers Sagami and Doshi rose about six feet and became muddy. Landslides occurred on the cliffside along the Doshi river where the main pipe of the water supply is laid. As a result the wooden scaffolding was damaged, and the pipe sustained slight damage. The repairs however, were made good through the efforts of workmen during Sunday night and the following morning. The pipe, however, is in a serious state being suspended by a one inch rope. Mr. Doi, chief secretary of the Yokohama Water Works, says that there is no anxiety as to the water supply in Yokohama. The repairs of the supplementary pipe—18 inch pipe—were impeded by the storm. The return to the ordinary supply will be accomplished very shortly.

The expenditure incurred directly and indirectly in connection with the damage which was sustained by the Yokohama Water Works during last month amounted to yen 28,946.41. Most of the expenditure having been paid, the City Assembly will merely give post facto assent.

A Chinaman named wan Foo-tai residing at No. 189, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, was arrested on Sept. 9th by the Kaga-cho police on a charge of theft. It is alleged that he stole five garments valued at thirty-three yen belonging to his friend and pawned them.

On Sept. 9th, in the criminal case of Y. Fujii, a workman of the Yokohama Dock Yard, who was charged with having attempted to obtain money—twenty-five thousand yen—from Vice-Admiral Ito, Commander-in-chief of the Tateshiki Fortress, by blackmail, and T. Katsuya, who was charged with having assisted Fujii in the alleged crime, sentence was given in the Yokohama District Court. Fujii was punished with two months' imprisonment with hard labour, a fine of four yen and six months' police surveillance, and Katsuya with four months' imprisonment with hard labour, a fine of eight yen and six months' police surveillance, in accordance with Arts 290, 394, 397 and 112 of the Penal Code.

According to a telephonic report received on Sept. 10th at the Yokohama Central Police Office, Kon Chihong-Chhan, one of the Korean workmen employed in the construction of the Yokohama Railway in the district of Tsutsuki, fell at the foot of a hill-side at 7.30 a.m. on Sept. 8th while moving materials with a track car. He was at once killed.

T. Shimokawabe, a gardener, who was undergoing trial in the Yokohama District Court on a charge of having put kerosene oil into a well in the compound of the dwelling of Mr. Kildoye, Nakamura, Yokohama, was punished on Sept. 10th. He was sentenced to two months' imprisonment with hard labour and a fine of five yen.

H. Yoshida (30) one of the crew of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's American liner Ryogun Maru fell into the sea at Yokohama while working on the deck. His corpse was found at 5 p.m. on Sept. 9th by divers.

The proposed reception to Marquis Ito, Resident-General in Korea, by the leading Yokohama citizens was fixed for September 17th or 18th in accordance with the convenience of His Excellency. Mr. Mitsuhashi, Mayor, has asked Marquis Ito to settle the date.

About 6 a.m. on Sept. 11th, a case of cholera appeared in Yokohama. The patient is a Portuguese named Anthony (37), No. 165, Yamashita-cho, whom Dr. Kusano, of Ogi-machi attended. The patient was at once removed to the Manji Hospital, where he died. Several houses surrounding the house where the case appeared were all segregated for five days. It is said that Anthony belonged to a steamer which recently arrived at Yokohama.

Messrs K. Otani and I. Wakao, the honorary secretaries, and, fifty members of the Kowa-kwai of Yokohama held a conference at 3 p.m. on Sept. 11th at the Social Club. They decided to take the necessary steps for avoiding fruitless competition among candidates for the Prefectural Assembly, the general elections to which will shortly take place. The conclusion of the Kowa-kwai was that serious competition would disturb the business of Yokohama and would cause embarrassment to the electors.

T. Eno, (40) a lithographic printer residing at Chojamachi, Yokohama, on Sept. 10th, gave himself up to the District Court and confessed that under the orders of a Chinaman named Hwanfa, he has been printing forged Shanghai lottery tickets for three years past. Subsequently the judicial officials searched his house and seized eighteen woodcuts, etc. The printer was temporarily released.

Fire broke out early on Sept. 10th at Hodo-gaya, destroying one building. The cause is not yet known.

The dead body of a soldier was found at 8 a.m. on Sept. 12th in the creek near the Grand Hotel.

A sword was stuck in the lower part of his body. The corpse was removed to the Harbour Police Office where Dr. Iwata made the usual examination. According to him the soldier seems to have attempted to commit suicide by stabbing himself and then to have thrown himself into the sea. The doctor believes that the tragedy took place about five days ago. The body was not identified but an officer of the Yokohama Gendarmery Office believes that the deceased is K. Ishijima, one of two soldiers belonging to the 60th regiment of Infantry at Narashino, who deserted on Aug. 26th.

The repairs of the Yokohama Water Works are in progress. The ordinary supply will be resumed about Sept. 17th.

Some changes were made on the Sept. 17th in the staff of the Yokohama Specie Bank. Mr. K. Ito, manager of the Peking branch, was removed to the Tientsin branch; Messrs. H. Kaite, manager of the Tientsin branch, and K. Konuki, manager of the Dairen branch, to the Yokohama office; and H. Cho, manager of the Shanghai branch, to Dairen.

Fuji Fujii, a female servant of the Sakurayama Hotel, No. 177, Bluff on the evening of Sept. 10th attempted to commit suicide by throwing herself into the sea at Kominato, Honmoku. She was saved by a passer-by. The cause is reported to have been trouble with other servants of the hotel.

YACHTING.

A fine fresh south-easterly breeze made yachting on Saturday afternoon highly enjoyable, though there were strenuous moments for the small boats, one of which was brought to grief by a puff in the harbour and had to be helped by a launch.

The 47-39 raters sailed over the Kawasaki Lightship course for a first prize presented by the Club. Three started, Mary, Kingfisher, and Riever, the latter under plain lower sail, and the others carrying gaff and jibtopsails all round. Kingfisher was nearest the line and got away thirty seconds ahead of Mary, Riever being over a minute after the gun. Reaching down the harbour Kingfisher practically held her own and as she hauled her wind passing the white light house was 26 seconds ahead of Mary and 1 m. 30s. ahead of Riever. The wind held fairly firm for the first two or three miles of the close reach to the Kawasaki Buoy, and Mary which at first lay fairly well up on the leader's lee quarter was slightly dropped and brought into the other's wake, Riever falling astern all the time. But a lightening of the breeze as they neared the buoy—it would be interesting to know the functions of the various other buoys that have turned up in the vicinity recently—enabled Mary to edge up so that when Kingfisher tacked short round the mark at 2h. 50m. 15s. (unofficial time) she was only 15 seconds out. (This run of 7 miles from the harbour entrance was done by Kingfisher in 43 minutes or just about six minutes to the mile.) Riever got up to the buoy at 2.58.45. As they progressed on the long leg to the Lightship the breeze briskened a little and the big 42½ began to drive ahead, though Mary lay a higher course, allowing doubtless for the flood tide, and perhaps the best of the wind was experienced during the last two miles of this stage. At any rate Kingfisher was able to fetch the mark with sheets slightly eased, bearing away round it at 3.36.15, 2m. 20s. ahead of Mary (3.38.35). Riever did not reach this point till 4.02.15, and could not fetch it in one tack. It was a broad reach in from the Lightship to the harbour entrance, and Kingfisher hauled her sheets aft at 3.47.15, Mary doing the same a couple of minutes later. The harbour was rather free from shipping and one long and two short legs brought the leading boats across the line but not before two accidents, both slight fortunately, had occurred. In one of the smaller gusts which so often occur in the harbour, when there is any wind to speak of, and just a few seconds before Kingfisher would have changed tacks, close to the Pier, the eye of the starboard jibtopsail sheet broke at the neck of the screw. The sail was soon smothered and stowed, however, and little time was lost on this account, especially as Mary a little later, and almost in the same water, had the yard of her topsail break half way up. Mary declared having fouled the lee mark boat at the start so that as will be seen the first and only prize falls to Kingfisher. Times:

	Start.	Finish.	Hand.	Corrected.
	h. m. s.	h. m. s.	m.	h. m. s.
Mary	2.00.51	3.57.45	4	3.53.45
Kingfisher	2.00.20	3.55.30	—	3.55.30
Riever	2.01.05	4.25.10	28	3.57.10

After the race the owner of Mary offered to match her against Kingfisher, for 500 yen a side, the best of five races, provided the latter is reduced to 39 rating. It remains to be seen whether this challenge will be accepted.

The 22 raters' race for the Formosa Cup, presented by Mr. C. S. Averill, was re-sailed over the Lightship, Widow Buoy and Quarantine Ship course. Three boats started, Aimee, Sunbeam and Chocho. Sunbeam had slightly the best of the start but Aimee soon took the lead and maintained it all round finishing, 6m. 26s. ahead of Sunbeam. As the latter, by reason of the boats having to beat down to the buoy received her full allowance of 8m. she won the prize which, it may be remembered, would have fallen to her before but for a mistake of the time keeper. Chocho was over half an hour behind the second boat. Times:—

	Start.	Finish.	Hand.	Corrected.
	h. m. s.	h. m. s.	m.	h. m. s.
Aimee	2.15.21	4.13.39	—	4.13.39
Sunbeam	2.15.20	4.20.05	8	4.12.05
Chocho	2.15.22	4.56.20	36	4.20.20

Ten Larks started and seven finished the times of the three leading boats being: No. 12, 3.38.30; No. 13, 3.40.15, and No. 11, 3.46.45.

OPERATIC STARS AT CRICKET.

To help while away the dull tedium of a Yokohama afternoon some members of the Y. C. & A. C. hit upon the idea of challenging the Bandmann Opera Company to a game of cricket. The invitation was gleefully accepted and much fun resulted. But previous to disporting themselves upon the greensward, the ladies and gentleman of the Company were entertained at tiffin in the Pavilion by a number of members of the Y. C. & A. C. Mr. J. M. Mollison, Captain of the Yokohama team, presided, having on his right Miss Georgie Corlass and on his left Miss Bailey, Mr. H. W. Kilby occupying the vice-chair with Mr. Warwick Major on his right and Miss Johnson on his left. Nearly all the Company and practically all the ladies were present, the guests and their hosts forming quite a large assembly. After an excellent lunch a few complimentary speeches were made. In proposing health and prosperity to the Bandmann Opera Company Mr. Mollison remarked that they only came to Yokohama once a year, but he wished they would come once a month. At any rate when they came against next year he hoped they would have an opportunity of meeting them again. Mr. Major replied on behalf of the Company expressing their appreciation of the hospitality extended to them. He assured their hosts that if he ever spoke crossly to members after a tedious rehearsal there was always a danger of them all going home immediately. But the expectation of coming to Yokohama kept them together. He proposed the health of the Yokohama team. Mr. H. Y. Irvine gave "The Ladies" coupled with Miss Corlass who, after much urging, made a pretty speech in reply. The hosts sang "Jolly Good Fellows" with regard to both their lady and gentlemen guests; and the latter reciprocated, the ladies doing it "on their own" so to speak and an exceedingly pleasant hour was spent, the whole party being afterwards photographed in front of the Pavilion. Of the exhibition of cricket which followed it behoves us not to write, for cricket is a serious pastime for its devotees. Thursday's performances were anything but serious and the fun ran fast and furious, even at the "tea interval," over which Miss Georgie

Corlass presided. Altogether it was an afternoon of frolic and high spirits which everybody enjoyed.

During the week the Bandmann Opera Company have given in the Public Hall, Yokohama, the following musical plays:—"The Belle of Mayfair"; "The Beauty of Bath"; "The Earl and the Girl"; "The Blue Moon"; "White Chrysanthemum"; and "Floradora." Every night the house was crowded.

CRICKET.

In these days when the visits of the British fleet to Yokohama are few and far between, it is very difficult for the Captain of Cricket to arrange Club matches possessing any degree of novelty. The alphabetical games have lost their savour, as also have Bluff and Settlement, so it was decidedly a happy notion to get up a game between Old Boys of the English public schools and the rest of the Club. The Old Boys conceded Edward and Harry Kilby to the Rest, and even then they managed to secure the best of the game, knocking up 134 runs to their opponents' 95. Towards this result Mollison contributed a well-played 72, while Bousfield made 34 and Foster 10—the others scarcely count. Among the best of the batters for The Rest were H. W. Kilby, 38, C. von Fallot 20, and W. D. S. Edwards 17. The full scores are:—

TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

The semi-annual general meeting of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha will be held at 2 p.m. on Sept. 20th at the Banker's Club, Tokyo. The accounts of the business done during the first half of this year are as follows:

	yen.
Net profit	93,644.40
Balance brought from previous accounts..	618.18
Transferred from reserve for dividend equalization	150,000.00

Of this sum, the following allotments are expected to be made: legal reserve, yen 4,700; interim dividend, yen 234,000, the rate being 12 per cent per annum; and the remainder to be carried forward to next account.

YOKOHAMA SPECIE BANK.

The fifty-fifth annual general meeting of the Yokohama Specie Bank was held on Sept. 10th. Mr. Sakamoto, a secretary of the Imperial Household, Mr. Yamazaki, a secretary of the Financial Department, and about a hundred shareholders were present. The accounts for the first half of this year were introduced to the shareholders as follows:

Gross income, including balance, yen	yen
911,147.24 brought from the previous year	12,171,077.51
Expenditure	9,266,018.79

Net income 2,905,058.72

From this profit the following allotments were made:—

Reserve	yen
Dividend: yen 6 per old, new, and second new shares; and yen 5.25 per third new share	500,000.00
Balance carried forward to next account	1,356,000.00

Mr. Takahashi, President of the bank, delivered a speech in which he said:—In March last year I was appointed by the Minister for Finance to be president of this bank in addition to my post at the Bank of Japan. Several months later, I was appointed Imperial financial agent to foreign countries. In May, this year, I returned from my mission abroad; consequently I have had no opportunity of seeing you at the general meetings in September last year and March this year. Through the efforts of the Directors and all other members of the principal offices and branches, the business of this bank has further improved in prosperity, as to which development I am much gratified.

Previous to introducing to you the detailed accounts of the business done during the first half of this year, I beg leave to give you a general financial review of home and foreign countries, as well as the business conditions of this bank. As a reaction against the extraordinary industrial promotions, and the subsequent activity in the share markets which appeared since last autumn, the financial conditions were specially changed after the middle of January. The prices of various shares all fell suddenly. Some banks were included in the trouble. Some business men who became involved in speculative business went bankrupt. Anxiety was thus felt among the public, and naturally the circulation of money was stopped in the sphere of commercial and industrial circles. Thereupon petitions were made to the Bank of Japan to extend the limit of securities and petitions were presented to the Financial authorities to relieve the trouble, all with a view to obtaining a way for better money circulation. The foregoing trouble is regarded principally as the reaction of speculative business on the stock exchanges. The leading confidential banks were all in firm condition quite aloof from the trouble, consequently no serious result was experienced. Generally speaking, the money markets throughout the country were affected by the panic which appeared this spring. Many of the banks hesitated to advance funds to various firms, which attitude created temporarily a dangerous aspect. However the depression passed away without causing any hindrance in the payments of various taxes, investments in summer stocks, the employment of funds in connexion with tea, raw silk transactions, etc. Our bank is different from other banks in its business nature. As the foreign trade since the last half of 1906 grew active our bank paid close attention to foreign drafts and invested a large sum in the business.

Turning to the foreign trade, exports exceeded imports in the first half of last year by yen 46,000,000. During the corresponding period this year, the excess in imports was increased by yen 22,000,000 over that of last year making a total exceeding yen 68,000,000. Exports amounted to 197,000,000, an increase of yen 20,000,000 over those of the corresponding period of last year. The imports amounted to yen 265,000,000, which shows an increase of yen 20,000,000. Foreign trade considerably increased. In exports, refined sugar and habutae decreased but raw silk, cotton goods, copper and cotton yarns increased. In imports, cotton yarns, flour, and woollen cloths decreased, but cotton, rice, wool, oil cake, iron, machinery, etc., specially increased. The growth of the foreign trade is attributed to the development of domestic industries and to activity in foreign markets. During the first half of this year, the exports of gold and silver amounted to over yen 8,400,000 and imports to over yen 3,000,000, making excess in exports of over yen 5,400,000.

Looking at foreign financial circles, in the last half of 1906, some difficulties were experienced in the money market of New York. An enormous amount of gold bullion was shipped from Great Britain and France in order to relieve the financial difficulty there. After this the money market of America turned favourable and at last recovered ordinary conditions so that no further foreign assistance was needed. The Bank of England therefore lowered discount rates. The discount rates in general financial markets were also lowered. The fall in discounts was slightly restored at the end of this half year, making it 3½ per cent on the average. In oriental countries, some difficulties were entertained by merchants dealing in cotton on account of the dullness in China since last year. Agricultural operations in India were successful and industry was also favourable. In Hongkong, Shanghai, Tientsin, etc., business was generally dormant and the money market was accordingly dull. In Manchuria, all things are still in an unsettled condition.

During the present period the price of silver and foreign drafts were maintained with ease, accordingly the foreign draft business of this bank made favourable progress at a suitable profit. In March this year, the Japanese government issued a 5 per cent loan amounting to £23,000,000 in England and France. Our London branch participated in the business of issuing the loan and on its success I congratulate you. Some words should be said as to the accounts of our business during the first half of this year. The net income was yen 2,003,911.48 to which the balance, yen 901,147.24, brought from the previous account was added, making a total of yen 2,905,058.72. The details are given in the statements which are submitted to you.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's chartered steamer Shinko Maru on Sept. 3rd went ashore off On-chon, Fukien, on the way from Takao, Formosa, to Yokohama. A steamer was sent by the Shanghai branch of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha to the scene. All the passengers were put on board this vessel. Most of the cargo is damaged. The cargo consists of 42,052 piculs of Formosan rice and 1,000 piculs of sugar shipped by the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, a hundred cases of tinned fruits from the Okamura Factory of Taiwan, etc. The damage is estimated at yen 260,000 in all. The ship may be saved.

An Oita telegram says that the steamer Ehime Maru on Sept. 11th went ashore at the entrance of Morie harbour. No damage was sustained.

The steamer Nagata Maru (360 tons) early on the morning of Sept. 10th grounded in the neighbourhood of Mekari, Bingo province, on the way from Kobe eastward. By the assistance of the steamer Tsukasa Maru, she was floated at noon the following day. Six hundred bags of American flour were spoiled. The damage is estimated at two thousand yen.

Owing to the storm on Sept. 9th and 10th in Hokkaido, says an official report, severe damage was caused to shipping. At Okujiri, the sailing vessel Seikai Maru was wrecked, but the crew were saved. Four sailing vessels were destroyed at Rijiri, and forty-eight of their crew are missing. Ninety men in lighters were lost at Hondomari. The sailing vessel Isami Maru was wrecked at Oniwaki, and one of the crew was drowned while another is missing. The steamer Kinai Maru went ashore off Horomushiro. The steamer Kotobira Maru (4,367 tons) met with a similar fate to that of the Kinai. The foregoing two steamers are being floated.

AQUATIC SPORTS.

The annual aquatic sports of the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club were held on Saturday afternoon off the Boat House. The officials of the day were as follows:—Judge, Mr. H. Goddard; Starter, Mr. A. L. Robinson; in charge of barge, Mr. H. Goddard; in charge of pontoon and clerk of course, Mr. J. L. Graham. There was a good attendance of spectators, including a number of ladies. Of the six events on the programme only five were brought off, the Yokohama Derby being abandoned owing to the strong tide and the unsatisfactory tugs. Some disappointment was further caused by the fact that some of those who had entered turned up late and others did not appear at all.

TOURNAMENT.—For the first item seven pairs had entered, but four men failed to appear. In the first round G. W. Gregory beat G. Neville (2-1), S. A. Vincent beat F. J. H. Stone (2-1), D. E. M. Drummond beat A. W. S. Austen (2-0), while A. Kingdon and J. L. Graham drew byes.

In the second round Gregory beat Vincent (2-0), Helm beat Drummond (2-1), Kingdon beat J. L. Graham (2-0), while Helm beat Gregory by 2 to nil.

In the final Kingdon and Helm were matched, the latter winning by 2 to nothing.

GRASSY POLE.—There were sixteen competitors in this event, namely R. G. Holmes, P. Dentici, S. A. Vincent, G. W. Gregory, A. Kingdon, D. E. M. Drummond, C. Gunn, A. Gorman, W. Scott, M. Luther, J. F. Helm, G. Neville, C. Correa, J. de Figueiredo, A. W. S. Austen, and W. Graham. The attempts of the various contestants were, as usual, very grotesque and caused great amusement. W. Graham, junior, was declared the winner.

TEAM RELAY RACE.—Three teams of seven men each entered for the team relay race, the competitors being as follows:—

"WHITE."	"RED."
D. E. M. Drummond.	A. Kingdon.
G. W. Gregory.	J. L. Graham.
G. Neville.	S. A. Vincent.
C. Gunn.	R. G. Holmes.
J. F. Helm.	F. J. H. Stone.
A. Gorman.	W. Scott.
C. Correa.	S. Hornstein.

"GREEN."

V. Church.
M. Luther.
H. Deveson.
W. Graham.
P. Dentici.
A. W. S. Austen.
J. de Figueiredo.

Gunn finished and won for the Whites and Holmes put the Reds in second place.

OBSTACLE RACE.—The competitors in the obstacle race were G. W. Gregory, R. G. Holmes, M. Luther, A. Gorman, E. Eagling, J. L. Graham, D. E. M. Drummond, C. Gunn, P. Dentici, J. de Figueiredo, and V. Church. This was of the usual character, the competitors having to swim, through life-belts, put on clothes, climb over poles, etc., and Drummond won by about three lengths from Dentici, Gunn third.

WATER POLO.—In water polo, the last event on the programme, the teams were as under:—

RED.	GOAL.	WHITE.
A. Kingdon		G. W. Gregory
J. F. Helm		P. Dentici
R. G. Holmes	Backs:	M. Luther
H. Goddard	Half-Back:	G. Neville
(Capt.)
H. Deveson		V. Church (Capt.)
C. Gunn	Forwards:	C. Mignam
S. A. Vincent		D. Drummond

Referee—Mr. A. L. Robinson.

The play was brisk and lively. Neither side scored in the first half, but in the second Vincent cleverly secured two goals for Reds, who were thus victors by 2 to 0.

Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., is the guest of the Governor of Hongkong during his stay in that Colony. He is reported to be much impressed by the palatial character of the buildings of Hongkong. In some respects Hongkong can rival Calcutta in the gorgeous arrangements of its principal business offices.

THE KARUIZAWA TENNIS TOURNAMENT.

The two August typhoons played havoc with the annual tennis tournament, as well as with other things in Karuizawa. The Gentlemen's doubles were not played off until Sept. and, as the following will show, some events were not completed at all. The annual meeting of the Athletic Association voted to push the tournament next year, hoping to complete it before the typhoons begin to blow. It will interest some to know that there will be a Class A and a Class B tournament next year.

A field day was held on Aug. 27th, and many events of the usual sort were held, interesting both to the juniors and seniors. It is safe to say that no records were broken at this first field day in Karuizawa. But so much interest was shown, and the day proved such a delightful one, that plans were made for a more comprehensive field day next season. This will undoubtedly add much to the pleasure of the season, and will give Karuizawa a unique place in Japan's summer resorts.

Under the new order of affairs, the annual general meeting of the Athletic Association was held on Aug. 22nd. The new officers and directors, who took office Sept. 1st, are as follows:—

President, Thos. H. Hadden.

Secretary, W. H. Erskine.

Treasurer, J. F. Steiner.

Directors:

Three year Term:—

M. B. Madden.

M. Coleman.

Two Year Term:—

D. A. Murray.

R. A. Thompson.

One Year Term:—

James Chappell.

W. K. Matthews.

The new Board of Directors have already made plans for next year. The tennis courts, including the two new courts, will be put in first class condition. Tape markers will be used with staples close enough to prevent tripping. The baseball field will be put into the best possible condition. Baseball was an experiment this year, but proved quite an attraction. A new department was voted to be known as the Department of General Athletics. This will include field day sports, basketball, volley ball, croquet, and possibly cricket. Mr. R. A. Thompson, with Messrs. Connolly and Warren, will have charge of the tennis department. Mr. Madden and his assistants will look out for baseball. Mr. Matthews, as this season, will have charge of the Juniors. They have never had a better time in Karuizawa than this season. There will be more fun for them next year. Mr. Coleman will provide for the afternoon teas, and plan for the excursions.

The Karuizawa Athletic Association, with its experience of a year, is wide-awake, and will do all that is possible to make the athletic interests of Karuizawa adequate for all those seeking new life and vigour.

The writer cannot close without expressing the hope that all those interested in beautiful, health-giving Karuizawa will rally to the support of this organization, and as soon as possible provide funds to purchase grounds at some central location, sufficient for all of the purposes of the organization.

CHOLERA.

Two cases of cholera appeared in Kobe on September 4th, and on the following day three suspicious cases were reported.

On Sept. 8th, three cases of cholera appeared among the crew of a Japanese sailing vessel at Kobe. Two of the patients have died.

Twenty-seven cases of cholera were reported on Sept. 8th in Yuku, a district near Okayama. One of the patients died the same day.

Cholera is still prevalent in Kobe. On Sept. 10th, thirteen new cases were reported. There have been 418 cases from the first appearance in August up to date.

MRS. HUGH FRASER ON AMERICA AND JAPAN.

There is no more interesting situation in international affairs to-day than that existing between the United States and Japan. In these days of triumphant democracy, peoples take the lead in foreign affairs, and their rulers have great difficulty in following or curbing their inclinations. In the World's Work Mrs. Mary Crawford Fraser, sister of the well-known novelist, Marion Crawford, and long a resident in Japan, writes vividly and picturesquely of the characteristics of these two peoples. The tendency of the present day is, she says, to classify; the general public insists that nationalities be listed in its primers as white or yellow or black—warlike or peaceful, commercial or artistic. Time has scarcely changed the old copy-book axioms which summed up the character of a people in a few words of light up-strokes and heavy downward ones—"The French are a gay people, fond of dancing"; "the English are gloomy and devoted to trade." To-day we Americans ask, in curiosity and alarm, "What are the Japanese?" The answer might, at this moment, be given in these words: "The Japanese are a proud people upon whom we forced our acquaintance, but to whom we are not at home when they return the call."

"Our relations with the Island Empire began with such an appearance of goodwill on our part that it is a little difficult for us to treat these people as an accident now. We have forgotten the blare of trumpets with which the invasion of Japan was accompanied, the sounding phrases which told us—and the invaded—that here was a people sitting in darkness, to whom we would bring a great light. Christian commercialism and commercial Christianity were the two forces which were to raise a sunken nation to the light of day; commerce and evangelisation were to dance hand in hand over a reclaimed and grateful country, ready to develop obediently and exclusively along the lines of convenience and advantage to its discoverers. The Japanese are at present going through the wholesome discipline of disillusionment and the effect will be lasting and profound. The truth is that America and Japan first drew together on the strength of idealised quantities which were superficial in both—gallant benevolence and disinterestedness on one side; pliability, chivalry, and romance on the other. Such a union is like the marriage of two sentimental young people who have fallen in love at first sight. There will be no lasting tie between them until they can take stock of the good qualities existing in each."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Crown Prince will leave Tokyo on Oct. 10th for Kochi prefecture.

England will make no objection to America recruiting labour in Trinidad for the Panama Canal.

The silk hat is quietly but most assuredly (says a writer) passing out of fashion, and one wonders if when the hat has gone, the trousers will next be discarded and breeches once more return into favour.

At 10 a.m. on Sept. 10th, fire broke out in the office of a Chinese printer named Feng Keng-che at Sannomiya, Kobe. The building was burned down and his wife, Yang (22) by name, lost her life.

Four officers of the railway guards in Manchuria have been arrested at Dairen on charges of dissolute conduct and other charges. They are undergoing examination by Court martial at Port Arthur.

A terrible disaster is reported from the coal mines at Hongay in Tonkin. An earthship there resulted in the death of seven miners, on August 3. Three other miners were injured seriously. An inquiry showed that the earthship was purely accidental. The mines there, says a contemporary, were developed originally by a British Company at such a loss that it had to sell out. A French Company bought up the whole concern, and has made a good thing out of the mines. A large town has sprung up at Hongay, the port is crowded, and the coal trade grows steadily.

Motoring in Switzerland and some parts of Germany this year has been rendered very disagreeable by the hostility of the country folk, who pile boulders in the roads and fling stones and clubs at the passing cars.

Ten Chinamen and a Japanese woman were arrested on Sept. 9th in Tsukiji, Tokyo, in connexion with the forgery of Shanghai lottery tickets. The judicial authorities searched their houses and seized several varieties of evidence.

Berlin authorities have ordered the book by Mr. Upton Sinclair, entitled "The Industrial Republic," published by William Heinemann, London, to be confiscated, in pursuance of the law concerning insults to the German Emperor.

A Hongkong telegram says that Adsetts who murdered a foreign woman and carried her body on board the Monteagle in a trunk, is still detained on the American warship Galveston. He refuses to leave the ship. Probably he will be re-arrested in British territory.

A dredging vessel constructed at the Osaka Iron Works for the Sasebo Naval Dockyard, which was launched the other day, underwent her trials on Sept. 6th outside Osaka Harbour, when it was demonstrated that 400 tons per hour could be dredged as against an estimated 300 tons. The vessel is 154 feet long, 31 feet beam, and 12 feet deep.

We are informed by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails that it has been arranged that from the 1st inst, letters and postal cards only may be forwarded by the Siberian route to all the countries of Europe except Russia where any kind of mail matter may be sent as before.

It is to be noted, however, that such mail matter, if to be sent by the Siberian route, should bear the superscription "via Siberia."

Sentence was passed on Sept. 10th in the Tokyo District Court, in the criminal case of T. Matsunaga, S. Shinokubo, and T. Baba, of the Yiji news agency, Tokyo, who were charged with having attempted to obtain yen 1,500 from the Nippon Sugar Refining Co. by fraud. Matsunaga and Shinokubo were sentenced to four and six months' imprisonments with hard labour respectively. They were also punished with a fine. Baba was acquitted on the ground that the evidence against him was insufficient.

The Kobe Herald of Sept. 9th states that exceptionally high waves were experienced in the harbour and the vicinity from 6 to 8 p.m. on Saturday evening. At Wada Point, the phenomenon was especially marked, and launches and other small vessels anchoring there all took refuge in the inside of the western hatoba while the quarantine ship had to seek shelter in Hiogo harbour. Except in the case of large steamers, the quarantine examination had to be made after the ships had entered the harbour. There were also remarkably high waves at the mouth of the Shin-ikutagawa. Thirteen fishing boats, which were being beached there, were nearly washed away, but were eventually moved into a place of safety by the efforts of the Water Police. A shed on the western shore of the river, in which a fisherman was living, was carried away, but the occupant fortunately escaped. Several houses in the neighbourhood were flooded. The people in the vicinity feared that a tidal wave was coming, and many of them took refuge elsewhere, as did also an officer of the Kobe Customs. According to information given by the Kobe Meteorological Observatory, the phenomenon was probably caused by the conjunction of a full tide and high wind, as there has not been any shock of earthquake in the neighbourhood.

A Peking dispatch states that H.I.M. Kuang Hsi is suffering from a chronic illness of blood-spitting. The Emperor refuses to see any member of the Imperial College of Physicians but he has been writing out a daily description of his ailments from which the College is expected to make out prescriptions for the Imperial patient.

According to a report which was published on Sept. 9th by the American Bureau of Agricultural Affairs, the yield of cotton this year in America is estimated at 72.7, while that of 1906 was 77.3, and that of 1905 72.1. Cotton ginned from the first crop to Sept. 1st was 191,000 bales only. That of the previous year in the corresponding period was 403,207 bales, and that of 1905, 469,600 bales. The reason why the quantity raised is so small is that the season is generally late. Prices have fallen by one yen on an average.

Notice is given that the Light from Ishikari Lighthouse on the west bank of the mouth of the Ishikari River will be withdrawn on the 7th of this month (September) for rebuilding, and at the same time a temporary Light will be exhibited as follows:—Position, at a distance of 117 feet N. 50° W. from the former Lighthouse. Height of Light:—30 feet from the base, and 38 feet about the water. Character of Light:—Fixed White Light. Illuminated Arc:—same as previous. Distance visible:—6 nautical miles in clear weather.

On Sept. 6th, five Chinamen and two Japanese were arrested in Tokyo on a charge of having counterfeited tickets of the Shanghai lottery and sold them in Tokyo and Yokohama during three years past. Subsequently judicial officials searched the houses of the defendants and seized the printing machines, copper plates and wooden cuts as well as lithographs, and forged lottery tickets. On the same day, four Chinese and two Japanese were arrested in Yokohama in connexion with the same charge and similar seizures were made. It is said that the money which was realized by the counterfeiters amounted to half a million yen.

A number of foreign residents of Kobe and Yokohama and not a few Japanese assembled at the Osaka Iron Works' Shipbuilding Yard said the Kobe Herald of Sept. 6th, to witness the launch of the steamer Tora Maru, which has been built for the Standard Oil Co. When the vessel left the ways she was named by Mr. E. K. Morgan, of the Standard Oil Co.'s Yokohama Office, who came down from the northern port for the sole purpose of attending the function. The launch was a complete success in every way. The Tora Maru is a screw steamer of upwards of 500 tons and some 190 or 200 feet in length. She is the first oil tank steamer built in this country if we mistake not.

M. Widin, a Russian postal official, who was recently arrested at the village of Iriarai, in Omori, is still detained at the Ichigaya Jail, Tokyo, with his wife. The Japanese judicial authorities have examined him several times with a view to ascertaining the real facts of the charge against him before delivering him to the Russian Government. The Nichi Nichi says that the accused's true name is Dantury. He was engaged at the Vladivostok Post Office before the late disturbances, and later he was removed to the Habarovsk Post Office as assistant Post Master. During the absence of the director, M. Dantury is alleged to have stolen a parcel containing 100,000 roubles and valuable documents. After his escape from Habarovsk the theft was discovered.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TEACHING OF ENGLISH IN MIDDLE SCHOOLS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR.—The unsatisfactory results of English teaching in the middle schools have often elicited comments from foreign teachers of the language. Perhaps my views on the subject will be of some interest to them as well as to your readers, for I am one of those who are now called the Eigo-no-Sensei with civil scorn and who are held entirely responsible for whatever defect is observable in the young students of English.

The first complaint made against the graduates of the middle schools is that they do not know even simple words and common phrases. It is one thing to designate a word or a phrase as simple or common, but it is another thing to ascertain the approximate number of every-day words and phrases in any one language. Now I challenge the foreign complainants by asking whether they have ever taken the trouble to count what they simply call simple words, and common phrases. Unless I greatly err, a Japanese student must learn at least 5,000 words to be able to understand common English books. Nor is this all. These words in daily use have very often more than one meaning, and what is more, they combine with one another in a wondrous way in form idiomatic phrases. Do the foreign fault-finders really think that this legion-like number of words and phrases are to be learned distinctly and accurately in five years under the present system of education? If they do, they overestimate the memorizing power of an average middle school student. Any sensible person who has had personal experience of studying a foreign language entirely different from his own will think otherwise.

The second complaint is that the Japanese students are not quick at catching the English sounds and their pronunciation is horrible. I am candid enough to admit that this is the case and that we Eigo-no-Sensei are largely responsible for this defect on the part of the students. Is the price of a battle-ship or two, then, to be turned over to the Educational Department to remedy this defect, as your contributor Kobu Gakko suggests in your late issue? He seems to mean that if foreign teachers were to take their place in every middle school, great progress would be made in the practical side of English. So it would be if they were fully equipped with a working knowledge of Japanese and behaved so as not to make themselves ridiculous or objectionable in the eyes of their students. But where are we to procure a large supply of such competent teachers? Supposing they were to be found, is the mastery of the so-called practical English so beneficial and indispensable as to be bought at the price of a battle-ship or two at the present time of financial embarrassment?

If so Japan would do well to have the number of her battle-ships reduced by one or two. But the foreign critics must remember that it is the lot of very few of the Middle School boys to put their English to practical test. Disuse means rusting. However thoroughly they were crammed with everyday expressions while at school, they would soon find their labour thrown away. Besides the foreign critics forget that Japanese resemble John Bull in this respect, that they are generally poor linguists. If need be, they will dare to speak English in a horrible manner with the same desperation as many Englishmen or Americans must feel when they say, "Wakareushi anata takusan suki arimasu." But while in this country, there is very little need of English in intercourse, they are too shy and proud to distort their faces for the sake of parrot-talk.

Would it not, then, be much more advisable to teach the Middle School boys so as to understand the fundamental rules of English grammar and to be able to read common English? If the graduates of the Middle Schools who are now at the High Schools do not know the meaning of simple words and common phrases, and understand even simple rules of grammar, as Kobu Gakko declares, how much more so should they be when they get their mouths and ears trained by foreign teachers only. I confess that when I attended Dr. Ladd's lecture at Osaka, I could not catch what he said half so well as his excellent interpreter Dr. Harada did, yet I am very happy to think that I could read his lectures without difficulty and derived not a little good from them. Is this much not enough for most of the Japanese students of English? In short, it is good for the Middle School boys that they should be taught English so that, when they are grown up, they may read the good English books within their intellectual capacity with the aid of a dictionary; and this is not so difficult, as it would seem to foreigners.

Thanking you in anticipation for giving my letter place in your columns,

I remain, Yours faithfully

J. KURASAKI,
Ibaraki Middle School, Osaka.

TRAITE DE COMMERCE ET DE NAVIGATION ENTRE LE JAPON ET LA RUSSIE.

Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon et Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, animés d'un égal désir de développer les relations commerciales entre les deux pays, ont résolu, conformément aux dispositions de l'Article XII du Traité de Paix signé à Portsmouth, de conclure un Traité de Commerce et de Navigation sur les bases de l'équité et de l'intérêt mutuel, et ont nommé à cet effet, pour Leurs Plénipotentiaires, savoir :

Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon :
Hélrod Motono, Docteur en Droit, Son Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire près Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies ; et Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies :
Le Maître de Sa Cour Alexandre Iswolsky, Ministre des Affaires Etrangères.

L'Ecuyer de Sa Cour Dmitri Philosphow, Ministre du Commerce et de l'Industrie, Membre du Conseil de l'Empire, ■

Le Maître de Sa Cour Nicolas Malévsky-Malévitch, Sénateur ;

Lesquels, après s'être communiqué leurs pleins pouvoirs, trouvés en bonne et due forme, ont arrêté et conclu les Articles suivants :

Art. I.—Les sujets de chacune des deux Hautes Parties Contractantes auront toute liberté, en se conformant aux lois du pays, d'entrer, de voyager ou de résider en un lieu quelconque du territoire de l'autre, et y jouiront d'une pleine et entière protection pour leurs personnes et leurs propriétés.

Ils auront un accès libre et facile aux tribunaux pour la poursuite ou la défense de leurs droits ; ils auront, sur le même pied que les sujets du pays, la faculté de choisir ■ d'employer des avocats, des avoués et des mandataires afin de poursuivre et de défendre leurs droits devant ces tribunaux, et quant aux autres matières qui se rapportent à l'administration de la justice, ils jouiront de tous les droits et privilèges dont jouissent les sujets du pays.

Pour tout ce qui concerne le droit de résidence et de voyage, la possession des biens et effets mobiliers, de quelle espèce que ce soit, la transmission des biens mobiliers par succession testamentaire ou autre, et ■ droit de disposer, de quelque manière que ce soit, des biens de toutes sortes qu'ils peuvent légalement acquérir, les sujets de chacune des deux Parties Contractantes jouiront dans le territoire de l'autre des mêmes privilèges, libertés et droits, et ne seront soumis, sous ce rapport, à aucuns impôts ou charges plus élevés que les sujets du pays ou les sujets ou citoyens de la nation la plus favorisée.

Les sujets de chacune des Parties Contractantes jouiront, dans le territoire de l'autre, d'une liberté entière de conscience, et pourront, en se conformant aux lois, ordonnances et règlements, se livrer à l'exercice privé ou public de leur culte ; ils jouiront aussi du droit d'inhumer ou de brûler les corps de leurs nationaux respectifs, suivant leurs coutumes religieuses, dans des lieux convenables et appropriés qui seront établis et entretenus à cet effet.

Il est entendu qu'en tout ce qui concerne l'agriculture, le droit de propriété sur les biens immobiliers et la détention de terres sous un autre titre quelconque, les sujets japonais en Russie et les sujets russes au Japon jouiront du même traitement que les sujets ou citoyens de la nation la plus favorisée.

Ils ne seront contraints, sous aucun prétexte, à payer des charges ou taxes autres ou plus élevées que celles qui sont ou seront imposées aux sujets du pays en aux sujets ou citoyens de la nation la plus favorisée.

Les sujets de chacune des Parties Contractantes qui résident dans le territoire de l'autre ne seront astreints à aucun service militaire obligatoire, soit dans l'armée ou la marine, soit dans la garde nationale ou la milice ; ils seront exempts de toutes contributions imposées en lieu et place du service personnel et de tous emprunts forcés, de toutes exactions ou de contributions militaires.

La dite exemption ne comprend pas les charges qui sont attachées à la possession d'un bien-fonds, ni les prestations et réquisitions militaires auxquelles les sujets du pays peuvent être appelés à se soumettre comme propriétaires, fermiers, locataires ou détenteurs d'immeubles.

Art. II.—Il y aura, entre les territoires des deux Hautes Parties Contractantes, liberté réciproque de commerce et de navigation.

Les sujets de chacune des Parties Contractantes pourront en quelque lieu que ce soit du territoire de l'autre, exercer, en se conformant aux lois, règlements et ordonnances du pays, toute espèce d'industrie ou de métier, faire le commerce en gros ou en détail de tous produits, objets fabriqués et marchandises de commerce licite, soit en personne, soit par leurs représentants, tant seuls qu'en société avec des étrangers ou des sujets du pays ; ils pourront y posséder ou louer et occuper des maisons et des magasins, louer des terrains à l'effet d'y résider ou d'y exercer une profession, le tout en se conformant aux lois, aux règlements de police et de douane du pays, comme les nationaux eux-mêmes.

Ils auront pleine liberté de se rendre avec leurs navires et leurs cargaisons dans tous les lieux, ports, rivières du territoire de l'autre qui sont ou pourront être ouverts au commerce étranger, et ils jouiront respectivement, en matière de commerce et de navigation, du même traitement que les sujets du pays, sans avoir à payer aucuns impôts, taxes ou droits de quelque nature ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des fonctionnaires publics, des particuliers, des corporations ou établissements quelconques, autres ou plus élevés que ceux imposés aux sujets du pays.

Il est toutefois entendu que les stipulations contenues dans cet Article ainsi que dans l'Article précédent ne dérogent en rien aux lois, ordonnances et règlements spéciaux en matière de commerce, d'industrie, de métier, de profession, de propriété, de police, de sécurité et de santé publiques qui sont ou qui pourront être en vigueur dans chacun des deux pays et applicables à tous les étrangers en général.

Art. III.—Les habitations, magasins et boutiques des sujets de chacune des Hautes Parties Contractantes dans le territoire de l'autre, ainsi que les édifices qui en dépendent, servant soit à la demeure, soit au commerce, soit à l'industrie, seront respectés.

Il ne sera pas permis de procéder à des perquisitions ou visites domiciliaires dans ces habitations et édifices, ou bien d'examiner ou d'inspecter les livres, papiers ou comptes, sauf dans les conditions et formes prescrites par les lois, ordonnances et règlements applicables aux sujets du pays.

Art. IV.—Il ne sera imposé à l'importation dans le territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies de tous articles produits ou fabriqués dans le territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, de quelque endroit qu'ils viennent, et à l'importation dans le territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, de tous articles produits ou fabriqués dans le territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, de quelque endroit qu'ils viennent, aucuns droits autres ou plus élevés que ceux imposés sur les articles similaires produits ou fabriqués dans tout autre pays étranger.

Aucune prohibition ne sera maintenue ou imposée sur l'importation dans le territoire de l'une des Parties Contractantes d'un article quelconque produit ou fabriqué dans le territoire de l'autre, de quelque endroit qu'il vienne, à moins que cette prohibition ne soit également appliquée à l'importation des articles similaires produits ou fabriqués dans tout autre pays. Cette dernière disposition n'est pas applicable aux prohibitions sanitaires ou autres provenant de la nécessité de protéger la santé des personnes ainsi que la conservation du bétail et des plantes utiles à l'agriculture.

Art. V.—Il ne sera imposé dans le territoire de chacune des Hautes Parties Contractantes, à l'exportation d'un article quelconque à destination du territoire de l'autre, aucuns droits ou charges autres ou plus élevés que ceux qui sont ou seront payables à l'exportation des articles similaires à destination d'un autre pays étranger quel qu'il soit ; de même, aucune prohibition ne sera imposée à l'exportation d'aucun article du territoire de l'une des Parties Contractantes à destination du territoire de l'autre, sans que cette prohibition ne soit également étendue à l'exportation des articles similaires à destination de tout autre pays.

Art. VI.—Les sujets des Hautes Parties Contractantes jouiront, dans le territoire de l'autre, d'un traitement parfaitement égal à celui des sujets ou citoyens de la nation la plus favorisée, en tout ce qui concerne les droits de transit, le magasinage, les primes, les facilités et les drawbacks.

Art. VII.—Tous les articles qui sont ou pourront être légalement importés dans les ports du territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, sur des navires japonais, pourront, de même, être importés dans ces ports sur des navires russes ; dans ce cas, ces articles n'auront à payer aucuns droits ou charges, de quelque dénomination que ce soit, autres ou plus élevés que ceux imposés sur les mêmes articles importés par des navires japonais. Réciproquement, tous les articles qui sont ou pourront être légalement importés dans les ports du territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, sur des navires russes, pourront, de même, être importés dans ces ports sur des navires japonais ; dans ce cas, ces articles n'auront à payer aucuns droits ou charges, de quelque dénomination que ce soit, autres ou plus élevés que ceux imposés sur les mêmes articles importés par des navires russes. Cette égalité réciproque de traitement sera accordée indistinctement, soit que ces articles viennent directement des pays d'origine, soit qu'ils viennent de tout autre lieu.

De la même manière, il y aura parfaite égalité de traitement relativement à l'exportation ; ainsi, les mêmes droits d'exportation seront payés, et les mêmes primes et drawbacks seront accordés, dans les territoires de chacune des Hautes Parties Contractantes, sur l'exportation de tout article qui est ou pourra être légalement exporté, que cette exportation ait lieu sur des navires japonais ou sur des navires russes et quel que soit le lieu de destination, qu'il soit un des ports de chacune des Parties Contractantes ou un des ports d'une Puissance tierce.

Art. VIII.—Aucun droit de tonnage, de port, de pilotage, de phare, de débarquement ou autres droits similaires ou analogues de quelque nature ou sous quelque dénomination que ce soit, levés au nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des fonctionnaires publics, des particuliers, des corporations ou des établissements de toutes sortes qui ne seraient également et sous les mêmes dans ports des territoires de chacun des deux pays, sur les navires de l'autre. Cette égalité de traitement sera appliquée réciproquement aux navires respectifs de quelque endroit qu'ils arrivent et que soit le lieu de destination.

Art. IX.—En tout ce qui concerne le placement, le chargement et le déchargement des navires, dans les bassins, docks, rades, havres ou rivières de l'un des deux pays, aucun privilège ne sera accordé aux navires nationaux, qui ne serait également accordé aux navires de l'autre l'intention des Hautes Parties Contractantes étant que, sous ce rapport aussi, les navires respectifs soient traités sur le pied d'une parfaite égalité.

Art. X.—Le cabotage dans les territoires de l'une ou de l'autre des Hautes Parties Contractantes est excepté des dispositions du présent Traité, et sera régi par lois, ordonnances et règlements du Japon et de la Russie respectivement. Il est toutefois entendu que les sujets japonais dans le territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies et les sujets russes dans le territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, jouiront, sous ce rapport, des droits qui sont ou pourront être accordés par ces lois, ordonnances et règlements aux sujets ou citoyens de tout autre pays.

Tout navire japonais chargé à l'étranger d'une cargaison destinée à deux ou plusieurs ports du territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, et tout navire russe chargé à l'étranger d'une cargaison destinée à deux ou plusieurs ports du territoire de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, pourra décharger une partie de sa cargaison dans un port et continuer son voyage pour l'autre ou les autres ports de destination ou le commerce étranger est autorisé, dans le but d'y décharger le reste de sa cargaison d'origine, en se conformant toujours aux lois et aux règlements de douane des deux pays.

Art. XI.—Tout vaisseau de guerre ou navire de commerce de l'une ou de l'autre des Hautes Parties Contractantes qui serait forcé par un mauvais temps ou par suite de tout autre danger de s'abriter dans un port de l'autre aura la liberté de s'abriter dans un port de l'autre, aura la liberté de s'y faire réparer, de s'y procurer toutes les provisions nécessaires et de reprendre la mer, sans payer d'autres charges que celles qui seraient payées par les navires nationaux. Dans les cas, cependant, où le capitaine, ou le capitaine du navire de commerce se trouverait dans la nécessité de vendre une partie de sa cargaison pour payer les frais, il sera obligé de se conformer aux règlements et tarifs du lieu où il aurait relâché.

Si un vaisseau de guerre ou un navire de commerce de l'une des Parties Contractantes a échoué sur les côtes de l'autre, les autorités locales en informeront le Consul-Général, le Consul, le Vice-Consul ou l'Agent Consulaire du district le plus voisin.

Toutes les opérations relatives au sauvetage des navires japonais naufragés ou échoués dans les eaux territoriales de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies auront lieu, conformément aux lois, ordonnances et règlements de la Russie et, réciproquement, toutes les mesures de sauvetage relatives aux navires russes naufragés ou échoués dans les eaux territoriales de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon auront lieu conformément aux lois, ordonnances et règlements du Japon.

Tous navires ou vaisseaux ainsi échoués ou naufragés, tous débris et accessoires, toutes fournitures leur appartenant et tous effets et marchandises sauvés desdits navires ou vaisseaux, y compris ceux qui auraient été jetés à la mer ou les produits desdits objets, s'ils sont vendus, ainsi que tous papiers trouvés à bord de ces navires ou vaisseaux échoués ou naufragés, seront remis aux propriétaires ou à leurs représentants, quand ils les réclameront. Dans le cas où ces propriétaires ou représentants ne se trouveraient pas sur les lieux, lesdits produits ou objets seront remis aux Consul-Généraux, Consuls, Vice-Consuls ou Agents Consulaires respectifs, sur leur réclamation, dans le délai fixé par les lois du pays, et ces officiers consulaires, propriétaires ou représentants payeront seulement les dépenses occasionnées pour la conservation desdits objets ainsi que les frais de sauvetage ou autres dépenses auxquels seraient soumis, en cas de naufrage, les navires nationaux.

Les effets et marchandises sauvés du naufrage seront exempts de tous droits de douane, à moins qu'ils n'entrent à la douane pour la consommation intérieure, auquel cas ils payeront les droits ordinaires.

Dans le cas où un navire appartenant aux sujets d'une des Parties Contractantes ferait naufrage ou échouerait sur le territoire de l'autre, les Consuls-Generaux, Consuls, Vice-Consuls ou Agents Consulaires respectifs seront, si le propriétaire, capitaine ou autre représentant est absent, ou étant présent le demandeur, autorisés à intervenir à l'effet de prêter l'assistance nécessaire à nationaux.

Art. XII.—Tous les navires qui, conformément aux lois japonaises, sont considérés comme navires japonais, et tous les navires qui, conformément aux lois russes, sont considérés comme navires russes, seront respectivement considérés comme navires japonais et russes pour le but de ce Traité.

Les certificats de jaugeage, devus par l'une des Parties Contractantes, seront reconnus par l'autre d'après des arrangements spéciaux à convenir entre elles.

Art. XIII.—Si un marin deserte d'un vaisseau de commerce appartenant à l'une ou l'autre des Hautes Parties Contractantes sur le territoire de l'autre, les autorités locales seront tenues de prêter toute l'assistance en leur pouvoir pour l'arrestation et la remise de ce deserteur, sur la demande qui leur sera adressée par le Consul du pays auquel appartient le navire ou vaisseau ou par le représentant dudit Consul.

Il est entendu que cette stipulation ne s'appliquera aux sujets du pays où la description a eu lieu.

Art. XIV.—Les Hautes Parties Contractantes conviennent qu'en tout ce qui concerne le commerce, la navigation, l'industrie et les métiers, tous les privilèges, faveurs ou immunités que l'une ou l'autre des Parties Contractantes a déjà accordés ou accordera à l'avenir au Gouvernement, aux navires ou aux sujets ou citoyens de tout autre Etat, seront étendus immédiatement et sans condition au Gouvernement, aux navires ou aux sujets de l'autre Partie Contractante, leur intention étant que le commerce, la navigation et l'industrie de chaque pays soient placés, à tous égards, par l'autre, sur le pied de la nation la plus favorisée.

Art. XV.—Chacune des Hautes Parties Contractantes pourra nommer des Consuls-Generaux, Consuls, Vice-Consuls et Agents Consulaires dans tous les ports, villes et places de l'autre, sauf dans les localités où il y aurait inconvénient à admettre de tels officiers consulaires.

Cette exception ne sera cependant pas faite à l'égard de l'une des Parties Contractantes, sans l'être également à l'égard de toutes les autres Puissances.

Les Consuls-Generaux, Consuls et Agents Consulaires pourront, à charge de réciprocité, exercer toutes leurs fonctions ■ jourir de tous les privilèges, exemptions, immunités et pouvoirs qui sont ou seront accordés à l'avenir aux officiers consulaires de la nation la plus favorisée.

Les organes des représentations diplomatiques et les consuls de carrière qui seront envoyés en Russie par le Gouvernement japonais, ainsi que les fonctionnaires y appartenant, jouiront, à titre de réciprocité, d'une liberté pleine et entière vis-à-vis de la censure tant pour les journaux et publications périodiques, que pour les produits des sciences, des arts et des littératures.

Art. XVI.—Les sujets de chacune des Hautes Parties Contractantes jouiront, sur le territoire de la même protection que les sujets du pays relativement aux brevets, marques de fabrique et dessins, en remplissant les formalités prescrites par la loi.

Les deux Parties Contractantes s'engagent d'entrer aussitôt que possible en pourparlers dans le but de conclure une convention spéciale, sur la base de la réciprocité, concernant la protection respectue de la propriété industrielle et commerciale.

Art. XVII.—Le présent Traité entrera en vigueur deux mois après l'échange des ratifications et restera valable jusqu'à ce qu'il finisse de la manière indiquée ci-dessous.

L'une ou l'autre des Hautes Parties Contractantes aura le droit, après le dix-septième jour du septième mois de la quarante-troisième année de Meiji, correspondant au quatriè (dix-sept) juillet de l'an mil neuf cent dix, de notifier à l'autre son intention de mettre fin au présent Traité, et, à l'expiration de douze mois après cette notification, ce Traité cessera et finira entièrement.

Art. XVIII.—Le présent Traité sera ratifié et les ratifications en seront échangées à Tokio le plus tôt possible, et en tout cas pas plus tard que quatre mois après sa signature.

En foi de quoi les Plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé et scellé de leurs sceaux le présent Traité.

Fait à Saint-Petersbourg, le vingt huitième jour du septième mois de la quarantième année de Meiji, correspondant au quinze (vingt huit) juillet de l'an mil neuf cent sept.

ARTICLES SEPARÉS.

Il est entendu que les réserves suivantes ne sont pas censées déroger au présent Traité en tant qu'exceptionnelles et indépendantes des règles généralement appliquées au commerce et relations extérieurs :

les diées réserves ne peuvent en aucun cas être invoquées au préjudice des principes du traitement national et de celui de la nation la plus favorisée, établi par le présent Traité sauf pour les exceptions ci-dessous indiquées :

DE LA PART DU JAPON.

Art. I.—Les dispositions concernant les relations spéciales entre le Japon et la Corée relativement au commerce, à l'industrie et à la navigation.

Art. II.—Les dispositions relatives au commerce entre le Japon et les pays voisins du Japon dans l'Asie orientale, situés à l'est du détroit de Malacca.

Art. III.—Le monopole sur quelque article que ce soit que le Gouvernement du Japon pourrait se réserver.

DE LA PART DE LA RUSSIE :

Art. I.—Les faveurs actuellement accordées ou qui pourraient être accordées ultérieurement à des états limitrophes pour faciliter le trafic local d'une zone frontrière s'étendant jusqu'à 50 verstes de largeur.

Art. II.—Les faveurs actuellement accordées ou qui pourraient être accordées ultérieurement, relativement à l'importation ou l'exportation, aux habitants du Gouvernement d'Arkhangel, ainsi que pour les côtes septentrionales de la Russie d'Asie (Sibirie).

Art. III.—Les stipulations spéciales contenues dans le traité la Russie et la Suède et la Norvège du 26 avril 1858.

Art. IV.—Les dispositions qui se rapportent au commerce de la Russie avec les pays limitrophes de l'Asie.

Art. V.—La franchise dont jouissent les navires construits en Russie et appartenant à des sujets russes, lesquels pendant les trois premières années sont exempts des droits de navigation.

Art. VI.—Les immunités accordées en Russie à différentes compagnies de plaisance dites Yacht-Clubs.

Art. VII.—Le monopole sur quelque article que ce soit que le Gouvernement de Russie pourrait se réserver.

Les présents Articles Separés auront la même force et valeur que s'ils étaient insérés mot pour mot dans le Traité de ce jour. Ils seront ratifiés et les ratifications en seront échangées en même temps.

En foi de quoi les Plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé et scellé de leurs sceaux les présents Articles Separés.

CONVENTION DE PÊCHE.

ENTRE LE JAPON ET LA RUSSIE.

Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon et Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, ayant pour but de conclure une convention de pêche conformément à la disposition de l'Article XI du Traité de paix conclu à Portsmouth le cinquième jour du neuvième mois de la trente huitième année de Meiji, correspondant au vingt trois Août (cinq Septembre) 1905, ont nommé pour Leurs Plénipotentiaires, savoir :

Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon : Ichiro Motono, Docteur en droits, Son Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire près Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies ; et Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies : Le Maître de Sa Cour Alexandre Iswolsky, Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, et Son Conseiller Privé Constantin Goubastoff, Adjoint du Ministre des Affaires Etrangères ;

Lesquels, après s'être communiqué leurs pleins pouvoirs respectifs trouvés en bonne et due forme, ont conclu les Articles suivants :

Art. I.—Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie concède aux sujets japonais, conformément aux dispositions de la présente Convention, le droit de pêcher, de prendre et de préparer toutes espèces de poissons et produits aquatiques, sauf les phoques à fourrure et les loutres marines, le long des côtes russes des Mers du Japon, d'Okhotsk et de Behring, à l'exception des fleuves et des anses (inlets). Les anses, faisant l'objet de l'exception ci-dessus, se trouvent énumérées dans l'Article I du Protocole ci-joint.

Art. II.—Les sujets japonais sont autorisés à se livrer à la pêche et à la préparation des poissons ■ produits aquatiques dans les lots de pêche spécialement destinés à ce but, s'étendant tant en mer que sur les côtes, qui seront vendus à bail aux enchères publiques sans aucune distinction entre les sujets japonais et russes, soit que ce bail soit à long terme, soit qu'il soit à court terme ; les sujets japonais jouiront sous ce rapport des mêmes droits que les sujets russes ayant acquis les lots de pêches dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la présente Convention.

Les dates et les lieux désignés pour ces enchères, ainsi que les détails nécessaires relatifs aux baux des différents lots de pêche à vendre, seront officiellement notifiés au Consul japonais à Vladivostok au moins deux mois avant les enchères.

La pêche des baleines et des morues ainsi que de tous les poissons et produits aquatiques dont la pêche ne peut se faire dans les lots spéciaux est autorisée aux sujets japonais sur des bâtiments de mer munis d'un permis spécial.

Art. III.—Les sujets japonais qui auront acquis à bail des lots de pêche conformément aux dispositions de l'Article II. de la présente Convention, auront, dans les limites de ces lots, le droit de faire librement usage des côtes, qui leur ont été concédées pour l'exercice de leur industrie de pêche. Ils pourront y faire des réparations nécessaires à leurs barques et filets, tirer ces derniers à terre et débarquer leurs poissons et produits aquatiques, y saler, sécher, préparer et éminagasser leurs pêches et cueillettes. Dans ces bails ils auront la liberté d'y construire des bâtiments, magasins, tabarnes et sécheries ; ou de les déplacer.

Art. IV.—Les sujets japonais et les sujets russes, qui ont acquis des lots de pêche dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la présente Convention, devront être traités sur le pied d'égalité en tout ce qui concerne les impôts ou taxes, qui sont ou seront levés sur le droit de pêche et de préparation des produits de la pêche et le matériel meuble et immeuble nécessaire à cette industrie.

Art. V.—Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie ne percevra aucuns droits sur les poissons et produits aquatiques pêchés ou pris dans les Provinces du Littoral et de l'Amour, soit que ces poissons et produits aquatiques fussent manufactures, soit qu'ils ne le fussent pas, lorsqu'ils seront destinés à être exportés au Japon.

Art. VI.—Aucune restriction ne sera établie à l'égard de la nationalité des personnes employées par les sujets japonais dans la pêche ou dans la préparation des poissons et produits aquatiques dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la présente Convention.

Art. VII.—En ce qui concerne le mode de préparation des poissons et produits aquatiques, ■ Gouvernement Impérial de Russie s'engage à ne pas imposer aux sujets japonais de restrictions spéciales dont seraient exemptés les sujets russes ayant acquis des lots de pêche dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la présente Convention.

Art. VIII.—Les sujets japonais qui auront acquis le droit de pêche pourront se rendre directement soit du Japon aux lieux de pêche, soit des dits lieux au Japon, sur les bâtiments munis d'un certificat délivré au Japon par le Consulat russe compétent, ainsi que d'un certificat de santé délivré par les autorités japonaises.

Les dits bâtiments seront autorisés à transporter, sans impôts ni taxes, d'un lieu de pêche à un autre les personnes et les objets nécessaires de la pêche, ainsi que les produits de pêche et cueillettes ; les bâtiments susmentionnés devront, sous tous les autres rapports, se soumettre aux lois russes de cabotage actuellement en vigueur ou qui seront édictées dans la suite.

Art. IX.—Les sujets japonais et russes, qui auront acquis des lots de pêche dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la présente Convention, seront placés sur le pied d'égalité par rapport aux lois, règlements et ordonnances actuellement en vigueur ou qui seraient édictés à l'avenir concernant la pisciculture et la protection des poissons et des produits aquatiques, le contrôle de l'industrie y relatif et toute autre matière se rapportant à la pêche.

Il sera donné connaissance au Gouvernement japonais des lois et règlements nouvellement édictés au moins six mois avant leur mise en application.

Quant aux ordonnances nouvellement établies, connaissance en sera donnée au Consul japonais à Vladivostok au moins deux mois avant leur mise en vigueur.

Art. X.—En ce qui concerne les matières qui ne sont pas spécialement désignées dans la présente Convention, mais qui se rapportent à l'industrie de la pêche dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la dite Convention, les sujets japonais seront traités sur le même pied que les sujets russes qui auront acquis des lots de pêche dans les régions susmentionnées.

Art. XI.—Les sujets japonais pourront se livrer à la préparation des poissons et produits aquatiques dans les lots fonciers qui leur seront loués en dehors des régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la présente Convention, le tout en se soumettant aux lois, règlements et ordonnances qui sont ou qui pourront être en vigueur et applicables à tous les étrangers en Russie.

Art. XII.—Le Gouvernement Impérial du Japon, en considération des droits de pêche accordés par le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie aux sujets japonais en vertu de la présente Convention, s'engage à ne frapper d'aucuns droits d'importation les poissons et produits aquatiques pêchés ou pris dans les Provinces du Littoral et de l'Amour, soit que ces poissons et produits aquatiques fussent manufactures, soit qu'ils ne le fussent pas.

Art. XIII.—La présente Convention restera en vigueur pendant douze ans. Elle sera renouvelée ou modifiée au bout de tous les douze ans, en vertu d'un accord mutuel entre les deux Hautes Parties Contractantes.

Art. XIV.—La présente Convention sera ratifiée et les ratifications seront échangées à Tokio le plus tôt possible et en tout cas pas plus tard que quatre mois après sa signature.

En foi de quoi les Plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé et scellé de leurs sceaux la présente Convention.

Fait à Saint Petersburg, le vingt huitième jour du septième mois de la quarantième année de Meiji, correspondant au quinze (vingt huit) de l'an mil neuf cent sept.

St. Petersburg, le 28 (15) Juillet 1907.
Monsieur le Plénipotentiaire,

Au moment de procéder à la signature du Traité de commerce et de navigation conclu en date de ce jour entre le Japon et la Russie, j'ai l'honneur de faire au nom du Gouvernement Impérial du Japon la déclaration suivante :

Le Gouvernement Impérial du Japon en proposant au Gouvernement Impérial de Russie de consigner dans les articles séparés du présent Traité les dispositions concernant les relations spéciales entre le Japon et la Corée relativement au commerce, à l'industrie et à la navigation et les dispositions relatives au commerce entre le Japon et les pays voisins de l'Asie orientale, n'a eu aucune manière l'intention de placer la Russie dans une situation autre qu'inférieure à celle des autres Puissances.

Dans le cas où la Russie accorderait à la Corée ou aux pays asiatiques voisins du Japon qui se trouvent à l'est du détroit de Malacca, certains avantages concernant les matières contenues dans les dispositions susmentionnées, le même traitement, par rapport à ces avantages, qui serait appliqué par le Japon à toute autre Puissance jouissant de la clause de la nation la plus favorisée, sera également appliqué à la Russie.

Par conséquent les dispositions susmentionnées des articles séparés ne produiront leurs effets pratiques à l'égard de la Russie qu'au moment où ces mêmes dispositions pourront être appliquées aux autres Puissances jouissant au Japon de la clause de la plus favorisée.

Veillez agréer, Monsieur le Plénipotentiaire, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

St. Petersburg, le 15 (28) Juillet 1907.
Monsieur le Plénipotentiaire,

Au moment de procéder à la signature du traité de commerce et de navigation conclu en date de ce jour, entre la Russie et le Japon, j'ai l'honneur de faire au nom du Gouvernement Impérial de Russie la déclaration suivante :

Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie ayant proposé au Gouvernement Impérial du Japon de reproduire dans les articles séparés du présent traité les dispositions mentionnées aux premiers cinq articles des articles séparés (de la part de la Russie), n'a nullement l'intention de placer le Japon dans une situation autre qu'inférieure à celle des autres Puissances.

Dans le cas où la Russie accorderait à un pays jouissant de la clause de la nation la plus favorisée certains avantages prévus par les articles susmentionnés, le même traitement, par rapport à ces avantages, sera également appliqué au Japon.

Par conséquent les dispositions de ces articles n'auront leurs effets pratiques à l'égard du Japon qu'autant qu'elles seraient appliquées aux autres Puissances jouissant de la clause de la nation la plus favorisée.

Veillez agréer, Monsieur le Plénipotentiaire, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

PROTOCOLE.

Le Gouvernement Impérial du Japon et le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie ayant décidé, au cours des négociations relatives au Traité de commerce et de navigation entre les deux pays et à la Convention de pêche, régler certains questions consulaires, les sous-signes, dûment autorisés, sont tombés d'accord de formuler l'entente survenue à ce sujet comme suit :

1) Le Gouvernement Russe accordera dans les formes usitées l'autorisation d'ouvrir un Consulat Japonais à Wladivostok et un Consulat Japonais à Nikoliewsk ;

2) Le Gouvernement Japonais accordera de son côté également dans les formes usitées l'autorisation d'ouvrir un Consulat Russe à Tsuruga et un Consulat Russe à Otaru ;

3) Le présent arrangement entrera en vigueur aussiôt l'échange des ratifications du Traité de commerce et de la Convention de pêche.

En foi de quoi les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé et scellé de leurs sceaux le présent Protocole.

Fait à St. Petersburg, le vingt huitième jour du septième mois de la quarantième année de Meiji, correspondant au quinze (vingt huit) juillet de l'an mil neuf cent sept.

PROTOCOLE ANNEXE A LA CONVENTION DE PECHE ENTRE LE JAPON ET LA RUSSIE.

PROTOCOLE.

Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, jugeant nécessaire de régler certaines questions résultant des dispositions de la Convention de Pêche signée en ce jour, leurs Plénipotentiaires respectifs sont convenus des Articles suivants :

Art. 1.—Les anses (inlets), faisant l'objet de l'exception mentionnée dans l'Article I de la Convention de Pêche signée en ce jour, sont les suivantes :

1. Baie Saint Laurent, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Phaugan au cap Kharguilakh.

2. Baie Melchigme.

3. Baie Koniam (Penkeguni), jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Netchkionou au Grab Peck.

4. Baie Abolchev (Kalagan).

5. Baie Roumilet.

6. Baie Providence, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Lisovsky au Bull's Head.

7. Baie Sainte Croix jusqu'au parallèle du cap Meetchken.

8. Baie Anadyr, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Saint Basilus au cap Guek.

9. Baie Saint Paul.

10. Schlipotchnaïa Gavane.

11. Lac Tuleny.

12. Lac Schestifouty.

13. Partie nord du Golfe du baron Korff.

14. Port Karaga.

15. Baie Betchevinsky.

16. Baie Avatchinsky, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Bezimanny au cap Dalny.

17. Golfe Saint Nicolas, jusqu'au parallèle du cap Mamet.

18. Baie du Grand Duc Constantin.

19. Golfe Sainte Nicolas, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Lamsdoff au cap Grote.

20. Baie Stchastia.

21. Golfe Baikal, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Tchaouno au cap Vitovov.

22. Golfe Nyisky.

23. Golfe Nabilsky.

24. Baie Krestovy.

25. Baie Stark.

26. Baie Vanine, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Vessely au cap Bourry.

27. Rade Impériale, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Miloutine au cap Poutatine.

28. Baie Ternei, jusqu'au méridien du cap Strachny.

29. Baie Saint Vladimir, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Balusek au cap Valovsky.

30. Petit inlet situé dans la partie nord-est de la Baie Preobrajenie, jusqu'au méridien du cap Matveiev.

Il va sans dire que l'exception en question ne s'étendra que dans les limites des eaux territoriales russes.

En ce qui concerne les côtes septentrionales de la Mer d'Okhotsk, à partir de l'embauchure du fleuve Podkaguerny jusqu'au Port Ayan, à l'exception du Golfe Penjinsky (v. No 17), les anses (inlets), devant faire l'objet de l'exception susmentionnée, seront déterminées conformément à la définition qui suit : baies dont l'enfoncement dans le continent (la longueur de thalweg) excède la largeur d'entrée plus de trois fois.

La pêche sera, en outre, interdite aux sujets japonais comme aux autres étrangers, pour motifs stratégiques, dans les limites des eaux territoriales des baies suivantes :

1. Baie De Castries avec la Baie de Fredericksz, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Castries au cap Kloster-Kamp et jusqu'à celle tirée du cap Kloster-kamp au cap Ostry.

2. Baie Sainte Olga, jusqu'à la ligne droite tirée du cap Manevsky au cap Schkott.

3. Baie Pierre le Grand, du cap Povorotny au cap Gamov, y compris le fleuve se trouvant dans cette baie.

4. Baie Possiet, du cap Gamov au cap Boutakov.

Art. 2.—En ce qui concerne les limites des fleuves par rapport à la mer, les deux Hautes Parties Contractantes se conformeront aux principes et aux usages du droit international.

Art. 3.—Le droit de pêche accordé aux sujets japonais dans le Liman de l'Amour, en vertu de la Convention de Pêche, est soumis aux conditions spéciales suivantes :

1. Les sujets japonais pourront acquérir dans cette region des pêche aux enchères publiques sur le même pied que les sujets russes.

2. Les sujets japonais ayant acquis les lots de pêche sont soumis, sous tous les rapports, relativement à l'industrie de pêche, aux mêmes lois, règlements et ordonnances, qui sont ou qui pourront être édictés pour la pêche fluviale, dans le bassin de l'Amour, que les sujets russes, adjudicataires des lots de pêche eux-mêmes, en particulier aux dispositions qui défendent aux concessionnaires des lots de pêche dans cette région l'emploi des ouvriers étrangers.

Art. 4.—Les sujets japonais pourront sur leur demande, acquérir aux enchères publiques des lots de pêche n'importe où dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la Convention de Pêche, en se soumettant aux lois, règlements et ordonnances actuellement en vigueur ou qui seront édictés dans la suite, pour l'élevage et la protection des poissons, pour le contrôle de l'industrie y relative et pour toute autre matière concernant la pêche dans les régions susmentionnées. Il va sans dire que les sujets japonais ne seront assujettis à ces lois, règlements et ordonnances qu'autant que ces mêmes lois, règlements et ordonnances seront applicables aux sujets russes eux-mêmes ayant acquis des lots de pêche dans ces régions.

Art. 5.—La dénomination de "sujets russes ayant acquis des lots de pêche" (v. Articles II, IV, VII, IX et X de la Convention de Pêche et Article 4 du présent Protocole) ne s'applique ni aux colons, ni aux races indigènes jouissant de privilèges spéciaux.

Art. 6.—Il va sans dire que le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie se réserve le droit d'accorder des droits de pêche aux colons qui viendraient s'établir dans les endroits où n'existent pas de lots de pêche au profit des adjudicataires ; il en sera de même pour les races indigènes.

Le Gouvernement Russe s'engage à ne pas accorder, pendant toute la durée de la Convention de Pêche, les dits droits aux colons ou aux races indigènes dans les endroits où des lots de pêche auront été une fois créés.

Il est convenu que la qualité de colon n'est donnée qu'aux individus et leur famille s'adonnant personnellement à la pêche sans avoir recours à des ouvriers.

Art. 7.—Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie assure pour l'avenir que les lots de pêche déjà existants dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la Convention de Pêche resteront ouverts pendant toute la durée de la dite Convention, à l'exception, des lots occupés actuellement par les colons pour leur pêche.

Art. 8.—La durée des concessions de lots de pêche, vendus aux enchères publiques, sera fixée comme suit :

(1) Un an, pour les lots qui seront ouverts pour la première fois après la mise en vigueur de la Convention de Pêche.

(2) Trois ans, pour ont déjà été exploités pendant un an.

(3) Trois ans pour les lots qui ont déjà été exploités pendant la première période de trois ans.

(4) Cinq ans, pour les lots qui ont déjà été exploités pendant les deux périodes de trois ans.

Art. 9.—Les baux des lots de pêche, dont le terme n'aura pas encore pris fin au moment de l'expiration de la période de douze ans mentionnée à l'Article XIII de la Convention de Pêche, continueront à être valables pendant toute la durée du terme fixe dans les baux susmentionnés, quelle que soit la décision qui pourra être prise par les deux Parties Contractantes concernant la Convention elle-même.

Art. 10.—Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie n'aura pas d'objection à ce que les sujets japonais fabriquent les engrais de hareng et de plusieurs espèces de poissons tombant par hasard dans les filets avec les harengs lorsqu'ils marchent en banc. Le Gouvernement russe n'aura pas non plus d'objection à ce que les sujets japonais préparent et salent les poissons saumonés à la manière japonaise.

Art. 11.—Le certificat de navigation, pour le parcours du Japon aux pêcheries dans les eaux russes et retour, est délivré par les Consuls russes compétents aux pêcheurs japonais sur la présentation des documents attestant :

1. Le droit de bail du lot (ou des lots), vers lequel le bâtiment vient se rendre ;

2. Le nombre de personnes à bord ;

3. La nature de la cargaison, comme étant uniquement destinée à l'industrie de pêche, et sa quantité.

Le certificat de navigation énumère :

1. Le nom du bâtiment et du port auquel il est inscrit ;

2. Le nom de l'entrepreneur de pêche—titulaire du lot (ou des lots) ;

3. L'indication exacte du lot (ou des lots) de pêche, vers lequel se rend le bâtiment ;

4. La nature et la quantité de la cargaison ;

5. Le nombre de personnes à bord.

Le bâtiment muni du certificat susmentionné et du certificat de santé est autorisé à entrer et à relâcher seulement sur les points du littoral russe qui sont indiqués dans le certificat. Il va sans dire que les ports où existe une douane sont toujours accessibles au dit bâtiment.

Les bâtiments japonais se rendant dans les eaux russes pour s'y livrer à la pêche des baleines, des morues, etc., en vertu du troisième alinéa de l'Article II de la Convention de Pêche, doivent relâcher préalablement dans un des ports russes spécialement désignés, où les autorités russes compétentes leur délivreront pour cette pêche un permis spécial, qui leur servira, en même temps, de certificat de navigation.

Art. 12.—L'emploi du tatami ordinaire sera autorisé dans tous les lots de pêche occupés par les sujets japonais, sauf dans les lots qui se trouvent dans le voisinage le plus rapproché de l'embouchure des fleuves; il est convenu en outre que pour ces derniers lots de pêche, l'emploi du tatami ne pourra pas être interdit dans le cas où la pêche au moyen de filets mobiles n'y est pas praticable.

Art. 13.—Il est entendu que l'expression "poissons et produits aquatiques," employée dans la Convention de Pêche et le Protocole y annexé, sera comprise dans le sens de toutes espèces de poissons, animaux, plantes et autres produits aquatiques, sauf les phoques à fourrure et les loutres marines.

Art. 14.—Le présent protocole sera considéré comme ratifié par la ratification de la Convention de Pêche signée en ce jour; il aura la même durée que la dite Convention.

En foi de quoi les Plénipotentiaires des deux Pays ont signé et scellé de leurs sceaux le présent Protocole.

Fait à Saint Petersburg en double exemplaire le vingt huitième jour du septième mois de la quarantième année de Meiji, correspondant au quinze (vingt huit) juillet de l'an mil neuf cent sept.

PROTOCOLE.

Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies jugeant utile, dans l'intérêt des deux pays, de régler certaines matières spéciales qui les concernent mutuellement, séparément du Traité de Commerce et de Navigation signé en ce jour, sont convenus par Leurs Plénipotentiaires respectifs des dispositions suivantes:

1. La durée de la validité du visa mis par les autorités russes sur les passeports japonais sera de six mois. Le droit ou taxe de quelque dénomination que ce soit, levé par les autorités russes pour la délivrance des passeports à l'étranger aux sujets japonais ou pour l'inscription sur les passeports japonais de la permission de quitter la Russie ne dépassera pas le montant de cinquante copeks, au profit du Trésor.

2. Les articles produits ou manufactures dans le territoire à bail de Liangtong qui seront importés dans les provinces russes: a) de l'Amour et b) Maritime, par la frontière de terre de Manchourie, et les articles produits ou manufactures dans les dites provinces russes qui seront importés dans le territoire à bail de Liangtong par la frontière de terre seront soumis respectivement, en tout ce qui concerne les facilités et les droits de douane, au même traitement que les articles produits ou manufactures en Manchourie.

3. Le présent Protocole sera considéré comme ratifié par la ratification du Traité de Commerce et de Navigation signé en ce jour, et il prendra fin en même temps que le Traité cessera d'être obligatoire.

En foi de quoi les Plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé et scellé de leurs sceaux le présent Protocole.

Protocole No. 4 de la Conférence en vue de la conclusion d'une Convention de pêche entre le Japon et la Russie.

Seance du 18/5 Juin 1907.

Avant de clore la présente séance les Plénipotentiaires du Japon et de Russie ont échangé les déclarations suivantes:

1. En ce qui concerne les côtes septentrionales de la Mer d'Océan, le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie, sans attendre le résultat définitif des levées détaillées de ces côtes, auxquelles on procèdera sans tarder, consent à accorder aux sujets japonais les lots de pêche dans les endroits qui évidemment ne rentrent pas dans la définition convenue du terme "anse" (inlet).

2. En ce qui concerne la défense de l'emploi des ouvriers étrangers dans les lots de pêche du Liman de l'Amour, le Plénipotentiaire de Russie a donné au Plénipotentiaire du Japon l'explication suivante:

Dans les lots de pêche à long terme l'emploi des ouvriers étrangers est interdit tant pour la pêche que pour la préparation des poissons; mais les possesseurs de ces lots pourront, sur leur demande, acquérir à bail des lots fonciers à court terme dans les endroits se trouvant à une distance d'environ une demi à une verste de leurs lots de pêche. Dans ces lots fonciers, destinés à la préparation des poissons, aucune restriction n'est imposée quant à la nationalité des ouvriers qui y sont employés.

Dans les lots de pêche à court terme, l'emploi des ouvriers étrangers est interdit seulement pour la pêche des poissons elle-même. Mais il est permis d'employer, à terre, pour la préparation des poissons des ouvriers de toutes les nationalités sans aucune distinction.

Il va sans dire que dans les lots à long terme comme dans les lots à court terme les dites restrictions relatives à la nationalité ne s'appliquent pas aux personnes qui ne rentrent pas dans la catégorie des ouvriers, tels que les préposés-surveillants, commis, etc.

3. Il est entendu que l'expression de "baux à court terme" ne s'applique qu'aux baux dont le terme ne dépasse pas un an.

4. Il est convenu que les lots de pêche se trouvant dans les régions spécifiées à l'Article I de la Convention de Pêche et loués à bail à long terme avant la mise en vigueur de la dite Convention seront également loués à long terme immédiatement après la mise en vigueur de la même Convention.

5. Tous les bâtiments à vapeur japonais naviguant dans les eaux russes pour s'y livrer à l'industrie de la pêche doivent être munis d'un livre de bord en traduction russe ou anglaise. Quant aux bâtiments à voile japonais naviguant dans les eaux russes pour l'industrie de la pêche, ils se conformeront à la disposition ci-dessus autant qu'il leur sera possible.

6. Les principes posés dans l'Article XI de la Convention de Pêche ayant été établis, le Plénipotentiaire du Japon a exprimé l'espoir que le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie, en imposant aux sujets japonais les restrictions qui pourraient découler de l'application de cet Article, ne sera guidé que par des considérations d'ordre public et tâchera de les réduire autant que faire se pourra. Le Plénipotentiaire russe lui a répondu qu'il partagerait cette manière de voir et que l'intention du Gouvernement russe était d'établir, pour tous les ressortisants étrangers se livrant à l'industrie mentionnée dans le dit Article, le régime qui existe déjà dans la région de Nicolafewsk (l'embouchure de l'Amour et le Liman), en se réservant cependant de ne pas l'étendre aux localités où la surveillance est difficile.

7. Le Plénipotentiaire du Japon prenant acte de l'acceptation définitive par le Plénipotentiaire de Russie de la rédaction de l'Article V par lequel le Gouvernement russe s'engage à ne percevoir aucun droit, impôt ou taxe, sous quelque dénomination que ce soit, sur les poissons et produits aquatiques pêchés ou pris dans les eaux russes des Provinces du Littoral et de l'Amour et destinés à être exportés au Japon, que ces poissons et produits aquatiques fussent manufactures ou ne le fussent pas, déclare que son Gouvernement, de son côté, ne percevra, non seulement les droits d'importation mentionnés dans l'Article XII, mais aucun droit, impôt ou taxe, sous quelque dénomination que ce soit, sur les poissons et produits aquatiques pêchés ou pris dans les eaux russes des Provinces du Littoral et de l'Amour et importés au Japon, que ces poissons et produits aquatiques fussent manufactures ou ne le fussent pas.

8. P. ur éviter toute cause de malentendu à l'avenir relativement à certaines anses faisant l'objet de l'exception mentionnée à l'Article I de la Convention du Pêche, la carte ci-jointe donnant les limites exactes des dites anses a été annexée aux présents Protocoles.

DISASTROUS FIRE AT KOBE.

The fire at Kobe, reported by telegram and circulated by us as an express on Saturday morning, is thus described by the Kobe Herald of that evening:—

One of the most disastrous fires which have occurred in the former Settlement during recent years broke out at about 1.30 this morning, when a policeman on the beat near the P. and O. office noticed smoke issuing from the second floor of Messrs. Carlowitz's fine warehouse, No. 124 Nakamachi-dori, which was occupied by the straw braid department. The flames spread with great rapidity and soon enveloped the entire building, which was well known as the largest and finest godown in the Settlement. Fanned by a strong wind from the east, the fire soon spread to the three-story brick building where Messrs. Carlowitz's offices and mess were located. Fortunately, by this time the firm's records, etc., had been removed to the Kobe Club, a large number of willing hands assisting in the task. At 4.15 the two-storied godown on Ito Machi, where Messrs. Carlowitz's mailing was stored, caught fire and was destroyed. From the offices the flames spread to the two-storied brick godown of Messrs. Delacamp and Company, on Higashi Machi, and, for a time it seemed likely that this firm's offices, etc., at No. 121 would also fall a prey. Every effort was consequently made to remove the more valuable papers, fittings, etc., from the premises, everything possible being transferred to the Kobe Club, but fortunately these offices were saved. The fire was not got under control until after daylight, by which time the greater part of the walls of Messrs. Carlowitz's buildings had fallen, both the offices and the godown being demolished. We understand that the financial loss will amount to about yen 1,000,000, which we believe, is mainly covered by insurance. The fire brigade were early on the scene and did their utmost to subdue the outbreak, and there was a good supply of water. Happily, there was no loss of life.

Our contemporary remarks that the representatives of several insurance offices displayed a "childish reluctance" to impart salient facts but says that the principal offices affected are the London, Liverpool and Globe, the Yorkshire, the Royal Exchange, the Norwich Union, the Northern, the Phoenix, and the Lancashire. The Yorkshire is believed to carry the largest amount. It then goes on: Although great credit is given the Police authorities, for the efforts made to restrict the scope of the disaster and to maintain order, not a little criticism is directed against the Fire Brigade, whose efforts lacked expert skill and direction. When the outbreak was first discovered not a sign was given publicly of the outbreak and even when the firemen arrived attention was concentrated on the outside of the burning building fronting on Naka Machi—where for a long time the hose was kept playing upon a red hot iron window without effecting any result whatever, instead of attacking the flames from the rear. The firemen's attention was drawn to this and they were urged to open one of the doors on the southern and leeward side of the structure with a view to fighting the flames from the rear. No heed, however, was given to the representations, though they were made by one of the Fire Insurance Companies principally concerned. Later, the firemen opened a door on the windward side of the warehouse, and thereby perceptibly fanned the flames. Had a door on the southern side been opened as a door on the fire, it is more than probable that the outbreak would have been confined to the place of origin, viz, the four-story warehouse. By the opening of the doors on the north and windward side the flames were necessarily carried towards the buildings between Naka Machi and the Custom House. It must be said, too, that there was considerable delay in getting the hydrants to work. Not until a full hour had elapsed after the first signs of the fire had been detected by passers-by were the nozzlemen able to play effectively upon the flames. The need of a directing mind in the case of a fire was never more painfully demonstrated than it was this morning. The firemen here, whatever their intrepidity may be seem to lack experience of fires in great buildings. One of the remarkable features of the fire was the escape of the wooden godown on the premises of Messrs. H. E. Reynell and Co., Agents for the Hiron Mineral Water Co. This building, one of the oldest on the former Settlement successfully withstood the danger although the heat was so great that it was impossible for standers by to keep their hands on the threatened structure. For a time the offices of the P. and O. S. N. Co., were in danger and at 4 o'clock the position was critical in the extreme, but the danger was happily averted. The greater part of the northern side of Messrs. Carlowitz's huge warehouse fell at about this time, but by some miraculous good chance no one was standing near. The concussion shook the neighbourhood and was distinctly felt a long distance away.

Messrs. Delacamp and Co.'s premises had a very narrow escape. As it was, one of their godowns—a three-story brick building—was completely destroyed, a portion of the southern wall of Messrs. Carlowitz & Co.'s offices falling and breaking in the roof. As a precautionary step about 200 barrels of phosphate were removed by order of the Police from Godown F., which was at one time seriously threatened. Had this godown ignited, the probability is the whole block, and the Customs Compound as well, would have been demolished.

Messrs. Carlowitz & Co. are to be congratulated on having saved the greater portion of their papers, etc. Fortunately some of the staff were sleeping on the premises, and when the precarious position of their offices was pointed out they were able, with the assistance of other members of the staff, who hastened to the scene on the news of the fire being made known, to rescue most of the firm's books and records. The strong room and two of the safes are intact, but the state of the contents is not yet known.

The firemen continued to play streams of water on the burning debris until a late hour this afternoon and efforts were made between 3 and 5 o'clock to pull down the bulging wall of brick—two feet thick—on the eastern side of the lot. The buildings destroyed were perhaps the finest in the town, and had any resident been asked yesterday what-let was in all probability immune from danger of fire answer would have been given that the Carlowitz-Delacamp block was perhaps the safest.

As to the cause of the fire, nothing definite is at present known. Possibly some careless workman dropped a cigarette stump or ash from a pipe before the warehouse was closed yesterday. The doors of the building were generally closed at 5 o'clock. Some mention has been made of the possibility of defective circuit in connection with the electric light but we are inclined to dismiss this theory as the utmost possible care was taken when the installation was made under the direct supervision of Messrs. L. J. Healing & Co., Engineers and Electricians.

It should be added that the block was erected in 1904, the architect being Mr. A. N. Hansell, F. R. I. B. A., who was much congratulated on the success of his work.

HOW TO BRING THE EAST AND THE WEST TOGETHER.

A large audience was present at Plymouth church, Worcester, at the morning and night services on July 13 to hear two addresses by Rev. Dr. John H. De Forest of Sendai, Japan, who is on a year's vacation in the United States, after spending over 30 years in the island empire under the American board of foreign missions.

In his morning sermon, Dr. DeForest took as his subject, "Political and religious exterritoriality." He said in part:

"To understand in a large way actual mission work of any kind, it is necessary to know two things: First, the condition of the land from which the missionaries are sent, and secondly, the very different conditions of the countries in which they operate. Let us briefly contrast the political conditions of the East and West.

"For always and forever religion of any kind is intimately connected with politics. The Pilgrim Fathers were essentially a band of Christians, yet Senator George Frisbie Hoar says the contract they made in the cabin of the Mayflower was the most important political transaction that has ever taken place on earth.

"The missionaries who go out from America and England (for these two countries furnish the vast majority of the missionaries) cannot separate themselves from the political and social environment of the Anglo-Saxon race. We carry a political status with us. By being missionaries we do not cease to be citizens of our great republic. Once in a while, however, an unbalanced missionary forgets this. "Next, what are the political and social conditions of the populous East, where we are carrying the message? It is sufficient to mention only two. Instead of the individual as a unit, they exalt the family and are proud of their long family lines. The individual holds himself or herself ready to make heavy and sad sacrifice or even to die for the sake of the family.

"If one member of a family commits a crime the whole family, children and all, are subject to punishment. Death does not break the family line, for when the head of a family dies ancestral worship binds together the living and the dead, and it is one of the most potent moral forces in the evolution of the eastern races.

"The government is always paternal with a large touch of despotism. The great East is still in the pantheistic stage.

"The great East, however, is a moral and religious East. Those great nations have virtues in actual practice that have conserved them through all the ages, and built them up into a civilization that has literature, history, heroes, morals and religion.

"The great problem is how shall we, with our great blessings, have helpful intercourse with them, who live and move and have their being in the atmosphere of the two blessings of filial piety and loyalty?

"The only way governments have discovered for intercourse with East and West, is by what is termed exterritoriality. We insist upon carrying over there our own Anglo-Saxon ideals of religious and civil liberty and open courts, while they insist that we shall be cooped up in a few acres called foreign settlements, which places are always open ports like Yokohama and Shanghai. Then begins friction and disagreements and quarrels between the cooped-up foreigners and the surrounding nation who resent the masterful manners of the high-minded westerners. Every open port in the East that belongs to nations out there is more or less of a hotbed of dissatisfaction and strife between the West and the East.

"Yet far more good than evil comes from this exterritorial system. In spite of friction and hatred these open ports have sent millions of valuable merchandise throughout islands and continents; have given new standards of life, physical and intellectual to surrounding peoples and are the best doors of international intercourse we can make when the theistic West meets the pantheistic East.

"Nevertheless they hate the political exterritoriality bitterly. One of the first addresses I heard in Japan was made by a teacher, who made this statement: "We must put an end to foreign laws on our soil."

"They hastened, however, their study of western codes of law; they discussed for eight years the possibility of abolishing torture from their courts, and in 1900, when the West agreed to put their nationals under Japanese laws, and thus abolish exterritoriality one great wave of joy swept over the nation.

"Possibly, some of you may wonder what has this to do with the great world movement called foreign missions. Just this, that missions following natural political methods have been carried on under a kind of exterritoriality. This is because of the different creeds that have opened missions there, each according to their own denominational ways. But this has been necessarily a foreign work originated with foreigners and carried on, directed and controlled by foreigners, just the same as exterritoriality is only a temporary way of bringing nations together, until both sides have virtually the same standards of law and rights.

Continuing, Dr. DeForest stated many of the things the various churches have done in evangelizing the East, and said:—

"In short, we have reached a new era. The leaders of the churches do not hesitate to say that while it is their mission to evangelize the whole people of the East, it is theirs also to make a Japanese Christianity just as it was our fathers' wish to make a New England Christianity.

"This movement in Japan, indeed, marks a new era not only in missions but in the whole evolution of a larger Christianity throughout the world. It compels us to think and plan in world terms. I fully believe that should all the missionaries withdraw from Japan, with that eager openminded nation in full contact with all the knowledge of the world, they would become a great Christian nation.

"But there is a great world problem confronting us and our descendants. It is how to bring the East into friendly relations with the West. This is the greatest problem of the 20th century. Two mighty civilizations whose evolution has proceeded virtually unknown to each other through long ages, whose customs, family life, morals and religion are developed on different lines, whose language and literature are unknown to each other—these two halves of the human race have for the first time come together, partly in treaties, partly in battle lines, the longest and bloodiest the world has ever seen.

"Treaties and diplomacy are good, but among the statesmen and the plucely merchants of the world there is heard an ominous voice that sends anxiety and even shudders through the whole world. It says:—

"There is an impassable gulf between the east and the west. It is impossible to harmonize the yellow and the white.

"And this race hatred is raising its head, and armies and navies are wondering if they are large enough for the slaughters of the future.

"There is but one organization on earth that speaks with unwavering confidence of the coming together of the east and west in one great brotherhood of man. That is the church of Christ, with its army of missionaries who have learned the languages of the east and lived in the homes of the people there. And to do this great work we must organize on large lines and work together, regardless of creeds, realizing that there is one God."

British exports for August were £37,355,044 and imports were £49,295,585, being increases of £3,862,430 and £707,448 respectively. The principal increases include cotton, over half a million.

CASABLANCA.

Reuter's Agent at Casablanca telegraphs that certain tribes have asked for a suspension of hostilities with a view to negotiating for peace. General Drude has given them until the 9th instant to surrender. It is believed that the object of the tribes is merely to gain time.

THE "LUSITANIA'S" MAIDEN VOYAGE.

London, September 9.

The departure of the new turbine Cunarder Lusitania on her maiden trip to America developed a patriotic demonstration. Over one hundred thousand people lined the banks of the Mersey. She is the largest ship in the world and is confidently expected to steam 25½ knots an hour and so regain British supremacy for speed on the Atlantic. At the Tuskar Light the Lusitania was already leading the Lucania, which had left the Mersey 2½ hours previously.

THE PALMA TROPHY: TALL SCORING.

The American team has won the Palma Rifle trophy. Their score was 1712; Canada came next with 1671; Australia third with 1653; Great Britain fourth with 1584. The previous best record in this competition was 1570.

THE JAPANESE AT TRIESTE.

The festivities in honour of the Japanese continue at Trieste.

NEW RUSSIAN BATTLESHIP.

The new battleship Emperor Paul, of 17,600 tons, will be launched at St. Petersburg on Saturday.

ANTI-JAPANESE RIOT IN CANADA.

The Tribune reports that there will be no refusal on the part of the Lieutenant Governor to sign the Orientals exclusion measure. A mob wrecked the Japanese and Chinese quarters at Vancouver. The Japanese armed with knives and sticks drove off the rioters. One Japanese was fatally wounded. The mob attacked some four hundred Japanese who were landing and threw some into the water. They were rescued with difficulty.

MOROCCO.

General Drude reports that apparently about 800 Moors have been killed at Casablanca.

From Tangier it is reported that letters have been received from Sir Harry McLean dated August 12th, in which he says it seems years since he was made a prisoner. He adds, I caught a chill from sleeping on the floor of a tumble-down room in which it was impossible to wash, and I have been afraid to eat. McLean has not written since the 12th and Rasuli has deprived him of all his possessions.

THE ST. LEGER.

THE CHANNEL FLEET.

It is officially stated that Rear-Admiral F. J. Foley becomes second in command of the Channel Fleet.

THE CONGO.

An official announcement has been made at Brussels that the Congo State has handed over an entire domain of 299,375 kilometres to a limited company in which it is believed King Leopold holds nearly all the shares. A sensation has been aroused in Belgium, where it is considered that the arrangement will render annexation most difficult.

THE RIOTING AT VANCOUVER.

The serious rioting against Japanese and Chinese at Vancouver on Saturday was renewed on Sunday evening but the resolute attitude of the Japanese, who were armed with clubs, revolvers and knives and who threatened to use bombs, intimidated the mob, who refrained from attacking the Japanese quarter. Details of Saturday's rioting show that the Japanese, shouting "banzai" charged and routed a mob of eight thousand who had pursued them, using broken bottles in the most effective way. The Japanese Labour Commissioner, Mr. Ishii, (Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs in the Agricultural and Commercial Department) while proceeding to the Japanese Consulate had a narrow escape. The police permitted the Japanese to use arms. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, while deeply regretting the indignities and cruelties which had been imposed upon subjects of a friend and ally of King Edward, hoped that the offenders would be promptly punished.

The London papers generally comment on the seriousness of the situation, and express themselves as confident that the Dominion Government will impose its authority on British Columbia. They dwell on the extraordinary difficulty of the problem presented, and say that in view of the clash between east and west it is necessary for the statesmen of the world to concentrate their wisdom for the purpose of effecting a settlement which has been too long delayed.

VANCOUVER AND ASIATICS.

London, September 11.

All the Chinese domestics and mill-hands in Vancouver have struck by way of protest against their treatment. They purchased hundreds of pistols, until the police stopped the sale.

No official information has been received in official quarters in London with reference to the Vancouver affair. No representation has been made, but the affair is greatly regretted in official quarters, wherein, however, it is felt that Japan will realise that the riots were the result of mob action, and that the guilty will be punished by the strongest legal methods available.

It is stated that the riots were organised by some American labour leaders. After attending the conference at Seattle they went to Vancouver thereby hoping to impress Mr. Ishii with the unanimity of the labourites along the whole of the Pacific coast.

ST. LEGER BETTING.

The betting for the St. Leger is 6 to 5 against Woolwinder, 9 to 2 against Roi Herode, 100 to 12 against Glass Doll, 100 to 1 against Larig and Altitude, and 100 to 7 against Acclime and Dusty Miller.

BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATIVE RECORD.

The British Government last evening made a novel departure by issuing a record of the legislation of the administration in various departments. It shows that 118 acts were passed in two sessions, and that from 1906 to 1908 the National Debt has been reduced by 30½ millions.

VANCOUVER.

Vancouver was quiet last evening, but the militia were held in readiness. The police have arrested a score of Orientals, mostly Chinese, who were armed with revolvers. A box has been seized at the docks addressed to a Chinese merchant, which contained thirty rifles and 5,000 rounds of ammunition. Official circles at Ottawa are hopeful of a settlement on the basis of a restriction of immigration. Canadian papers generally deplore the anti-Japanese outrages and demand vindication of the law.

VISCOUNT INOUE.

Viscount Inoue, Japanese Ambassador in Berlin, had a farewell interview with Prince von Buelow at Norderney last evening.

ACCIDENT TO THE TSAR'S YACHT.

London, September 12.

The Tsar's yacht Standart grounded on some submerged rocks westward of Hangoe in the Finnish archipelago yesterday. She remains fast and a life boat and seven torpedo-boats are standing by her. The Tsar and the Imperial family remain on board.

CHINESE IN JAMAICA.

In view of the great influx of Chinese into Jamaica the Government is being pressed to pass a prohibitory law.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "TOKYO ASABI SHIMBUN.")

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, September 4.

The American cruiser St. Louis has arrived at San Francisco via Magellan Straits, as the fore-runner of the battleship fleet for the Pacific. The voyage was uneventful.

A report has been received in America to the effect that Japan has occupied Hlata (? Nishizawa island) which is suitable as a naval base. The fact is regarded by Americans as a menace by Japan towards Philipines.

Mr. Fairbank, Vice-President of America, arrived here on Sept. 3rd. He was received with enthusiasm. He declined to participate in political conversation. On the following day he left for the East.

Mr. Metcalf, American Secretary of State for the Navy, who has been for a long time in San Francisco left on Sept. 4th for the East.

Mr. Glass, Vice-President of the Pacific Telephone Company, who was charged with having given bribes to Mr. Schmitz, ex-Mayor, and other officials of the San Francisco City Office, was punished with five years' imprisonment.

A congress with regard to hydraulic utility is being held at Sacramento. Many influential agriculturists throughout the United States are present. An attempt is being made to pass a pro-Japanese resolution. On the other hand an opposition is being developed. The general condition is favourable to supporters of Japan.

Mr. Stone, a Senator, is reported to have said at St. Louis that the sudden rising of Japan to her present influential position means the development of the yellow peril and that China will shortly become a second Korea.

FIERCE FIGHTING AT CASABLANCA.

London, September 6.
There has been fighting of the fiercest character at Casablanca. On Tuesday the Arabs showed the greatest courage. They advanced repeatedly to close quarters despite the deadly fire of the French, who lost 3 officers and 7 men killed and 17 wounded. Three thousand Arabs were engaged.

THE DUMA ELECTIONS.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that the initial stages of the elections will be commenced in a fortnight. The opposition expect strong support in the towns, somewhat counter-balancing the preponderance of the vote given by the landlords.

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

Cholera is increasing on the Volga. There have already been 1,136 cases and 369 deaths in the Astrakhan province.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Committee has approved of a list of 14 subjects which might be accepted as universally susceptible of reference to arbitration without reservation concerning the vital interests of others of the Powers concerned. Revised regulations with regard to rights and duties of neutrals in land warfare have been completed. A majority of the German proposals giving special protection to the property of neutrals has been abandoned. Only clauses referring to the safe-guarding of peculiar interests of goods in transit have been retained.

Queen Wilhelmina of Holland has arranged that Parliament shall meet elsewhere on the 19th inst. so as to leave free the hall in which the Conference meets.

BRITISH TRADE UNIONISTS.

The Congress of delegates representing practically all the Trade Unions of Great Britain has passed resolutions urging upon the Government to abolish the House of Lords, condemning conscription, or compulsory military training.

KING EDWARD AT MARIENBAD.

From Vienna it is telegraphed that King Edward had a long conversation with M. Iswolsky. It is believed that the interview will tend to strengthen the Anglo-Russian agreement.

MR. WRIGHT ON JAPAN.

In New York, ex-Ambassador the Hon. Luke Wright said that Japan was not seeking war "at this time."

A SENATOR'S OPINION.

Senator Stone, who has just returned to San Francisco from the Far East, believes the Japanese situation is serious. "America and Europe will be faced with a grave situation by Japan in the no distant future." Mr. Stone says he noticed considerable ill-feeling in Japan towards America.

THE BATTLESHIP QUESTION.

The Navy Department at Washington states that the battleships will return to the Atlantic after demonstrating the feasibility of transferring the fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The creation of two battleship fleets was not contemplated.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

It is believed that about 35 Powers support the scheme of obligatory arbitration. Germany, Austria, Japan and some others decline. Japan objects altogether on the ground that its Government and people are unprepared to submit disputes to a Court which might enact juridical principles entirely at variance to their own.

AMERICAN NEWS.

San Francisco, September 6.

At the meeting of the Hydraulic Utility Union, which is being held at Sacramento, a movement was attempted to pass a pro-Japanese resolution. The proposal, however, was not adopted on the ground that it had no relation with immigration affairs. It is said that some of those who were present at the meeting intend to establish a party supporting the Japanese.

PLOT AGAINST KING EDWARD.

A plot has been discovered to injure King Edward, who is now at Marienbad, Germany. The police are taking strict precautions.

A NEW TORPEDO BOAT.

London, September 6.

The British Government is building a new type of submarine, larger and more powerful than any yet built. It is expected to be fitted with three torpedo tubes and have twin screws.

THE BELLINGHAM RIOT.

New York.

A number of British Hindus recently obtained work at Bellingham, Washington state. Anti-Asiatic agitators, employing Californian methods, inflamed the population and a mob on Wednesday attacked the Hindu quarter, driving out and badly injuring many Hindus. The British authorities are considering the outrage.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

Colliers' Weekly points out that the United States having demanded to refer the Newfoundland case to the Hague, cannot refuse if Japan demands a similar course in the case of the Californian incident.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Hague, September 9.

A plenary sitting of the Conference has accepted the new regulations with regard to the opening of hostilities and the rights and duties of neutral states on land, but an unexpected objection has been raised by the German delegation with reference to the whole project concerning neutral individuals in belligerent territory. The whole subject has been recommended to the reconsideration of the Committee.

ANTI-JAPANESE DEMONSTRATION IN CANADA.

London, September 9.

From Ottawa comes news of a most unfortunate demonstration against Japanese and Chinese which broke out in Vancouver on Friday after a meeting of the Anti-Japanese-Korean League. Rowdies attacked Chinese and Japanese shops and a considerable amount of property was destroyed. One Japanese was wounded.

Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commerce in Japan, now in Vancouver, telegraphed details to Mr. Consul Nosse here, who immediately informed Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Mr. Ishii believes the disturbance has ended.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, September 9.

The New York Herald is endeavouring to impair American friendliness towards Japan by publishing foolish comments, which show its ignorance of affairs in the Orient. It says that a Japanese army has occupied Chien-tao, that Count Okuma is visiting China, and that Japan intends to make China a second Korea.

THE VANCOUVER RIOT.

On the evening of Sept. 7th, a large number of whites held a meeting at Vancouver and resolved upon Japanese and Korean expulsion and subsequently organized a procession. Later several thousand rioters attacked the Japanese and Korean quarters, causing damage estimated at over a hundred thousand yen. Being angered by such treatment some Japanese resisted them with sticks and kitchen knives, killing four of their assailants and inflicting injuries on several. The whites attacked Japanese who were at work at the wharf and pier and threw several of them into the water. The Japanese were fortunately saved. The rioters claim that Canada must be for the whites. They set fire to the Japanese town with a view to destroying whole buildings. The flames were put out through the efforts of the firemen.

On Sept. 8th, some five hundred Japanese arrived at Vancouver by a steamer. A large number of whites attacked the Japanese passengers, who were trying to land. The rioters threw seven or eight of them into the sea and these are missing. The same evening the rioters again attacked the Japanese town. About twenty of them were arrested and the remainder were dispersed by the police. After the outrage, Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, now in Vancouver, sent a telegram to Baron Komura, Japanese Ambassador in London, asking him to inform the British Government of the trouble. The Mayor of Vancouver is reported to have said that the city had no responsibility for the damage caused through the disturbances as the affair would be dealt with by the Federal Government.

It is said that the outrage which occurred on September 7th is the most shocking affair hitherto reported.

During the trouble the police exerted their utmost efforts to quell it. They temporarily carried revolvers.

It is reported later that the Japanese buildings damaged through the riot are as follows: 13 business shops, 3 hotels, 5 sweetmeat and 5 barber shops, 4 offices of employment agents, 2 bath-houses and 2 tailors' shops, 1 bank, 1 newspaper office, and 1 rice refining factory. Two Japanese were injured. Mr. Nose, Japanese Consul-General in Ottawa, has received a telegram from the Japanese Consul at Vancouver with regard to the disturbances. The Consul-General at once had an interview with Sir W. Laurier, Premier, and asked him to take the necessary steps as to the trouble.

PLAGUE.

Plague has appeared in San Francisco.

MOROCCO.

The British Ambassador in Spain has informed the Spanish Government that Great Britain is entirely satisfied with the steps taken by Spain and France to protect the lives and property of foreigners in Morocco.

France has proposed to Spain to despatch an army consisting of fifty thousand Spanish and French troops in order to occupy all the harbours and bays of Morocco. It is rumoured that the Premier, and the Chief of the Spanish General Staff Office oppose the French proposal, but the Spanish Minister for War is supporting it.

THE CANADIAN AFFAIR.

New York, September 10.

The whole of the anti-Japanese agitation on the Pacific coast is due to Irish labour leaders, who are helped by Scandinavians and the President of the San Francisco Expulsion League.

The Evening Post declares that England's difficulty with reference to the growing conflict between her colonies and her Asiatic subjects and allies will continue to increase.

From Ottawa it is wired that the Press unanimously condemns the Vancouver rioters.

Mr. Consul-General Nosse states that 56 Japanese shops were damaged and two Japanese wounded.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Premier, has expressed profound regret at the occurrence.

The Provincial authorities are instructed to maintain order and to protect the Japanese.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Hague.

The Committee have reconsidered the articles with reference to the rights of neutrals. It decided to strike out the article prohibiting the requisitioning of war services by neutrals in belligerent territory, also the article according to neutrals preferential treatment with regard to indemnification, but has retained the article defining neutrality and forbidding the requisitioning of railway material from neutrals.

THE TROUBLE AT VANCOUVER.

San Francisco, September 10.

The Japanese and Chinese quarters at Vancouver resemble a field of battle. The Orientals purchased a lot of arms before the sale of the ammunition was prohibited by the police. All the Japanese and Chinese who reside at places within fifteen miles of Vancouver have assembled in the city. They have armed themselves with fire-arms, swords, sticks, stones, etc., and are making preparations to repel another expected attack of the rioters.

The Mayor of Vancouver has received instructions from Earl Grey, the Governor-General, that order in the city must be maintained at whatever cost and that the Japanese must be thoroughly protected in accordance with the Japanese-Canadian Treaty.

The police superintendent of Vancouver has temporarily employed two hundred policemen. If necessary to quell the trouble the military will be used.

The British steamer Monteagle, with a number of Japanese, is expected to arrive on Sept. 11th or 12th at Vancouver and further disturbances are then expected. The rioters are reported to have declared that they will stop the landing of the Japanese with bullets. Twenty-six of the rioters who have been arrested are undergoing examination.

No house in the Japanese and Chinese quarters has windows unbroken. During the attack by the mob, all the Chinese escaped from their houses, but the Japanese continued on the defensive.

A telegram from Ottawa says that the Canadian Government intends to pay for the damage sustained by the Japanese, and to make an apology.

Mr. R. W. Scott, Canadian Secretary of State, has said that under the Japanese-Canadian Treaty, the rights of the Japanese are explicit. Freedom of entry to the country, travelling and residing, as well as the rights of life and property must be strictly protected. The convention was not made for temporary considerations. Close investigations were made, during which some opposition appeared. In Parliament, however, the treaty was passed without any opposition. The Canadian Government must take every necessary step to protect the Japanese in compliance with the Treaty. Contrary to the view of the Secretary of State, there is a rumour that the Canadian Government intends to limit the number of Japanese entering its territory, to five hundred per year.

The Vancouver police have confiscated fifty rifles and a large quantity of ammunition which the Japanese and Chinese purchased for their own defence.

The San Francisco Chronicle of Sept. 10th says that the dispute between the white and yellow races can not be settled in any way by the diplomatic authorities or by lawyers. The only means to avoid trouble is to abolish mixed-residence of the races. Otherwise similar disturbances will be general in the future.

The Vancouver outrage has made an impression in San Francisco. The Japanese and Korean Expulsion Society is taking active steps.

MR. TAFT.

Mr. Taft has left Seattle for the Orient.

THE INSTIGATORS OF THE RIOT.

New York, September 11.

The actual deeds of violence at Vancouver were mostly committed by Canadians, but the riot was carefully arranged by three American agitators, viz, the President of the State of Washington Commission of Labour; the Secretary of the Washington Anti-Japanese League, and a prominent labourite of Seattle.

The American papers are disposed to be sarcastic concerning this outbreak in British territory after the severe British comments on the anti-Japanese troubles in California.

The afternoon telegrams state that the Chinese and Japanese quarters in Vancouver are practically in a state of siege.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Hague.

The first Committee has adopted a proposal to establish an international prize court by a vote of 26 to 15. Several Powers abstained, including Russia and Japan. Mr. Tsuzuki, Japanese delegate, paid a tribute to the conciliatory spirit in which the scheme had been constructed, and while grateful to the authors he thought it needed fuller examination, because the new court would necessarily influence national tribunals and consequently Japan must abstain for the present with a view to studying the question.

NEW MILITARY BALLOON.

London, September 12.

The new military airship has made two successful trips at Farnborough moving against the wind and manœuvring perfectly.

"THE TIMES" ON THE VANCOUVER INCIDENT.

The Times sternly condemns the Vancouver riot. It says that the intolerance with which large sections of the British colonial population regard Asiatic immigration is an evil and a danger demanding the most careful consideration of all good citizens. The responsible agitators are sowing the seeds of sedition and distrust and are sapping the confidence reposed in British justice.

Ottawa.

The latest telegrams show that the Vancouver police are most vigilant. The rioters attempted to march into the Japanese quarter but were dispersed. Twenty were arrested. The citizens are concerting measures to restore order. The whole of the Canadian press emphatically condemns the riot and says that the Japanese residents must be protected.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE). CHINESE AFFAIRS.

Peking, September 4.

Chao Erlisun, who is now here, has been transferred from the viceroyalty of Szechuan to that of Hu-Kwang in succession to Chang Chitung; and Yang Shihhsiang, Governor of Shantung, is appointed Acting Viceroy of Pehichili. Governor Chen Kueiling of Kiangsu becomes Viceroy of Szechuan, and is succeeded in his governorship by Chang Tsenyang, Governor of Chekiang. Feng Jukwei, Administrative Commissioner of Shensi, has been made Governor of Chekiang. [It will be seen from the above that all the newspaper predictions as to official changes have been falsified by facts.—Ed. J.M.]

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

On the 7th instant the Hague Tribunal adopted resolutions relating to the opening of hostilities and the rights and duties of neutrals.

A belligerent state will have to give clear notice of its intention of opening hostilities, such notice to be given either by proclamation or by ultimatum.

A neutral state must be informed without delay of the existence of a state of hostilities. This may be done by telegraph. Until a neutral state is in receipt of such notice it has no duties.

When a neutral Power acquires distinct knowledge of the existence of a state of war, it can not raise the objection that notice has not been received.

A neutral State must not be invaded, and must not be required to permit the passage of provisions or arms for the use of a belligerent.

NO REST FROM BURNING HUMOUR

Painful Swellings Formed in Arms pits and on Back—Itching Prevented Rest—Suffered Six Weeks and Became Run Down from Want of Sleep—Three Full Sets of

CUTICURA REMEDIES ENTIRELY CURED HIM

"I had been troubled with swellings under the armpits and on the small of the back accompanied by a burning itch to such an extent that I got very little rest, day or night. This had been going on for six weeks or more and I had tried various soothing ointments, these, however, gave only temporary relief, and as I was getting run down from the want of rest, I decided to consult a doctor, but on noticing the Cuticura Remedies advertised in the paper, I thought I would give them a trial. I used Cuticura Soap first, but this did not give the desired relief, then I tried Cuticura Ointment, Cuticura Ointment, and Cuticura Remedies for three successive times. I am thankful to say that, though my trouble was painful and severe, my cure was complete within a month, and I in the future shall urge any one whom I come across afflicted with skin troubles to use Cuticura Remedies, knowing as I do the great good they have done me. I am never without a box of Cuticura Ointment in my home. Robert Beaton, 45, High St., Fort William, Dec. 8 and 9, 1906."

CUTICURA

The Great Skin Cure and Purest and Sweetest of Emollients.

Cuticura Ointment is, beyond question, the most successful cure for itching, scaly, burning humours of the skin and scalp, including loss of hair, yet compounded, in proof of which a single ointment with Cuticura Ointment, preceded by a hot bath with Cuticura Soap, and followed by the ointment, has been found to afford immediate relief in the most distressing forms of itching, burning, and scaly humours, eczema, rashes, and irritations, permit rest and sleep, and point to a speedy cure in the majority of cases, when all else fails.

A Simple Set often Cures. Sold throughout the world. Depots: London, 27, Chancery Lane; Toronto & Co., Sydney; London (Ed.), Cape Town, 10, St. R. Paul, Calcutta; Potter Bros & Co., Hong Kong. For full particulars, consult a doctor.

DEATH.

On the 13th instant, in England, CHARLES GRANT, managing director of Kelly and Walsh, Ltd. (By cable)

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The Tsukuba and Chitose left Trieste on Sept. 14th for Port Said.

FROST was reported on Sept. 15th in the district of Ashikawa, Hokkaido.

DURING two weeks ended Sept. 15th, there were 771 cholera cases in Fukuoka.

THERE were renewed floods in East Central Japan this week, but the damage done was comparatively trifling.

A GAMBLER named K. Nakajima (28 at 11 a.m. on Sept. 15th) murdered with a sword another gambler, Y. Kurokawa (37), at the house of their employer, in Bakurocho, Nihonbashi, Tokyo.

A slight dispute is said to have been the cause. The culprit gave himself up to the Nihonbashi police.

THE Hitachi Maru, which left London on Sept. 7th, is bringing out 35 stallions and mares for stud purposes in Japan.

BARON SHIRASAWA on the evening of Sept. 16th entertained Marquis Ito and his staff at his villa at Oji, near Ueno.

It is reported by Tokyo papers that the Crown Prince will visit Shikoku and Kyushu, leaving Tokyo on October 9th.

TELEGRAPHIC service between Japan and Formosa, which was interrupted ever since the late storm, was re-opened on Sept. 15th.

MAJOR-GENERALS M. USHIJIMA and T. Saji have been appointed to command the first and second Formosan garrisons respectively.

THIRTY-SEVEN men have died as the result of an accident during heavy gun practise on the battleship Kashima near Kure this week.

THERE are no millionaires in New Zealand and this fact curiously enough is coincident with the lowest death-rate recorded in any country.

A THUNDER storm was experienced in the district of East Katsushika, near Tokyo, on Sept. 16th. Four persons were killed in a house by lightning.

A CASE of cholera appeared at Hiyooshi, a village near Kawasaki, on Sept. 13th. The patient, a farmer, twenty-six years old, died the same evening.

THE armoured cruiser Ihuki, which is under construction at Kure, will be launched about Nov. 21st, and the Kurama at the end of October at Yokosuka.

FIRE broke out early on the morning of Sept. 18th in the Kyoto Lunatic Asylum destroying the building. Two of the patients were killed and three injured.

FIRE broke out on Sept. 16th in the third factory of the Nippon Tea Firing Co., Kakagawa near Shidzuoka, destroying the building. The loss will be heavy.

It is reported by some Tokyo journals that Atsuta, near Nagoya, will be opened about Oct. 5th to foreign trade. At the same time the port will be renamed Nagoya.

ABOUT two thousand workmen employed at the various yusen pattern dyeing factories, in Osaka, struck on the evening of Sept. 12th asking their employers to increase their wages.

On Sept. 16th, snow fell in Shana and Kushiro, Hokkaido. The fact is reported to be attributable to the appearance of a centre of high pressure coming from South Siberia eastward.

M. MATSUZAKI, director of the Fukuda Post Office, Yokosuka, was arrested on Sept. 4th on a charge of having misappropriated a large amount of money belonging to the office.

Z. TANGE (30) a farmer residing at Negishi, Yokohama, on the night of Sept. 15th, attempted to commit suicide by throwing himself into the sea at Honmoku. He was saved by a fishing boat. Discordance in the family is reported to have been the cause.

The crew of the Kamchatka patrol ship Olga have mutinied. According to a telegram received from Vladivostok, the cruiser Jemchug was despatched to the scene on Sept. 14th, to settle the trouble. A collision took place between the parties, each firing on the other. Many were killed or injured. The details are still kept secret by the Russian authorities at Vladivostok.

MR. LI HA-CHU, new Chinese Minister to Tokyo, arrived at Hankow on Sept. 16th on his way to Japan. About Sept. 25th, His Excellency is expected to reach Nagasaki via Shanghai.

ACCORDING to an official telegram, Mr. K. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, arrived at Ottawa on Sept. 14th. After spending five days there, he will leave for Washington.

LEADING citizens of Tokyo are contemplating giving a dinner in honour of Mr. Tait, American Secretary of State for War, who will shortly arrive in Yokohama on his way to the Philippines.

A MAN, apparently a coolie, on the morning of Sept. 17th, committed suicide by throwing himself on the railway at Goten in Kanagawa just as a train was coming along. The body was terribly mangled.

MR. K. TSUTSUKI, envoy to the Peace Conference, and staff, will visit various countries of Europe after the rising of the conference. They are expected to return home at the end of November.

BASE-BALL champions in Hawaii have challenged the students of the Keiwo Gijuku to a match. The Japanese having accepted the challenge, the foreign team will arrive in Tokyo during the coming autumn.

AT 5 a.m. on Sept. 17th, a passenger train collided with a coal train at Kurozaki near Shimonozei. Some damage was sustained by both. A conductor was injured. Negligence on the part of a pointsman was the cause.

A LIGHTER with about a hundred coolies capsized at Nagasaki on the evening of Sept. 16th. Most of the men were saved by boats from the cruiser Naniwa and several steamers in the harbour. Twelve, including two Koreans, were drowned.

THE Nippon Yusen Kaisha's Shanghai liner Kasuga Maru, which arrived at Kobe at 8 a.m. on Sept. 14th, was ordered to be detained in quarantine for four days as one of the crew who landed at Nagasaki was found to have cholera after the ship left.

EPIDEMIC meningitis is prevalent in Tokyo. On Sept. 17th, the Tokyo City Council issued a warning advising the public to take precautions. According to this advice, certain bacteria are fostered in the nose or throat and subsequently penetrate the brain causing high fever.

SEPT. 17th being the anniversary of the battle of the Yellow Sea, a commemorative meeting was held at 3 p.m. at the Naval Club, Tsukiji. All the commanders-in-chief of the various squadrons and naval stations who are now in Tokyo on official business, and high naval officials were present.

SINCE the late floods a serious epidemic resembling cholera has been prevalent in various poultry farms of Tokyo. The police authorities have issued a warning that some fowls which died from the disease have been sent to market through the carelessness of the farmers. Such fowls are dangerous for food.

On the evening of Sept. 12th, Saka Maeta (25) attempted to murder her former husband named T. Kifuji (29), a dry goods merchant, and his father at Shida-cho Shiba, in Tokyo, inflicting on them severe injuries with a razor. She was arrested at once. The cause is reported to have been trouble in connexion with her divorce, which took place on May 7th.

KOREA.

Friday, September 13.

The condition of the Palace in Seoul is again beginning to cause uneasiness. It would seem that the so called "Miscellanies" have once more found a footing at Court. The Crown Prince was to have attended school outside the Palace for the first time on the 12th inst., but when the day came it was given out that he was laid up with cold, which is understood to have been a mere pretext, the truth being that the Conservative elements had again obtained a hearing and Imperial views had reverted to their own groove of sacred isolation. Rumour says that the idea of sending the Crown Prince to Japan for educational purposes has also been abandoned, nominally in deference to his mother's reluctance to part with him, but really because of the Conservative reaction. Another statement made by the Mainichi Dempo's correspondent is that the programme of separating the old and the new Emperors is likely to be given up. This important change of plan is also attributed to a purely emotional reason, namely, that if the ex-Sovereign and his son lived apart they would have few opportunities of meeting, and thus the relations of natural affection between them would be weakened. If these things be true, it is evident that troubles are still in store for Korea.

The weary tale of insurrections, suppressions, burnings, and assassinations continues to be told in South Korea. Whenever the insurgents come within reach of a Japanese detachment, they are shattered with comparative ease, but when they find a post office, a private house or a party of Japanese fishermen at a convenient distance from military protection they use the torch and the knife ruthlessly. It is almost comical to be told that these semi-savages were shocked beyond description by such an incident as the thrusting of a Japanese officer's sword into the corpse of an executed criminal; especially comical when we remember that only a very few years ago, the hideous custom of drawing, quartering, and distributing the bodies of malefactors was legally sanctioned in Korea.

Saturday, September 14.

News from Seoul is to the effect that the chief rendezvous of the insurgents is at a place called Munkyoung. Fifteen hundred have there assembled, and are said to be busily fortifying their position. The Japanese troops are steadily closing in on them, and an engagement may be expected at any moment.

From a place called Ulin there is intelligence that 300 insurgents have attacked the Japanese settlers and killed 13 of them, but we are inclined to think that this latter number is exaggerated especially as another journal speaks of only three. At Sunchang, also, two Japanese have been murdered. In fact it is evident that the Koreans are behaving in a most savage manner, and probably without drastic measures of reprisal they will not be completely quelled. The Shogyo Shimpo has a telegram saying that in several instances the insurgents have turned into robbers and their depredations have driven many well-to-do Koreans and Japanese to seek shelter in the capital.

If we may judge from the leading article in the Jiji Shimpo the Japanese people are growing tired over these protracted troubles in Korea. There is not the slightest fear, of course, as to the final result, but every day's delay means so much loss to the Japanese settlers, and means also that these latter will become apprehensive of visiting the interior and that wholesome enterprise will thus be checked. The first desideratum is to afford security to life and property without a moment's delay, and whatever steps are necessary to achieve that end should be unhesitatingly taken.

Sunday, September 15.

The latest sensation in Seoul is that measures are being taken to find a consort for the Prince Imperial although he is only eleven years of age. There is talk of the daughter of the present Prime Minister, but whether that is by the desire of the Prime Minister himself or at the suggestion of Lady Oni seems to be uncertain.

The Imperial Household of Japan has presented a carriage and a pair of horses to the Emperor of Korea. This is doubtless a timely gift in view of the fact that the present Sovereign of Korea intends to inaugurate the custom of emerging from the perennial seclusion of the Palace. The ceremony of worshipping at the Imperial Tombs is to be held on the 17th inst., and on that occasion his Majesty is expected to use the carriage presented to him by Japan.

Monday, September 16.

On the 14th inst. a body of insurgents 200 strong attacked the Japanese settlement at Husong. The police resisted gallantly but were unable to make head against their numerous assailants, and in the end the Japanese settlers had to retire. Out of their total number of eleven two were killed, and one policeman is missing. A detachment of troops was immediately despatched to the scene.

From Nokdo in Chollado also comes news of something very like a catastrophe. A small party of Japanese soldiers and policemen who had been despatched from Kusan to look after pirates, was attacked by a large body of insurgents and had a detachment completely destroyed. The number of men who perished is not stated but it was probably small.

Altogether it can not be said that the work of quelling the insurgents is proceeding in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. We have to observe, however, that the disturbance is limited for the most part to two provinces, Chhungchong-do and Chollado, the other regions being comparatively quiet. There is some talk of sending military reinforcements, but the general impression seems to be that this will not be necessary. The fact is that the term "insurgents" is misleading. It would be more correct to say that a number of the disbanded troops, who are without any substantial means of livelihood, have associated themselves with the disorderly spirits whose presence has always made Chollado notorious, and that these bands are engaging in a campaign of pillage and assassination with which patriotism or national feeling has very little connexion. To employ a large force of soldiers against them is scarcely feasible, for the mountainous nature of the region fits it eminently for guerilla warfare, and enables the rioters to find refuges where they are difficult to discover. Of course they will be effectually dealt with in the long run, and equally of course their present doings, so far from benefiting their country, are simply driving so many nails in her coffin.

The Emperor of Korea has had a fall in the precincts of the Palace and has suffered an abrasion of his elbow or his wrist, or his knee, or some other prominent part. The accident seems to have produced a state of consternation in the Palace. Messengers were hastily despatched to procure the best Japanese medical assistance available, but when Mr. Sasaki, the chief physician of the hospital, repaired to the scene, he found that the Imperial patient was suffering merely from a few scratches which one or two days' treatment would cure. This incident has been interpreted as a celestial sign that the proposed expedition of the Emperor to worship at the family tombs and the separation of the dethroned and the reigning Sovereigns, both of which events were to have taken place on the 17th inst., must be postponed or abandoned. It is suggested that this affair may be blessed with the celebrated incident of a certain Minister precipitating himself down a flight of stairs in order to suspend a disagreeable negotiation. Probably the Korean happening was no more designed than the fall of the Minister ultimately proved to be.

When the elder brother of the present Prime Minister of Korea became Minister of the Imperial Household, he vigorously approached the task of cleansing the Augcan stable. Many fine rules were enacted and the crowd of mischievous intriguers who had long infested the palace were driven out. This, however, seems to have been a veritable case of the proverbial new broom. Indeed the last state of the Palace appears to be even worse than the first, for if our posse of miscellanies has been driven out, another has entered in the shape of the relatives and friends of the new Minister. Thus the air is again becoming thick with the ancient troubles. Marguis Ito is supposed to have had this in mind as well as the turbulence of the insurgents when he made his recent speech at Ueno.

The recently circulated rumour that a central bank was about to be established in Korea appears to have been premature at least. The question is said to have been raised, but in view of the signal services hitherto rendered by the First Bank in Korea, and in view of the high place it now occupies, after many years of struggle, in local finances, there is little probability that a rival institution will be set up under official auspices. If anything is done, it will be merely to separate and re-organise the Seoul Branch of this Bank.

The experimental cultivation of cotton in Korea seems to be progressing most favourably. This year's crop will be very much finer than last year's and it has been decided to increase the area under cultivation. The expectation is that in ten years' time this industry will have assumed most important dimensions.

Tuesday, September 17.

It appears that the party whose annihilation at Nokdo was reported on the 16th inst. consisted of 10 men, of whom three were Japanese soldiers, three Japanese police, and four Koreans. They had set out from Kusan as a reconnoitring expedition and they appear to have been surrounded and slaughtered. A party of soldiers was sent out from Kusan immediately on receipt of the news. They found the remains of the murdered men on an island where there were 80 houses but no inhabitants.

Various minor collisions between the insurgents and the Japanese troops are reported. In one case the insurgents, when they fled, left 17 of their number dead upon the field, in another case 19.

It is reported that Prince Yi Chakwi has been degraded on a charge of instigating the insurgents, and that a certain Mr. Pak (we can not read his second name) who is described as an advisor of the Court, has been arrested on a charge of fomenting conspiracy. The Palace intriguers are evidently busy again. They are exerting themselves to prevent the separation of the two Emperors and the sending of the Crown Prince to Japan for educational purposes. The ex-Emperor and Lady Oni are represented as gladly welcoming this interference.

There are conflicting rumours about that notoriously mischievous sheet the Korea Daily News. One report says that its Korean employees, having become publicly known, can no longer attend the newspaper office. This is the version given by the Asahi Shimbun's correspondent, but it is difficult to comprehend or credit. Another tale is told by the Mainichi Shimbun, namely, that the Korean police conducted a search at the office of the newspaper and that its conductor has applied through the British Consul for the protection of the Residency-General. It would be indeed comical if such a journal were taken under the aegis of the British Consul and the Japanese Residency-General.

Wednesday, September 18

It appears that on the 17th inst. the contemplated separation of the two Sovereigns was effected in Seoul in spite of the news received on the 16th inst. to the effect that the conservatives had again succeeded in obstructing this arrangement. The telegrams, however, are so obscure that we can not make out distinctly whether it was the ex-Emperor or the reigning Emperor that moved to a new palace, but at any rate a separation of some sort has taken place.

This morning brings one report of the violent dispersal of a body of 100 insurgents with a loss of 15 killed and 9 wounded, and brings news also of another body of 400 who are preparing to march upon Seoul.

It appears that on the 19th inst. the scheme for the reorganisation of the Residency-General will be submitted to the Privy Council. One important innovation will be the appointment of a Vice-Resident General, having shimin rank. It is expected that General Hasegawa will be the first holder of this post.

Thursday, September 19.

The Hochi Shimbun and the Mainichi Shimbun write in a very alarmist strain about Korea. They allege in effect that the whole country is hopelessly imbued with anti-Japanese feeling. Whenever people meet privately they discuss the possibility of driving out the Japanese, and where secrecy is not certain their wishes are openly centered on maintaining Korean independence. On the other hand, the methods of the insurgents are so adroit that it is almost impossible to lay hands on them. They disappear at the first aspect of danger and come together again like a swarm of flies as soon as the dispersing peril is past. Thus, although the Japanese troops have been working strenuously since the beginning of August they have made little permanent impression, and have certainly accomplished nothing commensurate with the magnitude of their own labours. It will probably be necessary in the end to cut the Gordian knot by a heroic process.

Such in brief is the view put forward by the two journals mentioned above on the strength of alleged information given by an anonymous high official. But the Nichi Nichi writes in a different strain. It gives what professes to be the gist of the remarks recently addressed by Marquis Ito in his secret session at the banquet given in his honour by members of the House of Peers. This version makes his Excellency say that people who advocate the advisability of annexing Korea to Japan take an entirely short-sighted view. Any attempt to proceed along that line would throw the people of Korea into a condition of such frenzy that self-destruction would seem easy to them and endless disturbance would have to be encountered. The true policy is to take for bases of action the maintenance of the Korean Throne and the preservation of Korean independence. As for the emeutes now taking place here and there in the southern provinces, there is no real difficulty in dealing with them—no more difficulty from Japan's point of view than a man finds in raising one arm. The great fear is that agricultural operations will be found to have been seriously interrupted by these troubles. The farmers here and there have sided with the insurgents and use their spades and shovels as weapons of war rather than as implements of tillage. The harvest may suffer proportionately and of course that might dislocate the national finances.

As between the above views there can be little hesitation in accepting that of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, a journal which not only enjoys exceptional sources of information but is also quite trustworthy in matters of politics.

There is curious perplexity about the question of the division of the two Emperors in Korea. Some accounts say that although the scratch or confusion suffered by the reigning Emperor when he slipped recently on a verandah is entirely cured, certain outward evidences of it still remain, and until these have wholly disappeared, his Majesty shrinks from the stupendous effort of travelling half a mile in a sedan chair. Other accounts, and they are apparently credible, allege that the reigning Emperor has actually changed his residence, but that there has been no separation. On the contrary the ex-Emperor and Lady Oni have accompanied his Majesty on the plea of tending his shattered person. It reads like a huge comedy.

MARQUIS ITO ON KOREAN AFFAIRS.

The Municipality and the Business Men of Tokyo gave an entertainment in the Exhibition Buildings of Uyejo Park on the 13th inst. to Marquis Ito. Baron Shibusawa read an address signed by himself, by the Mayor of the City and by the President of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce. It was a highly complimentary address couched in particularly classical language. While acknowledging what a large share in the country's successes must be attributed to the virtues of the Sovereign, the signatories justly insisted that without the great diplomatic skill, remarkable tact and ripe experience of Marquis Ito the Korean affair could not have been settled in such a manner as to secure peace to the Far East and the integrity of Japan. Count Katsura also read an address, in which he spoke of the problems that had disturbed the East throughout the whole of the Meiji Era having now at length been brought within sight of settlement. But he reminded his hearers that much depended upon the method of giving effect to the new Convention, and that great and deserved as was the nation's confidence in Marquis Ito's conspicuous ability and profound experience, the people themselves had a vital part to perform by joining hands and working in genuine unison for the attainment of the desired end. He conjured them not to sacrifice a great result on the altar of petty dissensions.

Marquis Ito in replying disavowed any title to the praise that had been bestowed on him. If any success had been obtained, it was due in the first place to the virtues of the Emperor, in the second to the achievements of the army and navy which had won such great victories, and in the third to the progressive efforts of the nation itself. As for himself he promised to exert to the utmost under the auspices of the country any small talents he might possess. He was not without plans for the future management of Korean affairs, but inasmuch as that country had been since the year before last in a state of disturbance and conspiracy, and since these unfortunate conditions still existed, he hesitated to make any statement of the programme, seeing that circumstances might compel modifications now unforeseen. The point which seemed to him of vital importance was whether Japan would be able to carry out her national policy towards Korea. What was that policy? It was that Japan should guide Korea in the conduct of her domestic and foreign affairs in such a manner as to extricate her from the troubles in which she had been involved for hundreds of years, and to lead her into the path of progress and enlightenment. He did not wish to be understood as saying that the Koreans were an obstinate or unintelligent people, neither did he mean to suggest that Japan had no plans for the future. Nevertheless he could not declare himself to be without apprehension that the Koreans, not accepting the precepts of progress of their own accord and declining to follow the guidance of others, might behave in such a manner as to bring serious trouble upon themselves. Such a result would not be consistent with the wishes of the Emperor of Japan or of her people, nevertheless it was impossible to predict that, in view of the temper and disposition of the Koreans, some such issue might not prove inevitable. The fact that he entertained such an apprehension would lend additional vigour to his endeavours to instruct, enlighten and direct the Korean nation into the only route which could take it to safety and happiness. He trusted implicitly in the assistance of the Japanese nation to grapple with these difficulties and to avert a result which Japan would be the last to welcome.

REWARDS TO FOREIGNERS.

Japanese newspapers announce that high rewards are to be bestowed upon Mr. H. W. Denison, Legal Advisor to the Foreign Office, and upon Mr. D. W. Stevens, hitherto Foreign Advisor to the Korean Government. Mr. Denison's distinguished services in connexion with the war and with the Portsmouth and Peking Treaties are well known, and it will be a source of profound satisfaction to his many friends to learn that due recognition is to be given. Mr. Denison already possesses the First Class Order of the Rising Sun and therefore, so far as Orders are concerned, it is difficult to raise him any higher. He is therefore to receive an honorarium of 10,000 yen together with the annual allowance of 840 yen which accompanies the First Class Order.

Mr. Stevens, whose services in connexion with the war were not so conspicuous, though it is recognised that they were equally solid, is to receive the First Class Order of the Rising Sun and an honorarium of like amount.

CHINA.

Friday, September 13.

We recently translated from Japanese journals a statement which indicated that the number of Chinese youths visiting Japan for educational purposes has largely diminished and that the policy of the Central Government as well as of the local authorities was to discourage, if not to veto, this method of obtaining instruction. It now appears that such accounts were greatly exaggerated. The new Chinese Representative in Tokyo, Mr. Li Chachu, who is to leave Peking on the 14th inst. for the Japanese capital, is reported to have told the Japanese Chargé d'Affaires on the occasion of his farewell visit that the question of putting a stop to the educational movement towards Japan had never been discussed either by the Central Government or by the local administrations. What had been decided was simply that the system of rapid finishing (sokusei) was mischievous as tending simply to the acquisition of a small quantity of superficial knowledge, and ought therefore to be abandoned. This decision, taken by the educational authorities in Peking, had necessarily involved the return of a large number of youths and men who had gone to Tokyo with a view to adopting the sokusei system, and this of course had produced a considerable diminution in the ranks of the students resident in Tokyo. Mr. Li further stated that the Chinese Government had decided to support 160 students annually at public expense in Japan, a fact which suffices to contradict the recently circulated rumours.

Saturday, September 14.

It is stated that Viceroy Hsu, attacked on one side by the censors and unable, on the other, to carry the negotiations with Japan to a successful issue, tendered his resignation, but was induced by his Excellency Yuan to withdraw it.

On the 13th inst., by desire of the Viceroy, the negotiations were reopened at Mukden and a protocol was drafted embodying a settlement of the mines question. It was not signed, however, pending Peking's approval. The salt problem also came upon the tapis, but the views of the negotiators seem to be still at marked variance.

Monday, September 16.

A telegram to the Mainichi Dempo says that Viceroy Chang has entered Peking accompanied by an escort of 500 soldiers and bringing with him 100 youths, sons of the wealthiest families in Hunan, whom he takes to Peking for educational purposes. These details require confirmation.

The insurrection in Kwangtung appears to be spreading. It is reported that a line of telegraph between Lienchow and Kinchow has been cut and that Faucheng has fallen into the hands of the rebels. From these names it will be seen that the locality is the same as that involved in similar trouble during the spring of this year.

Wednesday, September 18.

The Asahi Shinbun's Peking correspondent sends a long telegram about the issue of the Conferences now being held in Peking with reference to administrative reform. Some important decisions have been taken for reference to the Throne, but it is somewhat difficult to follow intelligently the details of the new system. Two salient features are, however, evident. One is that there will be a responsible cabinet; the other that the Empire is to have a national assembly. Thus much is clear, but what we can not distinctly discover from the telegram is whether any new method of appointing the Cabinet Ministers is contemplated. It would seem that such is not the case, and that the portfolio holders will be nominated as at present from among the members of the Council of State. As to the proposed parliament, the idea is to have district assemblies chosen by the people, provincial assemblies chosen by the members of the district assemblies, and a national assembly elected by the members of the provincial assemblies. Nothing is said in the telegram about the most important point, namely, the qualifications for the franchise. It would seem, however, that this system of elective bodies is not to be applied at once throughout the Empire. The people are not considered sufficiently educated for that, and consequently only special cities or towns will be vested with the franchise at the outset, the others being gradually brought within the system. In order to hasten the process of preparation for the franchise, arrangements are to be made for a system of compulsory education pretty much on the lines, so far as we can judge, of those now followed in Japan. The telegram contains a reference to the compilation of textbooks, but this part is somewhat obscure. Reference is also made to the necessity of levelling the barriers between Chinese and Manchus, but apparently it is not thought that anything special can be done to bring about that consummation. The Throne has already published an edict on the subject inviting suggestions and the Imperial will is thus clearly demonstrated.

A representation containing the above suggestions was to have been made to the Throne on the 18th inst. and doubtless an imperial edict of great importance will soon be published. Viceroy Yuan is practically the author of the whole scheme. It was mapped out in his recent memorial, and the system of local government inaugurated by him in Tientsin is to be taken as a model. It appears, however, that Viceroy Chang has not had anything to do with the elaboration of this programme. The Conferences had been going on in Peking for some time before his arrival, and he therefore refrained from attending them in their last stages. It might be supposed from this that the old Viceroy would range himself against Yuan's proposals with more or less determination, but that does not appear to be likely, for the present at all events. The intelligence is that when, on his arrival in Peking, Chang had audience of the Throne, he submitted three counsels. The first was that talk of preparations for constitutional government should be replaced by action; the second, that harmony and co-operation were indispensable among high officials; and the third, that too great severity should not be exercised in dealing with insurgents. The second of these suggestions is very pregnant, especially as the dissensions which have hitherto been supposed to exist between Viceroy Yuan's party and its opponents in the capital are said to have been all composed.

Thursday, September 19.

It seems not improbable that the old question of the succession to the Chinese Throne may prove an obstacle to the consummation of the reform movement by introducing a side issue leading to a conflict between the two great Viceroys, Yuan and Chang. The candidates spoken of for the position of Crown Prince are, on the one hand, Tsai Feng, commonly known as Prince Chun, and on the other Pu-tai, known as Prince Kung, and Pu lun. These three candidates are all grand-children or great-grand-children of the Emperor Tao-kuang. The first, namely, Prince, Chun, has a reputation for high character. But he is understood to be without any political ambition and to be addicted solely to study. His father is a pupil of Viceroy Chang, whose great literary attainments are largely responsible for the high position he occupies in China, and consequently this candidate has the support of the renowned Viceroy. He is also said to be favoured by the Empress Dowager. The other two candidates are believed to be favoured by ex-Viceroy Yuan, and it is in this difference of opinion that a source of collision between the two leading statesmen may be found.

It is stated that the Legislative Council in Hongkong has passed the first reading of a bill for vetoing the issue of pamphlets or other prints calculated to foment disturbance or rebellion in China. Shanghai sends this telegram. It means of course that the Council applies these restrictive measures within the limits of its jurisdiction, and we do not doubt that every moderate person must endorse such action. The case of Seoul is vividly recalled to mind by this intelligence. If it is right to veto within the colony of Hongkong the publication of seditious matter calculated to disturb the peace and good order of the neighbouring Chinese Empire, why should it be right to abstain from imposing any such restriction on the publication of such matter in the Korean Capital under the auspices of British consular jurisdiction? The colony of Hongkong is British territory in every sense of the word, but we are concerned here only with the fact that Great Britain exercises legal control over the acts of its inhabitants. From that point of view British subjects in Korea are equally under the control of the mother country, since they are exempt from the operation of Korean laws or from the exercise of Korean jurisdiction. Therefore what calls for legal restraint in Hongkong in the interests of China's domestic peace, calls equally for legal restraint in Seoul in the interests of Korea's domestic peace. Yet there is published in the Korean capital a paper owned and edited by a British subject, printed in the vernacular and teeming, day after day, with matter eminently calculated to stir up strife and to incite violence and murder. It is difficult to understand the immunity enjoyed by this mischievous sheet. Could we revert to the days of Sir Harry Parkes the evil would soon be eradicated, but under the existing regime it flourishes unrestrained. Of course the Korean authorities themselves are not wholly irresponsible. It can not be doubted that they possess the right to legislate for the control of all newspapers printed in the Korean language and circulated within the limits of the Korean Empire, nor can it be doubted that if they took their courage in both hands and did actually so legislate, they could easily obtain the essential co-operation of the British Consular Authorities. Somebody, however, has to take the initiative.

Dr. Morrison, the Peking correspondent of The Times, raises the question of the future of Wei-hai-wei in a forcible telegram to his journal. This is his presentation of the case:—

For some time past I have been visiting among other places in North China the British port and leased territory of Wei-hai-wei. The possession is small in territorial extent, but is one presenting a remarkable illustration of the British genius for governing Asiatics. The opinion is widely held in the Far East that the time has come when the British Government should announce its intention as to the future of the port. The present uncertainty stifles all development and causes constant misunderstanding.

England holds the port so long as Port Arthur remains in the occupation of another Power. The original convention specified Russia as the other Power, but China has since, by the Treaty of December 22, 1905, consented that all the rights and privileges granted to Russia in Port Arthur should be transferred and assigned to Japan. It is well known that Japan is opposed to our withdrawal from the port and approved our intimation to China that we should not withdraw. Moreover, the Chinese have no reason to be dissatisfied with the present arrangement. They have free use of the harbour for their ships and retain jurisdiction within the walled city of Wei-hai-wei. Why, then, can not our Foreign Office give the requisite assurance to the British in China that Wei-hai-wei will continue a British possession? The port has great advantages as a sanatorium both for our Navy and our subjects in China, who now, uncertain of the future, hesitate to invest money there and re-visit instead during the summer to the German port of Tsing-tau or to sanatoria on Chinese soil, to the great enrichment of these places.

Every Englishman who before the present uncertainty invested money in Wei-hai-wei did so under the direct encouragement of official statements in the House of Commons that Wei-hai-wei would be held so long as other Powers held similar leases of Chinese territory, yet when the British community on June 1, 1905, petitioned for information as to the future they had to wait ten months for a reply. Even then, on March 21 last, Lord Elgin evaded a direct answer and refused to discuss "hypothetical cases" but curtly informed the colonists that "whatever contingency may arise the British Government could not entertain any claim of compensation to firms or individuals who have invested money in Wei-hai-wei."

The present policy is regarded in the Far East as illogical. If the British Government will announce its intention to retain Wei-hai-wei industries will be started and the colony will quickly prosper. If the Government is prepared to restore possession to China, the Chinese Government would certainly engage to compensate the residents who had invested money there while the port was under the British flag.

While the International Peace Conference is sitting at The Hague, it is interesting to note, writes the Rev. G. Owen in the I. M. S. Chronicle, that China was the scene of the first Peace Conference recorded in history. "The Conference met in the capital of the State of Sung in the year 545 B.C. China at that time consisted of a number of feudal States under the kings of Chow. Theoretically, all were in favour of peace, but jealousies and suspicions were rife. Each State feared that the other might be false to the covenant, and in consequence two of the larger States, though accepting the principles of the League, refused to take the oath. The remaining twelve, however, bound themselves by solemn League and covenant to settle all disputes by law, not war. Alas! the old ambitions and the sword was again the arbitrator. What was impossible in 545 B.C. should be possible in 1907 A.D."

Viceroy Chang Chih-tung was expected to leave Hankow for Peking on the afternoon of Sept. 10th. It is stated that his Excellency is determined not to accept the Grand Councillorship and has told those around him in Wu-chang that he will retire into private life if coerced by the Central Government.

Since his arrival in Peking Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai has for the third time (two previous applications having been shelved by the Ministry of War, to which they were handed by the Throne for report) sent a memorial to the Throne asking for rewards for the civil and military officers who, under trying conditions, had been able to keep the neutrality of China intact in Manchuria and in Chihli. On this occasion he was successful, for an Imperial Rescript has been issued commanding that all the persons recommended by Yuan Shih-kai shall receive promotion in the manner suggested by the memorialist. Tieh Liang has consequently sent in his resignation of the Ministry of War.

A Peking dispatch states that H. E. Yang Shih-shiang has promised H. E. Yuan Shih-kai (his patron) that he will continue the enlightened and reforming policy of the latter in the Viceroyalty of Chihli. It is needless, perhaps, to state that it was for this very reason that Viceroy Yuan was induced to recommend his protégé to take his place in Chihli for the time being.

Liang Ting-fen, Provincial Judge of Hupeh, has denounced to the Throne in a memorial Prince Ching, Yuan Shih-kai, Tieh Liang, Hsi Shih-chang and T'ang Shao-yi whom he accuses of incapability in dealing with the affairs of the nation. The memorial met the fate it deserved at their Majesties' hands, that is to say, it was shelved. It is known, says the writer of Notes on Native Affairs in the N. C. Daily News, that Liang Ting-fen wrote the memorial to please his patron, Chang Chih-tung. It is an open secret that Chang Chih-tung is jealous of the high officials mentioned in his protégé's memorial.

A native correspondent, writing to the China Times says in part:—"It is noteworthy that there was not one Manchu official among the Viceroys and Governors allotted new posts in consequence of the appointment of Yuan Shih-kai and Chang Chih-tung. This action of the Peking Government is undoubtedly intended to show to the Chinese revolutionaries that the Throne is exerting itself to suppress the racial prejudices of the Manchu and the Chinese. It is believed in purely Chinese official circles in Peking, that at least one-half of the vacated posts would have been given to Manchu authorities had the race question not cropped up. The Government allows Viceroy Tuan Fang to remain in his important post at Nanking because he can do something towards the suppression of the revolutionaries in the Yangtze Valley, where they are endeavouring to upset the Manchu Dynasty in the hope of putting a purely Chinese Emperor on the Throne. In the Waiwupu, Viceroy Yuan is ranked as the third Minister, for Prince Ching and Na Tung are his seniors; while in the Grand Council of State, H. E. is the last, as there are five Ministers in the former office and six in the latter. It is very doubtful whether H. E. Yuan can perform his new duties with as free a hand as he had in Tientsin during the last five years. Viceroy Chang Chih-tung's position in the Grand Council is similar to his colleague Yuan."

Owing to the news that H. I. M. Kuang Hsi is suffering from a serious illness, the various Viceroys and Governors of provinces have written to Peking recommending certain distinguished physicians who are willing and able to prescribe for His Majesty. Late news from the Capital hints at the condition of the Emperor being "most serious, in consequence of which much anxiety is felt at Court."

Owing to the firm stand made by H. E. Lu Ch'eng-hsiang that China ought to have a representative on The Hague Arbitration Tribunal who should hold the seat for a term of twelve years, says the N. C. Daily News, the various representatives of the Powers on the Tribunal have written to their respective Governments recommending that China shall be allowed to do so. The proposal of H. E. Lu Ch'eng-hsiang was, it is said, at first refused.

Published minutes of the committee of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce show that on Aug. 31st and Sept. 6th respectively the Committee protested to the Japanese Consul-General and the Hongkong General Chamber of Commerce against the declaration of quarantine by Japan and Hongkong against Shanghai on account of cholera. The Japanese Government on being cabled to replied that it did not think it desirable as yet to withdraw the quarantine. No reply had been received from Hongkong. The contention of the Shanghai Committee is that the disease is endemic.

The Hongkong Telegraph of Sept. 6th says:—"We regret to announce the death, which occurred late last night, of Mr. E. E. Pittar Erskine, who had for many years been engaged in journalism in the Far East. Mr. Erskine, like most journalists, had led a roving life although he did not originally engage in newspaper work. He had spent several years in India, and in the course of his travels visited Japan, where he worked in Nagasaki, and Manila. A few years ago he came to Hongkong and became associated with the Editorial Department of the Hongkong Telegraph. He made many friends, and his death is deeply regretted by those who were his colleagues. The funeral took place at the Protestant Cemetery this afternoon." Mr. Erskine resided in Nagasaki for many months and temporarily edited the Nagasaki Press in the summer of 1903.

A dastardly attempt to wreck the train by which H. E. Chang Chih-tung had previously decided to travel was brought to light two days ago, the Hankow Daily News of Sept. 10th says, when near the 110 kilometre station a huge rock, weighing approximately half a ton, was discovered on the line. Every precaution has been taken to ensure H. E.'s safety and a pilot engine will precede the special train.

PUBLIC MANNERS IN ENGLAND.

Something more than a passing interest has been aroused in England by a discussion opened by a half-penny paper as to the alleged decay of good manners on the part of railway servants, public motor drivers, tram conductors, etc. It was soon demonstrated that there were two sides to the question. One party averred that on the London tube railways the rudeness of the officials could only be paralleled with that prevailing on the New York railroads, while others declared that compared with a dozen years ago there is a distinct advance to be noted towards greater consideration for the weak and politeness generally. The latter party are evidently nearer the truth than the former, for apart from the question of the behaviour of particular classes of public servants there can be little doubt that a very wholesome change has come over public manners in England during the past quarter of a century. England has a long way to go yet before she can produce such self-effacing orderly and considerate crowds as are the rule, not the exception, in Japan, but just as fast as the British national drink bill decreases in volume so does the nation advance in the gentle arts of politeness and consideration for one another. The Globe discusses the point in connection with the manners displayed by the crowds which go aplesasuring on August Bank holiday and says that "no one of middle-age can have failed to observe the immense improvement which, when all is said and done, characterises the demeanour of holiday-makers compared with what it was, say, twenty years ago. There is indeed the same pushing and crowding and noise, but there is infinitely more consideration for the weak, and a good deal less of the talk which makes angels weep. Above all, there is a vast decrease in the drunkenness which used to make Bank Holidays such a curse. The records of the police-courts prove it, and it is becoming possible to look forward to a time when to return drunk from a holiday outing will be thought as strange and as disgraceful as to come back without clothes. When a man gets drunk on Bank Holiday he is now, nine times out of ten, found to be someone of middle age, who has not freed himself from the evil tradition. The young folks at any rate keep sober, and that is perhaps the most encouraging sign of our times."

On the evening of Sept. 15th, two severe shocks of earthquake were felt at Muroran, Hokkaido.

FINANCIAL AND BUSINESS NOTES.

Friday, September 13.

Mr. Soyeda, President of the Industrial Bank, has just returned to Japan from his tour in the West. Interviewed at Moji, he spoke of England being still the financial centre of the world, and said that the United States goes to London to borrow money just as Japan does, the only difference being that whereas the former deals in hundreds of millions of dollars, the latter's applications do not exceed tens of millions. Mr. Soyeda confirms what we have often said, namely that there is no real difficulty in obtaining foreign capital for Japan. If English capitalists are convinced that an enterprise is sound and productive, they will give their money readily enough provided that reasonable terms are offered. He predicts that many other French capitalists will come to Japan in addition to the Loonen Syndicate, and he speaks with much appreciation of the facilities extended to him in London for the purposes of the South Manchurian Railway loan.

Mr. Sakatani, Minister of State for Finance, has gone to Osaka to attend the examination of the pyx at the Mint and to be present at the official opening of the works for harbour purposes at Kobe. His Excellency will push his journey thence to Maizuru, which there is talk of converting into an open port, and to Tsuruga. Mr. Sakatani alluded with much satisfaction to the recent floating of a loan for the Dai Nippon Sugar Refinery by a syndicate of banks. This is the first instance of such procedure in Japan, common as it is in Europe, and the Minister hopes that such an excellent device has now come to stay. He considers that the deposits in the Japanese banks have increased and show signs of increasing, to an almost excessive extent, and that the banks should urge their depositors to respond to sound calls for capital.

The Shogyo Shimpō, in connexion with the 220th day, has procured reports from numerous districts throughout the Empire as to the state of the rice crop. Only five reports out of the whole number indicate an unfavourable state of affairs, and it may therefore be fairly assumed that the yield will be considerably above the average. The 220th day passed off most satisfactorily. With the exception of a few local showers the weather was everywhere bright and fine.

These conditions made themselves felt on the Stock Exchange on the 12th inst. There was a general rise in quotations, though it did not present any precipitate features. Rice continues to decline in price and is expected to go down still further.

Saturday, September 14.

There has been formed in Korea by a Mr. Oka, of the Yanaguchi Engyo Kaisha, and 14 Japanese residents of Fusan, a company called the Chosen Yusen Kaisha. The object is to provide water-carriage for the ports along the southern coast of the Peninsula and for the rivers. The capital of the Company is a million yen and it is said to have applied to the Korean Government through the Residency General for a subsidy of 25,000 yen annually.

A great deal of interest attaches to the steamship Tenyo Maru which was launched from the Mitsu Bishi Building Yard at Nagasaki on the forenoon of the 14th inst. She is regarded as a proof that the extraordinary strides made in Japanese naval architecture since the outbreak of the war with Russia have extended into the realm of commercial ship-building also. Prior to 1904 Japanese shipwrights had not attempted to build anything larger than small frigates and despatch boats, but they suddenly rose to the task of constructing line-of-battleships and first-class cruisers. It did not immediately appear that the same signal progress would be witnessed in the realm of merchant ship-building also. But the Tenyo Maru is a clear proof to the contrary. Her biggest predecessor was the Tango Maru of 7,000 tons, whereas the Tenyo Maru is 18,000 tons and has a contract speed of 18 knots. Thus owing to the indefatigable enterprise and courage of the Mitsu Bishi Japan has risen within the course of a very few years to the position of a first-class shipbuilding nation.

The operation of returning the 16 millions sterling that remain out of Japan's high-interest-bearing foreign debt commenced on the 10th inst. in London and New York simultaneously. The telegraph says that a most excellent effect was produced and that Japan's credit stands higher than ever.

The Yorodan Choho writes that the Tokyo Railway Company is expected to pay a dividend of 9.2 per cent. for the second half of the current year. The Company's greatest earnings were in March, April and May, the three opening months of the Exhibition, but they fell off in June, July and August. Nevertheless the returns for September, October and November will probably be such as to warrant the above dividend. It seems to us that whatever may be the case with the dividend, the figures given by our contemporary as representing daily averages are below the mark, so we refrain from quoting them.

The Industrial Bank announces an issue of 2½ million yen worth of debentures at 6 per cent. repayable in ten years. The object of this issue is to pay back debentures formerly issued and now falling due. The total of these latter debentures is 2,900,000 yen, but as the Deposits Bureau of the Finance Department renews its subscription of 1,350,000 yen, there remains only 1,550,000 to be returned. The difference between this latter figure and 2½ millions is needed by the Bank for other purposes.

Various estimates are published as to the rice crop. The best authorities place it at 48,222,904 koku as against 43,865,849 koku for an average year. But of course much depends upon the weather for the next few days and the present low temperature is decidedly unfavourable.

The Shogyo Shimpō says that the great depression which has existed for some months in trade circles in Tokyo now shows signs of mending. The recent inundations and the consequent injury suffered by the silk crop as well as other damage caused a setback, but the prospects of the rice crop, the excellent results obtained from spring sericulture and various other factors contribute to improve the situation, so that a revival of business enterprise has already begun to be evident and will probably continue if nothing untoward happens.

The same paper continues its analysis of the factors which make for the long depression in the share market. Seven-tenths of the result are attributable, in our contemporary's opinion, to the nervousness caused by the perpetual decline in quotations since March last. People have not yet recovered from their alarm, or discovered that the phantom which makes them shudder is nothing more than the touch of a plum blossom by moonlight, as the proverb has it. There are two minor factors, namely, the unsettled state of the foreign money markets, and the disquieting policy of Japanese financiers who, while openly disavowing any intention of incurring further liabilities, include in the State's resources the proceeds of a domestic loan. As to the latter of these factors, however, its effect is greatly weakened by recently published figures which show that the country's resources are rapidly developing and that the proceeds of taxation are a perceptibly growing quantity. At all events these minor factors are indeed minor. The great trouble is the nervous fever from which men are suffering. Such a state of affairs is most injurious to development in general, and the Shogyo hopes that it will not be of much longer duration.

The Tokyo Stock Exchange justified the above analysis of its nervous mood on the 13th inst., when the upward tendency of the previous two days received a sudden check. This is attributed partly to apprehensions that the rice crop may be injured by the present low temperature, but mainly to the fact that speculators are entirely without confidence, and that no sooner does the market go up a little, than they hasten to realize a profit however petty. It may almost be said that quotations have remained unaltered during the whole of the first half of the present month. There has never been any such experience previously on the Tokyo Stock Exchange.

Sunday, September 15.

The principal insurance companies are rapidly discharging their liabilities in connexion with the Hakodate fire. They do not appear to be experiencing any of the difficulties predicted at the time of the catastrophe. As to the minor companies, however, nothing is yet definitely known. One of them, at all events, is said to be much embarrassed. Its debts on account of the fire aggregate 200,000 yen; its reserves amount to only 120,000, and there is no apparent possibility of making a further successful call on the shareholders. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce will probably have to step in and compel payment.

The issue of debentures by a syndicate of banks on account of the Dai Nippon Sugar Refinery is said to be proceeding most satisfactorily. The great capitalists have not yet stepped in, but numerous small applications have been received, and it is confidently expected that the sum required will be largely over-subscribed. The rate of interest, 7 per cent., and the excellence of the security are naturally very tempting.

The Kwangyo Ginko has decided to issue three million yen worth of prize-bearing debentures. The denomination of the debentures will be ten yen and subscriptions will be invited from the 1st of November to the 10th of December. There will be 75 first-prizes of 500 yen each, and 250 second prizes of 100 yen each, the other prizes remaining as usual.

The directors and brokers of the Tokyo Stock Exchange held a meeting on the 14th instant to devise means for improving the business of the Exchange. They decided that a special class of brokers should be appointed for dealing with spot transactions and they passed a report presented by the Committee as to the enlargement of the Exchange and other cognate matters. They further resolved that when shares are sold for delivery at a fixed period, the shares themselves being handed over by the seller, arrangements should be made for immediately paying to him a part of the price, money for that purpose being taken from the funds at the disposal of the Exchange or obtained from the banks. It was further proposed that the two sessions now held daily should be reduced to one, in view of the project for increasing spot transactions. Of course none of these propositions could be actually declared law by such a meeting. All that could be done was to hand them to a committee for examination and report. Another meeting is to be held on the 17th instant.

On Saturday the Stock Exchange was fairly firm in the forenoon, but in the afternoon the tone was decidedly weak. The unseasonable cold of the weather is evidently causing uneasiness.

No decision has yet been come to with regard to the new harbour at Ofunado. Surveys are being made by a body of engineers not only with reference to the harbour but also with reference to a railway leading to it from Kurosawajiri. Until these surveys and reports are finished the question must remain in abeyance.

Japanese bonds continue to appreciate in the European market. This is attributed in the first place to the increased credit resulting from the recent redemption of the 6 per cent. securities, and in the second to the growth of an easier feeling in the market.

Monday, September 16.

The Mainichi Dempo has an article which conveys the impression of being very opportune. It relates to the industry of sugar refining in Japan, and it arrives at the conclusion that the products of the Hongkong works will ultimately be driven out of the field by the Japanese. According to our contemporary's statement, the Hongkong factories turn out only 350 tons of sugar daily, and the inferior water used at the refineries impairs the quality of the sugar. On the other hand, the three companies which have united to form the Dai Nippon Seito Kaisha are able to turn out 750 tons daily, and as a superior quality is claimed for their sugar, they expect to capture completely the markets of northern China and Korea.

Tuesday, September 17.

It is stated that Mr. Matsukata Kojiro, of the Kawasaki Dock's Company, who proceeded recently to England in company with Mr. Inouye Kakugoro, has succeeded in effecting an arrangement with Messrs. Armstrong, Vickers and Company for a supply of capital which will be devoted to extending the works. The idea of the great British firm is that this should be the beginning of united Anglo-Japanese ship-building enterprise. There is, however, one difficulty in the way, namely, that according to the Japanese Law for the encouragement of Navigation and Ship-building, the shareholders of a company which constructs ships eligible for a State subsidy must be Japanese subjects. Messrs. Armstrong, Vickers and Company are therefore precluded from holding shares in the Kawasaki Dock Yard, though of course they can send experts to assist in the work carried on there. They will therefore furnish the loan, which amounts to 10 million yen, in the form of debentures. The terms are said to be very favourable to the Dock Yard, and that is not difficult to understand, for of course there will accrue to the British Company advantages not represented by the mere arithmetic of the loan.

The representatives of a powerful Belgian Syndicate are now in Japan, where they are said to be visiting important works and generally investigating the industrial conditions of the country. The object of this Syndicate is said to be, not so much the lending of money, as the starting of joint or independent enterprises in the fields of mining and manufacture.

We read in the Asahi Shinbun that the glass works at Osaka projected by Mr. Loonen are now approaching completion and that work will commence there at the end of November. The capital of the concern is 1½ million yen, and it will confine itself at first to a manufacture of bottles which will be produced at the rate of 80,000 a day. Later on, the production of window glass will be commenced, the very newest type of machinery being used, machinery on account of which it is claimed that it enables three men to do the work hitherto performed by eight. This machinery has not yet arrived in Japan but is expected to come soon.

With regard to the idea of the French Syndicate to introduce into Japan the new French machine for consolidating building sites, the same paper says that the enterprise will be commenced in the first place on an experimental scale by a company with a capital of 300,000 yen, one-third of which will probably be put up by Japanese. The company's appellation is not yet fixed, but two names are spoken of: one is the "Compressor Company," the other the "Toyo Doko-kaisha." It is expected that one of the compressor machines will reach Tokyo in November or December and experiments will be conducted with a view to exhibiting its capacities.

Among the various enterprises projected at the close of last year and in the beginning of the present, so many of which have fallen through or are on the verge of abandonment, one is said to have survived and to be within sight of consummation, namely, the establishment of a new bank called the Hokoku Ginko (country enriching bank). It is to have a capital of 10 million yen and the subscription list is now said to be full. Mr. Hamaguchi is spoken of as the probable president, and the company is reported to have already bought up the Shinyo Ginko (Trust Bank) of Hamamatsu in Shizuoka. The projectors claim that their institution will rank with the Mitsu Bishi and Mitsu Banks.

The five principal insurance companies which were hit by the Hakodate conflagration are said to have virtually discharged all their liabilities without experiencing any difficulty. But for the smaller companies nothing appears to be yet definitely known about their doings, with one exception, namely, the Nisshu Company, to which we alluded in a recent issue. This comparatively new firm becomes liable for 200,000 yen and is not possessed of anything like that sum. Tokyo papers say that the directors are contemplating a very crooked device, namely, to transfer their existing policies—apart of course from the Hakodate ones—to a new company and thus to reduce the old concern to the position of the vacuus viator.

The Department of Agriculture and Commerce, however, is likely to have a say in this matter.

It is explained that the additions and improvements contemplated by the directors of the Tokyo Stock Exchange are not novelties in the strict sense of the term, but are merely parts of the programme of reform which the Company had in view when it increased its capital some months ago by 8 million yen. There is to be a new building devoted entirely to the transaction of spot operations, and the old building is to be enlarged, besides being considerably improved in the matters of accommodation and equipment. As for the project of making advances to sellers who put up actual scrip, this is not altogether new. Such a practice has actually existed hitherto with regard to Government bonds, and the idea now is to extend it to all kinds of shares. It is further stated that the number of brokers (seventy) now borne on the roll will be increased by 50, and that the security money put up by each will be reduced from 10,000 yen to 5,000. It seems a little incongruous that all these sweeping changes should come up for actual consummation at a moment when the Stock Exchange is so depressed as it is at present.

According to the Jiji Shimpō the fever of company-forming which raged so strongly at the close of last year and the beginning of the present, has now been replaced by a fever of the opposite kind, namely, company dissolving. The reason for this new mania is thus described. For example, the original projectors of a company buy up the share rights at a figure much below the amount of the bargain money paid up on each share, thus becoming creditors of the company to the extent of the bargain money. They then agitate for the dissolution of the company, and if they can effect that, they find themselves richer by the difference between the bargain money actually in the company's coffers and the price paid by them for the share rights. It is a wholesome thing that all bubble concerns should come to grief, and no-one would be very sympathetic with the sufferings of their shareholders, but as the Jiji rightly says, this new mania may lead to the dissolution of enterprises which deserve a better fate.

The Tokyo Stock Exchange underwent a further depression on the 16th inst. The continued cold snap was probably the principal cause, but the downward example was set by the new shares of the Tanko Steamship Company which dropped suddenly more than five points, owing to the fact that these shares are disadvantageously dealt with in the directors' appropriation of the money paid by the Treasury for the purchase of the former Tanko lines of railway. It is absurd that all securities should suffer in sympathy with the fortuitous misfortune of one special company's shares, but that sheep-like tendency has prevailed on the Stock Exchange for some months.

Wednesday, September 18.

For some months past there has been talk of a municipal loan of 8 million yen to be raised by the city of Nagoya for carrying out certain public works. It is stated that the programme elaborated by the municipality for the re-payment of the money did not meet with the approval of either the Department of Home Affairs or the Department of Finance, and that consequently the operation was suspended. At any rate the present time is not suitable for floating a foreign loan of such a nature, and it is said that Nagoya has determined to obtain the sum required for immediate wants, namely one million yen, by issuing debentures to be taken up by domestic banks.

It is stated that the Industrial Bank's issue of debentures to the extent of 2½ millions of yen promises to be eminently successful. As a mere investment this loan is not very tempting, the rate of interest being only 6 per cent. but as the bonds rank with Government securities and can therefore be applied to purposes for which ordinary bonds or shares are not available, they tempt investors.

We read in the Mainichi Dempo that a strong movement is on foot to secure to all foreigners in Korea, without distinction of nationality, the privilege of owning real estate. It would seem, however, that this is not contemplated except in the case of those who agree to abandon consular jurisdiction.

It is alleged that Mr. Amenomiya and his friends are again about to approach the Government with their scheme for an electric railway between Osaka and Tokyo. This project has been twice rejected but its promoters are not discouraged. They are understood to contend that the State Railways are not at all adequate to satisfy the transport requirements of the nation, and that great quantities of goods are lying piled up awaiting carriage. They have also ascertained, it is rumoured, that the Government contemplates granting the application of Viscounts Soga and Hotta for a similar but shorter railway under somewhat different conditions. We should think it highly improbable that this application will be successful.

It is exceedingly difficult to form any clear idea about the tendency of the business world of Japan as a whole at the present juncture. One day the talk is all of dissolving companies and abandoning embryonic enterprises; the next day one hears of new companies started or of old ones increasing their capital. Thus we now find in the Kokumin Shinbun a statement that the total capital of companies organised during August was 27,050,000 yen, and the sum represented by increases of capital on account of old companies was 19,417,000 yen, making a total of 46,467,000 yen for the month. If these figures be added to previous records, it results that the capital of companies newly organised in the period between July 1905 and August 1907, inclusive, aggregated 1,238,000 yen, and the increases of capital made by old companies represented 514,099,000 yen, the grand total being 1,752,387,000 yen.

We read in Tokyo papers that owing to the strenuous exertions of Mr. Tsunoda Shimpei, Chairman of the City Improvement Committee, the work of improving Tokyo is proceeding with unprecedented rapidity. Special difficulties had to be contended with in making arrangements for widening the principal streets of the capital between Nihonbashi and Yorozyubashi. Many of the people residing in this populous quarter were unwilling to give up even a portion of the land which had descended in their families through several generations, and it was a perplexing problem to break down their conservatism. But they have gradually come to appreciate the advantages of good roads and good drains, and they are now rapidly falling into line with the improvements programme.

The 17th inst. saw a continuance of depressed conditions on the Tokyo Stock Exchange although there was a slight rally towards the closing hour owing to some restoration of confidence in climatic conditions. As a matter of fact the transactions recorded on the Stock Exchange are now almost entirely speculative, scarcely any operations in real shares taking place, and when they do take place the quotations given by the brokers are not sufficient to effect purchases.

Thursday, September 19.

Frequent allusions have recently been made to the dissolution of companies formed during the recent boom and very conflicting accounts have been given. The Nichi Nichi Shinbun now publishes figures which profess to have been compiled by the Bank of Japan. They show that 62 companies have been actually dissolved or are on the point of dissolution. The capital of those in the former category is 109,120,000 yen and the capital of those in the latter category 29,450,000 yen, making a grand total of 138,570,000 yen. This is the record for the five months which commenced in April and ended in August. The names of all these 62 companies are published. Probably those in which foreign shareholders were most interested are the Oriental Beer Company and the Toyo Beer Company.

Some interest attaches to the Ina Electric Railway, which was projected at the end of last year. So well was this project received by the public at the time of its inception that its 30,000 shares were subscribed several times over, and certainly it seemed a promising enterprise, for the idea was to run the line from Iida in Shinshu to Tatsuno on the Central Railway; in other words, to make it a means of transporting the large silk products of that region. But since that time doubts have arisen among the shareholders as to the correctness of the original estimates, and there is a strong movement on foot to bring about the dissolution of the company. The question will come up for final decision at a general meeting on the 30th inst.

The Tokyo Stock Exchange reflected the gloomy condition of the weather on the afternoon of the 18th inst. There had been a slight recovery of tone in the forenoon but the deluges of rain that fell in the afternoon and false reports as to the direction which the storm was taking led to much unloading and a consequent decline of quotations. The Exchange seems to be just now very dependant on the prospects of the rice crop, though such considerations did not produce much effect last year.

THE CHIENTAO QUESTION.

The discussion of this question has commenced in Peking between Mr. Na Tung of the Waiwupu and Mr. Abe, Japanese Chargé d'Affaires. At the first meeting the conference did not go beyond a mutual statement of claims. The Chinese official contended that Lieut.-Col. Saito and his party of gendarmes—whom Mr. Na described as 300 soldiers—should not have been sent to Chientao without previous reference to China and that their immediate withdrawal was essential. This argument was plainly based upon the assumption that the whole of Chientao is Chinese territory, a proposition which Mr. Abe strenuously combated. He took the ground that the boundary question is at all events unsettled, that a large number of Korean subjects are residing within the region, that they do not enjoy security of life and property in the presence of constant raids by the Hungtutz, and that it is Japan's duty to protect them, that function having been delegated to her by the Korean Sovereign. The conference does not appear to have led to anything further. Meanwhile Viceroy Hsu of Manchuria, recognising the gravity of the problem, has appointed Mr. Tao, a Japanese speaking Chinaman, to be Chihhsien of Chientao. It seems to have been a mistake to say that the Chinese authorities had despatched a military force to Chientao. This rumour had its origin in the fact that the arrival of Colonel Saito with his gendarmes was greatly exaggerated in the official reports sent to Mukden and Peking. In short Japan was represented as having opened the ball by an armed demonstration, and Viceroy Hsu accordingly instructed the Governor of Kilin to have a force in readiness for despatch to Chientao at any moment. The error of these reports having been subsequently demonstrated, the military phase of the matter is no longer prominent.

DOMESTIC LOANS.

In the budget for 1905-6 there appeared a sum of 79 million yen to be raised by floating a domestic loan for the purpose of various undertakings, and in the following year's budget another sum of 39 millions was similarly included. Neither of these loans has yet been floated. It will be remembered that, by including the former among its available assets last year, the Treasury exposed itself to considerable criticism, the critics taking the ground that in any case borrowed money ought to be treated as such, and especially that when the money had not yet been actually procured, it should not be set down in the revenue column. There has been a good deal of interest of late as to what course the Government will pursue with regard to these two loans. Only six months of the present fiscal year remain, and if the Government had any intention of floating either the 79 million or the 39 million one before the next budget is passed, further delay would be out of the question. It is now gathered, however, that neither of the loans will be put upon the market this year. The settled accounts for 1905-6 showed a surplus of 50 million yen, 35 millions of which were absorbed for the purposes of the current year's budget and the remaining 15 millions were carried over. To these 15 millions has to be added a further sum of 40 or 50 millions which is expected to stand to the Treasury's credit when the accounts for 1907-8 are made up, and in view of these surpluses it will be possible to dispense with any domestic loans, for the present at all events.

THE "MINNESOTA."

A Seattle telegram to the Manila American says that the Great Northern liner Minnesota arrived there on August 20th with her coal bunkers on fire. The fire had been discovered a week previously but the measures taken to control it were so effective that little damage was done. The Minnesota is now on her way back to Yokohama, with Mr. and Mrs. Taft, General Edwards, and the new American Ambassador to Japan, Mr. O'Brien, on board.

MANCHURIA.

It appears that the violent demeanour of the Chinese towards the Japanese is not limited by any means to northern Manchuria. In the south of China also there are evidences of strongly antagonistic feeling. It will be remembered that in February, 1906, the Fuhkien branch of the West Hongwan Temple in Kyoto was wrecked by a Chinese mob, and a similar outrage took place in the spring of the current year in Kwangtung, but although indemnification was demanded by Japan China has not yet consented. On the top of these incidents there now comes news of a strange affair at Changte in the same province. The facts, as related by Japanese newspapers, bear a certain resemblance to some of the happenings that have been recorded in other parts of China where Roman Catholics were concerned. At this place, Changte, there is a branch temple of the West Hongwan, and it is said to have obtained numerous converts. Among the latter and the people of the locality some dispute recently arose, and the converts, carrying their case to the chief priest of the Temple, Mr. Matsujima Shise, asked him to intervene. Knowing how much trouble had already been caused in China by injudicious interferences on the part of religious propagandists, the priest refused to take any action, but was finally induced to send a letter to the district magistrate, simply stating the facts of the case and asking that it should be inquired into. Receiving no answer, Mr. Matsujima visited the Yamen of the Chilsien on the 22nd of August, and asked to have the case adjudicated. While he was actually in conversation with the magistrate the latter's runners and other subordinates fell upon the Japanese priest, belaboured him with bamboos, kicked him and otherwise maltreated him. He appealed in vain to the magistrate for protection, but the Chilsien made no effort to afford it and the priest barely escaped with his life. This is a most singular affair, for although Chinese officials have often been charged with perfectoriness in protecting foreign life and property, there had never previously been, so far as we know, any instance of a high official standing placidly by while his own underlings were assaulting a foreigner.

It is stated that China has shown a disposition to yield considerably with regard to the problem of timber felling in the Yalu Valley, but there still remains a radical difficulty. It is that China refuses to include the Hun River in the area described as the Yalu Valley. The Hun is an important tributary of the Yalu and its exclusion from the arrangement would mean a considerable curtailment of the exploitable district. On this point, however, both sides show a determination not to yield, and consequently the discussion can not be said to have progressed materially. So far as Japan is concerned the question does not press for solution.

There is a vague rumour that the Chinese Government is showing itself pragmatically obstructive with regard to the establishment of customs stations in northern Manchuria. No details are given, but it is said that the Russian Representative is much incensed at the attitude of the Waiwupu, and that the Japanese Charge d'Affaires is at one with M. Pokotilof's view. Apparently the Chinese Government has been making some investigations which have not resulted satisfactorily, and it is now said to be coming round to the views of the Russian and Japanese Legations.

THE JAPANESE ARMY.

In connexion with the re-distribution of the divisional districts for the Japanese army it is possible to arrive at a rough idea of the latter's dimensions under the new organisation. Exclusive of the Guards Division, there will be 18 Divisions of regular troops, which means that the former standing army will be increased by nearly 50 per cent. It will be organised in such a manner that the reserves can be called up at a moment's notice. The headquarters of the six new Divisions will be at Takata, Utsunomiya, Toyohashi, Kyoto, Okayama and Kurume. To particularize, whereas the former army, exclusive of the Guards Division, was made up of 12 Divisions consisting of 24 Brigades and 48 Regiments, the new army will be made up of 18 Divisions consisting of 36 Brigades and 72 Regiments. In addition to the above the Cavalry, which has hitherto consisted of 2 Brigades of 14 Regiments, will now be raised to 4 Brigades or 26 Regiments, and the Field Artillery, hitherto composed of 2 Brigades or 18 Regiments, will be augmented to 3 Brigades or 24 Regiments. These forces of Cavalry and Field Artillery are independent of the similar troops comprised in the establishments of the Divisions. There will also be 3 new Battalions of Mountain Artillery, stationed one each at Sendai, Okayama and Kurume; and further the Corps of Engineers and Land Transport attached to the Divisions will be increased by one Battalion each. Then again the present Railway Battalion will be made into a Communications Brigade, including three Railway Battalions, a Telegraph Battalion and a Balloon Battalion. It should be premised that the actual dimensions of the Telegraph and Balloon Corps are not mentioned, but we assume that they will be one Battalion each. Two of the Railway Battalions will be stationed at Shiba and the third at Narashino, while the Telegraph and Balloon Corps will have their headquarters at Nakano. Finally the Garrison Artillery will be changed into a Heavy Artillery Corps consisting of 2 Brigades or 6 Regiments.

THE LATE MR. CHARLES GRANT.

The news of the death of Mr. Charles Grant, managing director of Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Ltd., comes as no surprise to his friends in the Far East, for when he left Shanghai a few months ago he was considered to be a dying man. Originally intended for the Church—which career he had to abandon owing to reverses in the family's fortunes—Mr. Grant never lost touch with his early aspirations and at one time possessed one of the completest theological libraries in the Far East. His acquaintance with the early Fathers and the patristic writings of the third century was unique, though it was seldom in later years that he could be drawn to dilate upon these themes. The greater part of his successful business career was spent either in Hongkong or Shanghai, in both of which places he won hosts of friends, for he belonged to the learned race of booksellers who have more than a nodding acquaintance with the contents of their shelves. In Shanghai he was drawn into the circle of Masonic interests and rose to high rank in the craft. A gentle, loveable man, his removal will be sincerely mourned in a very wide circle. Some dozen years or so ago he married Mrs. B. J. Brinkworth, of Yokohama, who with two daughters survives him.

THE YALU TIMBER-FELLING ENTERPRISE.

There does not yet appear to be any prospect of an understanding between Japan and China with regard to the timber-felling enterprise in the Yalu valley. China, as already stated, shows a disposition to make some concessions, but she has not in any sense abandoned her proposal that the area of the enterprise should be greatly limited. Japan's contention is said to be that to set any limits such as those proposed by China would merely mean the arbitrary reservation of a large area which the Chinese would be unable to work without foreign co-operation. At any rate, there is nothing in any existing agreement which confines the enterprise to the boundaries proposed by China, and it is confidently affirmed that Japan will not consent to them even though the question remain open for the next five or ten years. She will simply continue to conduct the enterprise on its present lines. The public is greatly at a loss in attempting to form a judgement on this and other questions pending between Japan and China. The Japanese side is well set forth by the Tokyo press but the Chinese side has no corresponding exponent. Meanwhile one thing at all events is plain and suggestive, namely, that of all the problems between the two Empires not one has yet been settled since the Portsmouth Treaty was signed. It is incredible that the cause of this should be attributable entirely to Japanese unreason, especially as several of these problems were carried within actual sight of solution when Peking's reluctance stopped the way. On the 16th inst. Viceroy Hsu is said to have proposed the re-opening of the salt question, which evidently troubles him considerably, inasmuch as, failing an understanding with Japan, there is no means of checking the free export of salt from the leased territory into the neighbouring province. Consequently it is easy to understand the Viceroy's desire to come to such an understanding, but unfortunately he seems determined to adhere to conditions which the Japanese regard as impracticable. To the Viceroy's intimation of a desire to re-open the conferences, Mr. Hagiwara is reported to have replied that he was willing to resume the discussion provided that it extended to all the outstanding problems, a condition to which Viceroy Hsu was apparently unwilling or unable to agree. There is a strong inclination, we observe, to attribute this dilatoriness or obstructiveness on China's part to the prevalence of the rights-recovery mood. But we are inclined to think that a large, if not the major, part of it is due to the unsettled condition of political affairs in Peking. It is true that his Excellency Yuan has complied with the formalities essential to publicly taking over the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, but he has not actually assumed the duties of the office. His whole time must be taken up with work which bulks far more largely in his eyes, namely, the reorganisation of his country's governmental system. It seems most improbable that he should deliberately assume a pragmatic and unfriendly attitude towards Japan, and we entertain little doubt that when Peking has put its own house in order, it will turn its attention in a resolute and practical spirit to the settlement of its foreign affairs.

A Shanghai telegram under date of Sept. 18th, says that two Japanese detectives employed by the Shanghai Police have been attacked by a number of Chinese while trying to arrest some native gamblers. The Japanese sustained severe injuries.

DISASTROUS STORMS.

According to reports of the Meteorological Observatory, the low temperature prevailing since the 11th inst. is due to a centre of elevation which developed in Siberia at that time and extended its sphere of influence to Japan. To correct this abnormal state of affairs the only efficient factor would be an invasion by a centre of depression from the other direction, and such an invasion seems to be now imminent. For the Ogasawara centre of depression which, according to yesterday's accounts, had turned southward and thus become innocuous so far as Japan was concerned, has really done nothing of the kind, but is steadily pushing its way northward. On the 16th inst. it struck the Bonins, and on the 17th it was expected to reach Hachijojima. Unless it then changed its course, as to which we have not yet any information, it was destined to cross Japan.

We may mention here that, according to the view of experts, the rice crop has not yet suffered at all from the recent cold snap, and if the weather improves within the next few days, there will be no cause for complaint.

It appears from the meteorological reports that the two typhoons which were recently noted as moving towards Japan, one from the south of the Riukiu Archipelago and the other from the Bonin Islands, came together at the 31st parallel of latitude. This conjunction, which might have eventuated disastrously, proved really fortunate, for it deflected the Ogasawara storm eastward, and thus, instead of crossing the main island, the centre of depression merely touched the eastern coast and then took its way out into the Pacific. Thus comparatively little damage was done. Simultaneously with the arrival of these two storms off the coast of Japan, a minor centre of depression made its appearance in Sagami and caused a heavy fall of rain in Tokyo. The weather is now believed to have broken up and there has been a palpable increase of temperature all over the Empire. In Tokyo the thermometer which stood at 64 on the 16th inst. registered 72 at 10 a.m. on the 19th.

Heavy rain set in on the night of Sept. 17th in the district of Tsukui, which is traversed by the Rivers Sagami and Doshi, the source of the Yokohama Water Works. The water of the Sagami rose by about six feet and the Doshi about twelve feet above ordinary level. As a result, severe damage was caused to the cliffside along the Doshi. At Benten-no-fuchi, where the temporary wooden scaffold was erected to carry the feed pipes of the Yokohama Water Works, landslides occurred and various arrangements at the foot of the scaffolding were washed away. The position of the main pipes—18 inches and 22 inches respectively—is serious. According to Mr. Doi, of the Yokohama Water Works, Mr. Koidzumi, an assistant civil engineer, is on the spot and will endeavour to prevent further damage. Dr. Hara, chief civil engineer, left early on the morning of Sept. 18th for the scene. It may be added in this context that Dr. Hara has drafted a plan for the permanent repair of the mainline from the water source, and after investigation at the Water Works Office his suggestions will be laid before the Councillors of Yokohama City. The expenditure is estimated at about forty thousand yen. The main feature of the work is that a stone wall with concrete foundations should be built along Benten-no-fuchi and a tunnel cut at Mitsu-gaki through which should be led the water pipes; in this way they would be protected from the ravages of the river.

A later telegram says that the water of the Doshi has risen remarkably owing to the heavy rain. The 18-inch pipe has again been damaged at Benten-no-fuchi and the supply of water through this pipe was stopped a little before noon. However, as the 22-inch pipe sustained no damage, the water supply will be continued to the city even though the quantity may be insufficient.

In Yokohama, as a result of the heavy rains of Sept. 18th, some land-slides occurred at West Toke and Kanagawa. At Honmoku, Kitagata, the Chinese quarters, and the public garden the usual flooding took place. Some houses at Ota were inundated. About three hundred houses in the Chinese quarters of Yokohama were flooded, while the depth of water on the roads at noon was some two feet. Owing to landslides at Kanagawa and Hodogawa, several houses collapsed.

Several telegrams received on the morning of Sept. 18th at the Central Police Office of Yokohama disclosed the fact that traffic on the Tokaido Railway between Koyama and Yamakita was again interrupted owing to damage caused the previous night, but according to a later telegram received at the Yokohama Railway Station, traffic was reopened at 1.20 p.m. after urgent temporary repairs had been effected. Thus through traffic on the railway is maintained although under great disadvantages.

The waters of the Rivers Rokugo, Sakawa, Banyu, etc. have risen considerably and are over-topping the embankments. Some of the bridges across the rivers which were repaired after the late storm have been washed away again. Owing to damage at the Kawanishi tunnel, traffic on the Tokaido Railway via Matsuda was suspended at 5.29 p.m. on Sept. 17th. Damage along the sea side districts of Kanagawa prefecture seems to have been severe. At Oiso waves about twelve feet high dashed up the shore and Oiso Police Office was swamped and sustained damage. A similar disaster was experienced at Kodzu. Many houses were flooded and most of the fishing boats were washed away or destroyed. Some telegraph poles also collapsed. Owing to the storm and inundations, traffic on the Odawara Electric Railway has been stopped since the morning of Sept. 18th.

According to a telephonic report from our Tokyo correspondent, inundations occurred in the urban divisions of Koishikawa, Shitaya, Honjo, and places along the Sumida. So great was the impediment caused to communications that children were prevented from reaching school. The police are doing all they can to assist sufferers by these floods. At Atsuki and Hiratsuka were flooded. Some houses collapsed and others were washed away. Many bridges in the district were damaged. At the village of Miyagino near Odawara, a similar disaster was experienced. A house in the neighbourhood of a well-known hotel, the Karneya, was destroyed by a landslide, and the occupants, nine in all, were crushed to death. Damage was also sustained in the Hakone district, but not of so severe a character as that experienced in August. As telephonic and telegraphic lines are damaged, details are difficult to obtain.

A telegram from Aomori says that heavy rain was experienced on September 17th. Floods occurred at the Kosaka coal mine in Rikuchu. Thirty-five persons were drowned. During the disaster, fire broke out, and thirty houses were destroyed. Nine persons were killed and thirteen are missing.

The damage sustained on Sept. 18th at the source of the Yokohama Water Works was repaired during the night, and the city's water supply is being continued in the ordinary way. Mr. Tanaka, an assistant civil engineer of the Water Works, says that had the rain continued for another three or more hours, serious results would have developed. Fortunately the downpour ceased about 4 p.m. The flood water in the Doshi is gradually decreasing. At 10.30 a.m. on Sept. 19th, the level was about six feet over the usual.

Kawasaki and the surrounding districts were flooded during the night. The engine department of the Tokyo-Yokohama Electric Railway was swamped by water and the railway was damaged. Consequently traffic was stopped, and on Sept. 19th was not re-opened. The factory of the Nippon Sugar Refining Company at Kawasaki was inundated, causing heavy damage. The Tokyo-Yokohama Railway at Kawasaki was also invaded by the flood, but not to such an extent as to interrupt the traffic.

The embankment of the Sagami near Atsugi was destroyed by the flood and as a result, about four hundred houses were inundated, some of them collapsing or else being washed away. Similar scenes of destruction were observed at Kanakura, the principal area of damage being at Yaba and Yoshida. The bridge between Enoshima and Katase was washed away. At Kiga, in Hakone, two houses collapsed after a landslide and were washed away in the flood. Out of the occupants, ten in all, three dead bodies have been recovered.

Governor Sifu left Yokohama on Sept. 18th for Odawara to inspect the nature and extent of the damage done by the high waves the previous day.

According to several official telegrams, the floods in Shizuoka were remarkable. A great many houses along the Tokaido Railway were inundated and some damaged. Traffic on the railway was stopped for a time. In Yamanashi prefecture severe damage is reported.

Investigations by the Home Office, as to loss of life and damage last month from the floods have now been concluded and show the following figures:—

Persons killed	459
" injured	237
" missing	118
Houses collapsed	1,459
Houses damaged	1,800
Houses washed away	3,108
Houses flooded	187,499
River embankments damaged	3,417
Bridges washed away	2,609
Landslides	4,382

The area flooded was 388,600 acres. Of this extent, 34,800 acres sustained heavy damage. The losses were heaviest in Yamanashi, Gumma, and Saitama Prefectures, and in Kyoto.

BARON IWASAKI.

We regret exceedingly to state that Baron Iwasaki Yanosuke has been attacked by a serious illness and is lying in the University Hospital awaiting an operation of the gravest character. He is said to have behaved with the greatest courage under this affliction. After the principal physicians in attendance, namely Professors Sato and Miura, had informed the Baron's family of his serious condition, it was decided that the information should be conveyed, to the patient himself. He is reported to have received it with the utmost sang froid. His comment was that happily no work of great magnitude was under inception now in his hands and that his eldest son, 29 years of age, had shown himself perfectly competent to succeed his father in the various enterprises under the latter's control. Baron Iwasaki is only 57 years of age. It would be little short of a national calamity if this illness proved fatal, for we may truly say that there is not in the length and breadth of Japan another man who more truly combines the highest qualities of the Japanese samurai with the integrity and large-heartedness of a great merchant.

Some sixty members of the Nippon Trade Society, which consists of prominent business men of Tokyo and Yokohama, on the evening of September 17th, held a meeting in Tokyo to celebrate the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese entente as well as the Commercial and Navigation Treaty and Fishery Convention. Mr. K. Ikeda, manager of the Hundredth Bank, read a congratulatory address which was warmly applauded, after which the members decided to present copies of the address to the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Russian representative in Tokyo, the Japanese Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Japanese representative in St. Petersburg.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT ON THE "KASHIMA."

A terrible accident occurred on the battleship Kashima on the 16th instant as she was carrying on target-practice near Kinoye Island in Hiroshima Bay. A 12 inch shell exploded in the starboard turret aft killing 5 officers and 22 men, and wounding 4 officers and 6 men, a total of 43 casualties. Among those killed on the spot was Captain Shinowara, chief naval-constructor at Kure. First-Lieutenant Arita died from the effects of his wounds. Two of the wounded officers and 6 of the men are in a critical condition. The official report is silent as to the cause, but the Mainichi Shimbun alleges that when removing a shell which had not exploded, the charge became ignited without any apparent reason. The ship returned at once to Kure.

It is stated semi-officially that the cause of the disaster on board the battleship Kashima was that a fresh cartridge was inserted while a part of the old one was still smouldering in the gun, and the new cartridge exploded before the breech had been closed. This is not by any means the first instance of such an accident if the record of Western navies be consulted, but that does not make it any the easier for Japan. The large number of casualties is accounted for by the fact that as the ship was engaged in gun practice, many officers and men, not actually on duty, were assembled within and without the turret. The damage done to the ship and her armament is said to have been very slight. It will of course be inferred from the above explanation that the gun detachment did not follow the regulation routine before opening the breech to reload. This undue haste is attributed to the fact that the gun-practice was competitive, three ships being engaged in it, namely, the Kashima, the Katori and the Tokura.

THE LESSON OF THE STARS

Sir David Gill, Astronomer-Royal at the Cape of Good Hope, in delivering the inaugural address as President of the British Association at Leicester this year, devoted himself chiefly to the science in whose service he has spent the whole of his life. Needless to say his review of astronomical discoveries and potentialities was of intense interest for, as The Times points out, astronomy in its broader aspects has always been a very popular science. It is a science which deals with comparisons extending over long ages. For instance Sir William quoted the Book of Job where it couples the "chambers of the south" with Arcturus, Orion, and the Pleiades, and cited Schiaparelli's highly probable conjecture that the expression refers to the stellar region which includes the Southern Cross. How did the writer of the Book of Job know anything of that splendid constellation? The answer is that at the time he wrote, probably 750 B.C., the Southern Cross would be visible in the latitude of Judaea, low down on the southern horizon. To see it we have now to travel some twelve degrees of latitude further south. Dante, who was born 2,000 years after the Book of Job was written, could never have seen the Southern Cross, yet he describes it as "four stars ne'er seen before save by our first parents." It might seem that some vague tradition of a striking group once visible in Europe had been handed down from ancient days. At all events the constellation was once visible in Europe, and its disappearance illustrates the nature of the slow changes which astronomers with modern instruments of precision endeavour to register within short periods. That particular phenomenon is due to terrestrial changes which alter our point of view, but every star in the heavens is continually changing its own position in space as well as its apparent relation to other stars as viewed from our moving platform. The sun, with all its retinue of planets, is moving towards a star in Hercules at the rate of about twelve miles per second, hence there is continual alteration in the apparent relations of the stars to one another as seen from our point of view. But besides this apparent motion there are real changes due to the proper motion of each star upon some orbit as vast as that followed by the whole solar system. To disentangle these motions, to discover how much is proper motion, how much apparent motion due to our own change of place, and how much mere systematic error in our instruments, is the task upon which astronomers all over the world are engaged. It is a task of enormous difficulty, since we cannot independently verify any of the data. We have to measure each by a standard which is itself of unknown and perhaps unknowable value, to judge the sun's motion from the displacement of the stars, and to decompose that displacement by the conjectural value we have assigned to the motion of the sun.

The conclusion of Sir William Gill's address we quote in full:—

The ancient philosophers were confident in the adequacy of their intellectual powers alone to determine the laws of human thought and regulate the actions of their fellow men, and they did not hesitate to employ the same unsupported means for the solution of the riddle of the universe. Every school of philosophy was agreed that some object which they could see was a fixed centre of the universe, and the battle was fought as to what that centre was. The absence of facts, their entire ignorance of methods of exact measurement, did not daunt them, and the question furnished them a subject of dispute and fruitless occupation for 25 centuries. But astronomers now recognize that Bradley's meridian observations at Greenwich, made only 150 years ago, have contributed more to the advancement of sidereal astronomy than all the speculations of preceding centuries. They have learned the lesson that human knowledge in the slowly developing phenomena of sidereal astronomy must be content to progress by the accumulating labours of successive generations of men; that progress will be measured for generations yet to come more by the amount of honest, well-directed, and systematically discussed observation than by the most brilliant speculation; and that, in observation, concentrated systematic effort on a special thoughtfully selected problem will be of more avail than the most brilliant but disconnected work. By these means we shall learn more and more of the wonders that surround us, and recognize our limitations when measurement and facts fail us. Huggins's spectroscope has shown that many nebulae are not stars at all; that many well-condensed nebulae, as well as vast patches of nebulous light in the sky, are but incloate masses of luminous gas. Evidence upon evidence has accumulated to show that such nebulae consist of the matter out of which stars (i.e. suns) have been and are being evolved. The different types of star spectra form such a complete and gradual sequence (from simple spectra resembling those of nebulae onwards through types of gradually increasing complexity) as to suggest that we have before us, written in the cryptograms of these spectra, the complete story of the evolution of suns from the inchoate nebula onwards to the most active sun (like our own), and then downward to the almost heatless and invisible ball. The period during which human life has existed on our globe is probably too short—even if our first parents had begun the work—to afford observational proof of such a cycle of change in any particular star; but the fact of such evolution, with the evidence before us, can hardly be doubted. I most fully believe that, when the modifications of terrestrial spectra under sufficiently varied conditions of temperature, pressure, and environment have been further studied, this conclusion will be greatly strengthened. But in this study we must have regard also to the spectra of the stars themselves. The stars are the crucibles of the Creator. There we see matter under conditions of temperature and pressure and environment the variety of which we cannot hope to emulate in our laboratories, and on a scale of magnitude beside which the proportion of our greatest experiment is less than that of the drop to the ocean. The spectroscopic astronomer has to thank the physicist and the chemist for the foundation of his science, but the time is coming—we almost see it now—when the astronomer will repay the debt by wide-reaching contributions to the very foundations of chemical science. By patient, long-continued labour in the minute sifting of numerical results the grand discovery has been made that a great part of space, so far as we have visible knowledge of it, is occupied by two majestic streams of stars travelling in opposite directions. Accurate and minute measurement has given us some certain limited portion of space, and in the cryptograms of their spectra has been deciphered the amazing truth that the stars of both streams are alike in design, alike in chemical constitution, and alike in process of development. But whence have come the two vast streams of matter out of which have been evolved these stars that now move through space in such majestic procession? The hundreds of millions of stars that comprise these streams, are they the sole ponderable occupants of space? However vast may be the system to which they belong, that system itself is but a speck in illimitable space; may it not be but one of millions of such systems that pervade the infinite? We do not know. Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

On the 11th inst. the ceremony of officially opening the North-Eastern University at Sapporo was conducted in the presence of Mr. Makino, Minister of State for Education. Thus far the University is represented only by the Agricultural College, which has already existed in Sapporo for many years. This College now becomes a part of the proposed new University. The elevation of the institution to university rank is due entirely to the liberality of the Furukawa family, which has subscribed a large sum of money for the purpose. The Minister of Education made a speech in his usual happy and practical style, and was followed by Mr. Kawashima, Governor of Hokkaido. Bishop Harris also gave an address, in which he contrasted the state of Hokkaido to-day with its condition thirty years ago. On the afternoon of the same day the ceremony of officially opening the Kushiro Railway was also performed.

The official opening of the works for connecting the land and sea communications at Kobe took place on the 16th instant in the presence of the Minister of State for Finance. The works have been on the tapis since 1903 when a preliminary plan was submitted by the Government to the Diet. But the latter's approval for the complete programme was not obtained until 1905, and of course the work could not be commenced until peace had been restored. Mr. Sakatani, speaking on this occasion, repeated the remark made by him some time ago, namely, that Kobe is not only the central port of Japan's foreign trade but also the centre of the overseas commerce of Eastern Asia. Recognising these facts, the Government had decided to expend a sum of 17 million yen on works appropriate to the position and circumstances, this outlay being spread over a term of seven years.

On the 14th inst. there was held in the Palace in Tokyo a ceremony for conferring titles and orders upon all the officials directly concerned in the negotiation of the Franco-Japanese and Russo-Japanese Ententes. Marquis Saionji received the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun and the Kiri; and Mr. Chinda received the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun. Mr. Motono, Japanese Representative in St. Petersburg, was raised to the rank of Baron and further received the First Class of the Rising Sun together with an allowance of 840 yen a year; and Mr. Kurino, Japanese Representative in Paris, was also raised to the rank of Baron, but as he already possesses the First Class of the Rising Sun, no further Order was conferred on him. Viscount Hayashi's title of Viscount was raised to that of Count, but as this distinguished official already possesses all the decorations that his country has to bestow, he did not receive any further addition. High decorations were also conferred on Messrs. Adachi, Shidehara, Ochiai, Kurachi and Kawakami as well as eleven others. Messrs. Ishii and Yamaza already possess the Second Class of the Rising Sun and consequently in the case of the former a pension of 600 yen alone was granted, while to Mr. Yamaza was presented a set of two gold cups.

We may mention here that according to Tokyo journals the final honours to be conferred in connexion with the Russo-Japanese war will be all given by the close of this year.

Mr. Sakatani speaking at an entertainment given to him by the United Banks of Osaka on the 15th inst. is reported to have said that, as the compilation of the budget for next year was not yet concluded, he could not speak of it in detail. In general terms, however, he might explain that the document would be pretty much on the lines voted by the Diet last session, and that public works demanding large outlays would be suspended. There was no reason for the pessimistic opinions expressed by some people with regard to the national finance: on the contrary, reasons for optimism presented themselves. Some people were disposed to criticise the suspension of large public works, but such criticism was not reasonable. It was an incontrovertible maxim of political economy that ordinary expenses must be defrayed with ordinary income, and that if the latter did not suffice for the purpose, additional taxes or other means of augmenting the State's receipts must be found. On the other hand, extraordinary outlays had to be defrayed out of extraordinary income, such as loans, sales of public property, and so forth. If such extraordinary sources of revenue were not available, then the plain course was to suspend the extraordinary outlays, whether public works or what not. As a matter of fact, there was no reason whatever for despondency in the realm of national finance. Nothing was needed except that Government and people should unite to push the post bellum enterprise.

It is understood that the Waiwupu has intimated its intention of abolishing the grain veto in Kwantung, though the announcement has not yet been made publicly. Indeed the statement is a little confused, for one telegram says that the delay in conveying an official notice to the above effect is caused by China's desire to evolve some method of preventing exports from Kwantung to foreign countries. So far as trade between Kwantung and the neighbouring Chinese territories is concerned, it can be treated on the basis of commerce between any two parts of Chinese territory, but this telegram suggests, erroneously we think, that China is seeking to reserve the privilege of export from Kwantung to foreign countries. On the whole it will be safe to take it for granted that this vexatious veto will be rescinded without further loss of time.

Two leading journals, namely the Jiji and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, discuss the Vancouver affair in almost identical terms. They are both entirely satisfied with the measures taken by the Canadian Authorities, whose vigour and sincerity they contrast with the lukewarm and semi-hostile demeanour of the San Francisco police. In the presence of such a mood on the part of the Authorities there is no doubt that order will be restored. On the other hand, it is impossible to avoid the apprehension that this outbreak is destined to be repeated, and from that point of view our two contemporaries, especially the Jiji Shimpō, heartily endorse the opinion of the London Times that a radical solution of this problem must be found without delay. The Vancouver incident, deserves to be regarded with satisfaction and gratitude should it prove the prelude to such a solution as shall prevent any repetition of these regrettable occurrences in British territory, and should it furnish a model which the officials of the United States may follow on their side.

On the evening of the 17th inst. the members of the House of Peers, to the number of over 150, entertained Marquis Ito at the Nobles Club. Prince Tokugawa, President of the Upper Chamber, delivered an address welcoming the distinguished statesman, recognising in warm terms his able and indefatigable exertions in Korea, and praying that his life may long be spared to confer further benefits upon his country. Marquis Ito in reply spoke for about an hour and twenty minutes but his speech was delivered in secret session. It is understood that he refrained from repeating any of the remarks already made by him at previous assemblies of welcome, and that he confined himself to a detailed description of Korea's domestic conditions, of the causes responsible for the present disturbances in the provinces; and of the measures that he intended to adopt.

In the Official Gazette of the 18th inst. there appears a detail of the distribution of the 18 divisions which now constitute the army of Japan. This does not refer to the location of the headquarters of the divisions or of the brigades that form them. It is only a question of parcelling out the Empire into regions within which recruiting for each unit of the service will take place in duly arranged order.

Shanghai sends to the Jiji Shimpō and to the Asahi Shimbun a telegram saying that Russia has occupied the region between the eastern boundary of Chientao and the river Hunchun. In other words, she is supposed to have crossed her recognised frontier and planted herself in a region which never belonged to her. Even Shanghai shrinks from frankly circulating such a rumour. It is described as a story and a story it will probably remain.

Vancouver's trade interests appear to be well served by her business men if we may take as a sample the booklet of 143 pages in which is contained the twentieth annual report of the Vancouver Board of Trade (1906-1907). Between its covers there is a mass of information of the most varied kind with regard to both the city and the provinces. Also there are eight beautiful illustrations of scenery both local and on the C.P.R. line.

A charter has been given by the Minister for Home Affairs to the promoters of the Sakai Railway. This railway is to be built between Yokohama and Dzusui, for a length of thirty-two miles and seventy-eight chains. The cost is estimated at yen 1,800,000.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

The steamer Koyo Maru (1,446 tons) with coal has collided with the sailing vessel Daitoku Maru in the neighbourhood of the Takenokojima Light-house on the way from Wakamatsu, which the former left at 5.30 p.m. on Sept. 12th, to Handa, Owari province. The sailing vessel was sunk. All the crew were saved by the steamer.

Fire broke out on the steamer Fukushima Maru at Hakodate at 5 a.m. on Sept. 14th. The flames originated in the engine room and spread at once throughout the ship causing such severe damage that she sank.

Further damage sustained in Hokkaido during the storm of Sept. 9th has been reported by the governor of the island. At Hamaiki in Ishikari, two fishing vessels were wrecked and six fishermen are missing. Four boats were lost at Takashima and Shukutsu, in Shiribeshi and three persons were drowned. The sailing vessel Shirefuri Maru was wrecked at Sutsu and seven of the crew are missing. At Kamoi point, the sailing vessel Kyosei Maru was also wrecked and four of the crew perished. A sailing vessel met a similar fate at Teure, in Teshio province, and three persons were lost. Some lighters and fishing boats were destroyed at Kafuka and other harbours and four men were drowned and three are missing.

The Seijo Maru, a training ship belonging to the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, was wrecked on Sept. 9th at Young-il Bay, Korea, owing to a storm. Four of the crew are missing. The cruiser Kasagi was despatched on Sept. 12th from Fusan to the scene.

On Sept. 18th, fire occurred on the Japan-China Steamship Company's steamer Daisaku Maru in the lower part of the Chingkiang, three miles from the entrance, on her way to Shanghai. The flames, which originated aft, spread at once throughout the ship causing great damage. Two Japanese and many Chinese passengers were drowned.

KOBE HARBOUR.

The ceremony of commencing work on the Kobe harbour improvement came off on Sept. 6th in the presence of Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, on the Onohama reclamation in Kobe.

It is proposed to reclaim land between the extreme point of Onohama to the foreshore of the former settlement, of a breadth stretching to the sea of thirty feet. Along the new land, 3,160 yards in length, moorage-berths will be arranged with a capacity for accommodating nineteen steamers at a time, including such a ship as the Minnesota. The sea is to be further dredged to a depth of thirty-six feet at low tide. A common landing place at the northwestern corner of the reclamation will be arranged for lighters of ten feet draft, the length being 330 yards. To protect the new land from high waves, a breakwater, 700 yards in length, will be built. On the reclamation, iron sheds, 16,740 tsubo in all, and wooden sheds, 1,030 tsubo in all, will be erected. Two large cranes capable of raising 50 and 30 tons respectively are to be built, beside a number of small cranes. These cranes will be worked by electric power.

MARRIAGE IN YOKOHAMA.

On Wednesday were married at the Bluff residence of Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Blake, in the presence of the American Consul-General, by the Rev. J. L. Dearing, D.D., Mr. Wm. Reed and Mrs. Sampson of Shanghai. The bride, who was very prettily dressed, was given away by Mr. Blake and the groom was accompanied by his best man Mr. J. H. Allison. Miss Dorothea Blake was bridesmaid, and had a toast on her own account in addition to those of the bride and groom, all of which were cordially honoured. After the ceremony refreshments were served by the hostess, Mrs. Blake. Mr. Reed is sub-Manager of the American Trading Company in Shanghai, and the whole of the local office staff were among the guests.

THE NEW TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS WITH RUSSIA.

It appears that a mistake has been made in interpreting the 15th article of the new treaty of commerce and navigation between Japan and Russia. Now that the article has become public property, careful perusal shows that it does not bear the construction originally put upon it by Tokyo papers. It was construed, our readers will remember, as providing for the censorship of journals or other printed matter published by the subjects of either of the High Contracting Parties in the dominions of the other. That, we regret to say, is an erroneous rendering. The article merely provides that printed matter addressed to diplomatic or consular officials of either State within the territories of the other shall enjoy immunity from censorship. This does not affect Japan's practice not to meddle in any way with the correspondence of foreign diplomatic or consular officials within her realm. But Russia's custom has been very different and will now be radically changed by the new article. We are sorry that this occasion was not seized to provide some means of remedying an abuse now flagrant, namely utilizing the territory of a State as an asylum for the publication of matter designed to produce sedition and anarchy within the borders of a friendly foreign Power. Sooner or later something will have to be done in this matter, and Japan and Russia might very well have set the example, for the latter Power at all events has suffered and is suffering from the abuse.

Of course a great deal of importance is attached by Japanese journals to the separate articles of the Treaty, which amount to a virtual recognition of each other's spheres of influence by the High Contracting Parties. Under the provisions of these articles Russia pledges herself to recognize whatever special relations may be made between Japan and Korea with regard to commerce, industry or navigation as well as all arrangements relating to commerce between Japan and neighbouring countries in East Asia situated to the east of the Strait of Malacca. In these reservations there are also included all monopolies which the Government of Japan may establish. Russia, on the other hand, secures for herself freedom in the matter of commerce connected with the fifty-versts zone as well as in matters relating to trade carried on in Archangel, Siberia, Sweden, Norway, etc., together with other privileges of a special nature. It seems pretty plain that these provisions were drafted with a view to the entente then pending between the two Powers. A strictly observed delimitation of spheres of influence is the best visible method of averting international collisions.

The Fishery Convention evidently gave its drafters a great deal of trouble, as was indicated by the rumours which reached Tokyo from time to time. It bears evidence that the Russian Government approached the problem in a liberal spirit. The question of inlets, which promised to involve great delay, has been settled by definitely indicating thirty places as falling within that category, and by adopting an exact definition as to the features of places which though not yet surveyed may hereafter be found to belong to the list. Russia has further abandoned the attempt to extend the estuary of the Amur River to limits which would have been very difficult to observe in practice, and has refrained from reserving the fisheries in the north of the Sea of Okhotsk pending the survey of that region. The rights of fishery accorded to Japanese subjects by this Protocol extend to all marine products of whatever nature with the exception of seals and sea otters. The methods of procedure are clearly laid down, and it would seem that the practical application of the Protocol's provisions ought not to present any difficulty. It may be added that the period of the protocol is fixed at twelve years with power to revise and renew at the expiration of that time.

MARQUIS ITO'S SPEECH.

MARQUIS ITO'S speech, though delivered only to the Municipality of Tokyo and to the Business Men, was addressed to a wide audience—to the world and to Korea. A more solemn warning could scarcely have been given to the people of the Peninsula. They are plainly told that if they continue in their present course, they will soon cease to be an independent nation and will become a part of the Empire of Japan. Those are the alternatives. There is no middle way. The Resident-General, speaking for his Sovereign, his countrymen and himself, repudiates any wish to annex Korea. He claims that the first purpose and the dominant idea of Japan is to equip the Koreans for independence and to convert them into earnest and efficient promoters of their own welfare. Obviously this assertion is not meant to be absolutely comprehensive. We must assume that the Japanese being human, there are among their number many who would throw their caps into the air in frank delight did they learn that the Peninsular Empire had become a Japanese province. In the case of some persons, such a result would be welcomed in an unqualified spirit of aggrandisement; they want their country to be big and powerful, and everything making for its magnitude and strength commends itself to them. Others—and to this category the Progressists probably belong—consider that the longer the Korean problem is paltered with, the more difficult will be its final solution. Therefore they advocate drastic expedition. But there are still others, among whom may be classed nearly all Japan's leading statesmen, who would rather untie the Korean knot than cut it, and who have not yet abandoned faith in the possibility of educating the Koreans to be self-helpful. Prominent among these last stands Marquis Ito. To his extremely difficult task in Seoul he has hitherto brought patience as profound as his sagacity, so that the onlooking nations have learned to regard him as a genuine exponent of benevolent politics. Apparently even the Koreans themselves do so regard him, and it is notable that the most inveterate enemies of Japan, the men who devote the whole resources of their unscrupulous energy to vilipending her every act and blackening her reputation, maintain a reluctant reserve when referring to Marquis Ito. His Excellency has thus a right to speak in the name of sincerely tolerant politicians. Startling is it to find, therefore, that such a statesman, the mouthpiece of the moderates, has already become apprehensive about Korea's future; so apprehensive that in the most public manner he avows his uneasiness. We can scarcely suppose that he harboured these pessimistic thoughts at the outset of his career as Resident-General. He certainly then hoped for the best. But gradually his margin of confidence has been reduced until now only a shred of it remains. He has closely studied the Koreans; has utilized his unique opportunities of estimating their character and their capacity, and his conclusion seems to be that the imminent prospect of national destruction does not form any obstacle to their suicidal course. If they continue in their present groove, they will leave Japan no choice. That is what Marquis Ito tells them, and, coming from him, it is conclusive. On the other hand, he promises the onlooking peoples that no effort will be lacking on Japan's part to save the Koreans from the consequences of their own folly. They will have every chance to grow wise and be given every aid to see the light, but if they cling to their present attitude and prefer darkness, their fate will be on their own heads. Should the drama end in that way, there will at all events be no precipitancy. Marquis Ito asks the world to believe that he will be as long-suffering as possible, and the world will believe him. He has a right to be believed.

For our own part, however, we entertain not the least doubt as to what the denouement will be. Korea has had her opportunities, many of them, and has forfeited them all, one after the other. During the past forty years, when events may be said to have been palpably moulding her destiny, she has not produced one man of the intellectual rank of those that made the Meiji era for Japan. That signal failure may be in part her misfortune, but history will certainly call it her fault. Providence wearies of furnishing occasions to those that are incapable of utilizing them. Were her geographical position different, she might be left to poison herself leisurely in her own special atmosphere of corruption, intrigue and incompetence, but happily for herself she constitutes a danger to her two great neighbours, and one of them will insist on raising her from the dead level of national ineptitude while the other looks on approvingly.

THE INCREASED YIELD OF TAXES.

OUR readers are already aware that the yield of the various taxes during the year ended on the 31st of last March was greatly in excess of the Government's estimates. A synopsis of these results is given by the Tokyo Asahi. From it we learn that the yield of the taxes on sake and stamps exceeded the estimate by 20 per cent.; the profit derived from State industries exceeded the estimate by 7 per cent., and the average yield of other taxes showed an excess of 15 per cent. Among these other taxes the most conspicuous was the customs revenue, which exceeded the estimates by 30 per cent. The following figures are given by our contemporary for the last 16 years:—

Year.	Estid.
1892	4,991,523 yen.
1893	5,125,372 "
1894	5,755,435 "
1895	6,785,040 "
1896	6,228,322 "
1897	8,020,112 "
1898	9,092,592 "
1899	15,936,890 "
1900	17,609,814 "
1901	13,630,814 "
1902	15,501,469 "
1903	17,378,302 "
1904	23,159,730 "
1905	36,757,382 "
1906	41,853,532 "
1907	36,179,719 "

The last of the above figures is the estimate for the current year; all the other figures being the amounts actually collected. To show the differences between the estimates and the sums actually collected during the past 5 years, the following figures are given:—

Year.	Estimates.	Actual Collections.
	Yen.	Yen.
1903	17,045,611	17,378,302
1904	17,376,244	23,159,730
1905	32,697,346	36,757,382
1906	1,787,165	41,853,532
1907	36,179,719

It is expected that when the returns for the current year are available, the customs receipts will be found to have exceeded the estimate by 10 million yen more or less. Of course all the growth shown in the above table is not attributable solely to the development of commerce. Tariff revisions have been largely responsible. It can not be questioned, however, that the progress of trade has contributed much to the favorable result, for this fact is plainly shown by comparing the estimates for each year with the actual receipts. Our Tokyo contemporary notes that the volume of Japan's foreign trade has doubled in the past seven years and that it may be expected to increase in the same ratio in future years. It so, since the dues collected on the present trade are over 40 million yen annually, it may be expected that they will reach 100 million yen fourteen or fifteen years hence, thus becoming the principal item of State revenue, as is the case in so many Western countries. The Asahi alludes in a cursory manner to the contingency that when Japan recovers her tariff autonomy in 1911, it may be possible to make such revisions as will still further increase this source of income. While not advocating high duties, the Asahi points out that 400 million yen worth of imports produce at present a revenue of 40 million yen, which is at the rate of only 10 per cent., a ratio somewhat small in view of the large additions to direct taxation that are contemplated in the case of income tax.

PRINCE "YE."

THE so-called "Prince YE," who is apparently the head of the Korean delegates to the Hague, has induced the Independent to print an essay from his hand. It is entitled "Japan in Korea." The Independent habitually publishes short appreciations of the personages to whose articles it grants the hospitality of its columns. Its appreciation in this case is as follows:—

[Prince Ye We-Chong is the son of Chin Pom Ye, who was Korean Minister to the United States, 1896-1900. The recently deposed Korean Emperor, Ye Hyeng, is his grand uncle. The Prince's name indicates his royal birth. We is his given name; Chong indicates his "generation name" and Ye is the imperial family name. He lived in Washington, D.C., for four years, attended the College of Janson de Lailly and for two years was a student at the special military school at St. Cyr in Paris. He has received the Russian order of St. Stanislaus from Tsar Nicolas II. He is married to a Russian lady and has a daughter; his family resides in Russia. His credentials were sent to him through secret agents of his Emperor. For presenting himself at The Hague Peace Conference the Korean courts (at the command of the Japanese officials, so it is generally believed) passed sentence of death against Ye We-Chong and of life imprisonment against his colleagues, Ye Sang Sui and Ye Choon. The latter died of heart failure while at The Hague. We publish a facsimile and translation of the credentials which he bears to The Hague, signed by the Emperor's own hand and sealed with the imperial seal at the palace in Seoul, April 20, 1907. The Japanese have denied the existence or authenticity of this document and claim to have obtained a disavowal of it from the ex-Emperor.—EDITOR.]

Now all this, in so far as it relates to "Prince Ye's" personal antecedents, life record and connexions must be supposed to have been furnished by that gentleman himself, and thus the responsibility for it does not rest on the Independent's shoulders. But we invite attention to the last sentence of the above paragraph:—"The Japanese have denied the existence or authenticity of this document and claim to have obtained a disavowal of it from the ex-Emperor." Would it have been possible to have penned a phrase betraying in four short lines crasser ignorance of the whole incident and denser misapprehension of its character? Who imagines that the Japanese are seeking to prove the above document apocryphal or that they are anxious to obtain from the ex-EMPEROR a disavowal of it? If it were not genuine, if the ex-EMPEROR's disavowal of it carried any weight, if it could be shown to be a forgery, then what grounds of complaint would the Japanese Government have against Korea? We do not expect the editor of a periodical published in New York to be fully versed in Far Eastern affairs, but we do expect him to be capable of ordinary ratiocination, and it should not over-strain his brain-fibre to perceive that, if the credentials carried by the Korean delegates to The Hague be spurious, if the delegates themselves be not duly accredited, and if they based their status on a commission which is nothing more than a private fraud, then they sink into the category of common criminals for whose individual acts their country is in no wise answerable. No, the Japanese have never sought to obtain any disavowal from the ex-EMPEROR or to deny the authenticity of the delegates' credentials. To take any such steps would be to vitiate their own complaint against Korea and acquit her of all international bad faith. The same inexplicable giddiness marks the Independent's statement about the condemnation of the delegates. "For presenting himself at the Hague Peace conference the Korean courts (at the command of the Japanese officials, so it is generally believed) passed sentence of death against YE WE-CHONG, and of life imprisonment against his colleagues, YE SANG-SIN and YE CHO-ON." Surely it should have been very plain to the editor of the Independent that the Japanese would be the last people in the world to press the courts in Seoul for any such decision? If the delegates were truthfully disavowed by the Korean Throne and judicially sentenced by the Korean law courts as common forgers and utterers of forged documents, where would the Japanese come in? What basis would there then have been for their grievance against Korea? That the EMPEROR himself should try to escape the consequences of his indiscretion by denouncing the delegates as imposters, and that he should instigate the law courts to punish them as such—that is intelligible enough, and that is precisely what happened. But that the Japanese should have deliberately cut the ground from under their own feet by exacting such a denunciation from the EMPEROR or such a sentence from the law courts—that is mere silliness. We must assume that "Prince Ye" primed the editor with such pabulum, and the assumption compels us to infer either that "Prince Ye" is profoundly inept or that he credits the editor of the Independent with profound ineptitude.

As for the credentials carried by the delegates, they are published in facsimile in Chinese script with exact copies of the Imperial seal and other marks. We have little doubt that the document is genuine, Here it is:—

(TRANSLATION.)

His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, to whom it may concern:

As the independence of Korea has been known to all the Powers with which she has ever been in friendly relation, we have, for this reason, the right to send delegates to all international conferences which can be convoked for any purpose. But by the terms of the treaty of November 18th, 1905, which was extorted from us by force, the Japanese by menace and by a violation of all international equity deprived us of the right of direct communication with the friendly Powers.

Not recognizing this act on the part of the Japanese, we do hereby appoint the official of the second rank, Ye Sang Sui, and Ye Choon, ex-judge of the Supreme Court of Korea, and Prince Ye We Chong, former Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg, as Delegates Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the International Peace Conference at The Hague, for the purpose of making clear to the representatives of the Powers the violation of our rights by the Japanese and the dangers which presently threaten our country; and also to re-establish between our country and the foreign Powers the direct diplomatic relations to which we are entitled by the fact of our independence. Considering the three gentlemen above named to be men of high ability and of proved fidelity, we appoint them as our full representatives to the conference at The Hague, in the conviction that they will faithfully serve us and the interests of the nation.

Done at the Palace of Kyung-Oon, in Seoul, this 20th day of the fourth month in the eleventh year of Kwang-Mow. YR HYENG.

With regard to "Prince Ye's" diatribe, which the Independent publishes, it is the work of a very unskilled pleader. From first to last only one specific charge is laid at the door of the Japanese. That charge is that they tried to obtain for one of their countrymen the privilege of reclaiming the waste lands of Korea. A terrible sin, it is not? For the rest, the "Prince" takes refuge in general invective. "Japan," we are told, "has been and is playing the ugly, unjust, inhuman, selfish and brutal rule"; she is likened to "a hypocrite who picks a pocket while professing friendship and brotherliness," which proves her to be "more contemptible and brutal than an open robber"; "the Japanese are officially and unofficially pushing forward schemes of extortion, robbery and cruelty, which in three years have inflicted more actual damage than the worst government of the old style could have done in fifty years"; the Koreans "are already united in spirit to resist the Japanese brutal, inhuman and selfish aggression," and so on. We are forcibly reminded of the accusations frequently formulated against British rule in India by the polyphonic baboo and of the sulphurous philippics penned by certain European newspapers during the South-African war. "Prince Ye" will not gain the world's ear by pouring into it such virulent babble. That he should fight for his country's independence is right and proper, but has he no better weapons and has his unhappy country no abler exponent?

THE BOOKSHELF.

Rhymes at Odd Times, by E. M. HOBART HAMPDEN. Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

THIS is a small unpretending volume, but from cover to cover it is a collection of gems. The author used to write anonymously. Our own columns had the honour of giving to the light many of his early productions. A curious result ensued: ninety-nine readers out of every hundred attributed the poems to Rudyard Kipling, gave them unstinted admiration and thought no more about the matter. There was little suspicion that working quietly in Yokohama, eschewing observation and shunning applause, there lived a singer with gifts worthy to command fame anywhere and at any time. The poems have now been collected into a booklet and their highly endowed author has signed his name. There are twenty-eight pieces and they occupy a hundred pages, abounding from first to last with beautiful and bright ideas beautifully and picturesquely expressed. They have a distinct flavour of Kipling; which is perhaps only another way of saying that they are essentially in the modern tone, not inspired by erotic voluptuousness but dealing with virile thoughts and manly emotions. Occasionally the author seems to fear that he has soared too near the empyrean of conventionalism, and thereupon he descends to mother earth with almost startling rapidity. Thus is the noble poem of "Er," a sermon that must have seared many a conscience, we find him writing of Plato's hero at the tribunal of Minos:

"Now marked he how sinners' sweating feet had
"Furrowed the rock like clay,
"As he lounged at the bar where no bottles are,
"But a life-time's chits to pay."

That is a little shocking, but we recognise in it and in cognate interpolations the writer's instinctive objection to notes of high register. If he soars, it is in spite of himself; he descends precipitately so soon as he recognises an approach to any lofty altitude. Yet unwittingly he carries us again and again into the blue firmament of noble conceptions. The imagery is apt, the diction strong yet graceful, no exposure of effort appears, nor is the imagination insulted by descriptive precision. To commend the volume earnestly to our readers is to consult their advantage rather than the author's. We should like to justify these appreciations by means of copious quotations but we resist the temptation and limit ourselves to two chosen solely for the sake of brevity:—

BY THE TOKIO MOATS.

Relics of Yedo citadelled,
Three rings remain of moated mere,
Where weeping willows comb their hair,
And quaint gnarled pinetrees, bald with eld

Reach down dry anlered arm and tusk
From walls of gray Cyclopeic stone
And old-world ramparts grassy-grown,
Where children prattle in the dusk.

At night I seek the water's edge,
When susumushi trill their song,
And mark the light hotaru throng
That winks and flickers in the sedge;

In autumn climb the western dyke,
As evening brume begins to trail,
And view the sunsets, rich or pale,
Along the languid water strike;

The while late crows, against the red
Satanic-black, with raucous din,
Back from another day of sin,
In comic haste, beat home to bed.

Alone I watch with keen delight,
When waves curl crisp in winter's sun,
The heavy squads of weird-voiced gans
Wheel down in geometric flight,

And ducks along the narrow lake
White-breasted cohorts mobilize,
That plunge tail-coverts to the skies,
Of skid frothed silver in their wake.

'Tis thus the moats I love, and thus Though alien-born 'his mine to share,
With every Yedokki coheir,
This "Legacy of Ijeayas."

So I, the sentimental, sang,
But you, the hard material you,
Winged dreams of fantasy pooh-pooh,
And sling your samitarian slang

At me abashed, and prone of worms,
Of microbes and miasmic mud,
And hint malaria tainted blood
Is stocked with moat-engendered germs.

You talk—with awe my spirit melts
When man goes hygienic-musth—
Of filling up the moats with dust,
Or some hard saying culled from Baelz;

But when you jar the jangling note
Of man's convenience, and glad
That Fancy yields her throne to Fad,
Commend that Railway in the moat.

I rise and curse all fads that be,
And letting language run amok
The pale Recording Angel shock
With one with comminative D.

HORACE JAPANNE.

A Parody of Horace, Book II, Ode 11.

Has China designs on Korea,
Has Russia some bellicose plan?
No matter, don't set up to be a Great Power, my gentle Japan.
Keep your thoughts from the lust of land poaching
Beyond your blue ciclet of sea;
And don't covet the wealth of the teijin,
Content with your otium cum tea.

Old Japan and her Art-life so dainty
Will go all too soon with a crash,
And the dream-days of sweet far niente
Give place to the clink of hard cash.
Cherries fade. The red Rising Sun risen,
Too soon in trade's noontide you'll reek;
Then why vex your soul now with the vision,
Too high, of la haute politique?

To the Hall of the Maple let's hasten,
Or the House of the Eight Hundred Pines,
Where camellia-oiled flower-decked nesan
Shall serve us the choicest of wines.
There's nothing so potent as saké
The cobwebs to clear from the brain:
Go then heat a fresh bottle, O Také,
And fill up our choku again;

And tempt hither from far Seimeimachi
That fair gipsy of banquets, O En,
Let her come with her ivory bachi
And trailing her long samisen;
Let her come in the simplest of dresses,
And bid her not stay for her plaits:
There's Bohemian charm in black tresses
Looped up in a loose sokubats.

"Japanese Self-taught"; by W. J. S. SHAND.
(London, E. Marlborough & Co.).

THIS little book is compiled on the Thimm's System. In other words, the learner is furnished with a short vocabulary of commonly-used words, their pronunciation being given as well as their English equivalents, and they are supplemented by a number of phrases grouped under various headings, as:—"Correspondence," "Health," "the Weather," "Meals," and so on. No attempt is made to explain the rules of construction or of grammar. That part of the task seems to have been relegated to Mr. H. I. Weintz, who has published a "Japanese Grammar, self-taught." We have not seen the latter, and can not say anything as to its quality, but for Mr. Shand's book we have only words of praise. Of course it is not to be supposed that Japanese can be learned merely by committing to memory the names of things and a few phrases, however judiciously the former may be selected or the latter compiled. None knows that better than Mr. W. J. S. Shand, who is one of the most accomplished Japanese scholars that England can boast. We assume therefore, that this work is intended to be a companion to Mr. Weintz' grammar: indeed Messrs. Marlborough and Company announce that the two may be had bound together. Concerning Mr. Shand's labours therefore, we can only say that he has chosen his words and phrases with much care and judgment, and that his book can not fail to be of service to any one whose object is to acquire a working knowledge of Japanese in a minimum of time. It is not impossible to query the absolute accuracy of some of the phrases. For example, asa wa kinari ga gosahnasenu is rendered "There is no fixed time," the word asa being thus left out on the English side; "Trade is good" becomes keiki ga ii n'desu, where the value of the no is not rendered; "There were some errors in the account" is given as the equivalent of Kango ni iro iro machigai ga aru, though iro iro is emphatically a stronger form of expression than some; and the simple English phrase "I want a detailed account" is translated Kono kango wo betsudari ni wakete sainisnu ni kaite moraitai, which is surely a slight superfluity of words. But of such trifling points there seem to be a conspicuous absence, and we can strongly recommend the little book to all who desire to obtain some access to the Japanese language without being discouraged at the portals by a mass of difficulties and perplexities such as those that confront any one approaching the study by an ordinary route.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

Quite a number of monthly periodicals last month devoted a good deal of space to the discussion of what may be termed holiday subjects—such as seaside and mountain resorts and the various recreations indulged in by pleasure-seekers. In the pages of the August Mita Shogyōkai we find a big collection of articles on summer as passed in various quarters of the globe. There are accounts of the summer in Texas; Peking; Ostend; Gothenburg and other places in Sweden. Count Okuma writes in the Mita organ on the need of rest in summer; though, if report be true, he takes little recreation himself. Viscount Akimoto calls attention to the lack of attractions and the many inconveniences met with at Japan's chief summer resorts. He says that most Japanese get tired of places like Nikko, Karuizawa, Hakone and Oiso after a few days. He thinks that, taking everything into consideration, no place in Japan offers so many attractions to an educated Japanese as Kyōto. Ancient Japan can be studied there to-day as thoroughly as ancient Rome can be studied in Italy's modern capital. The city has unspeakable charms for the man of taste and imagination as well as for the devout and the patriotic. But Kyōto is a spring or autumn resort rather than a summer one. Among all the places to which people go in search of health or for the sake of a change, few are provided with forms of amusement to suit various tastes, says Viscount Akimoto. In foreign countries almost every kind of amusement is provided for holiday-makers: boating, swimming, fishing, tennis, golf, music, dancing, billiards, and what not, and more than this, hotels that furnish every comfort at moderate prices are to be found everywhere. In these things Japan is still far behind the Western world.

An old pupil of Mr. Fukuzawa contributes to the Mita Shogyōkai some reminiscences bearing on Mr. Fukuzawa's travels. After starting the Jiji Shimpō it was seldom that he was able to leave Tōkyō, as he either wrote himself or carefully revised the leading articles that appeared in that journal. Then for many years he personally superintended the school work at the Keiōgijuku. But he was naturally fond of travelling. He objected to travel alone. He either took members of the newspaper staff or members of his family with him. Sometimes he would go off with a very big party consisting of over 20 people. He was fond of going to Hakone, Shizuoka and one or two other places. In his journeys he showed his love of simplicity and his economy. He travelled 3rd class and at inns was content with the ordinary fare. He placed no restraint on the people who travelled with him, letting them all do as they pleased in the pursuit of pleasure. One of the rules of his life was to retire early and to rise early. But he never interfered with those who preferred different habits. Once it happened that a number of young men belonging to the staff of the paper decided to keep up a jollification at Hakone the whole night through. That night Mr. Fukuzawa went to bed at 8 o'clock. The young men being afraid of disturbing him intended to pass the night in a room far removed from his. But through some mistake, they discovered to their horror the next morning that their shouting and revelry had been carried on within a few feet of their venerable teacher's room. They all expected a severe reprimand for the noise they made, but Mr. Fukuzawa never alluded to the subject in any way. When on his journeys he lived just as he did at home. He wrote his daily article for the paper and corrected his proofs, took his daily walks all weathers, ate, slept, read, and chatted as was his wont when living at Mita. He was a fine walker even to old age. In his younger days few could keep pace with him over hilly ground.

On the subject of teaching English in Government schools much has already been said in these columns. Letters on this question have appeared in a good many of the daily papers. A recent one in the Tōkyō Asahi Shimbun asserts that Middle School students are not at all keen about learning English. They can not be induced to spend much time in preparation of lessons at home, without which no real progress can be made. With only the number of hours now devoted to the study of English it is considered impossible to teach pronunciation, conversation, grammar, composition and translation. One serious trouble is that there are hardly any Japanese instructors in Middle Schools who can teach a student how to compose in English. The Asahi's correspondent we are quoting thinks that the Mombushō is likely to give up the idea of teaching conversation, pronunciation, and composition, and simply aim at enabling students to understand English books. But as long as Middle School Students form the bulk of the candidates for admission to the High Schools, this plan can never be adopted.

Writing on the difficulty of reformatting countries which are thoroughly imbued with Confucianism, the Jiji Shimpō observes that one reason why Japan has improved so rapidly is the fact that she has never adopted Confucianism in the way that China and Korea have done. Confucianism in this country has never superseded traditional Japanese thought. The Confucian political ideal demands an enormous amount of devotion to the interests of the State and utter indifference to money. Now for many centuries past the Koreans and Chinese, while prating much about public spirit, disinterestedness and the like, have very conspicuously modelled their lives on the principle of self aggrandisement. Very little public spirit exists in these countries. The Jiji thinks that there are elements in Confucianism, which militate against reform and it questions the ability of modern China to follow in the wake of Japan without a violent revolution resulting in civil war.

In a recent issue of the Tōkyō Asahi Shimbun we find an article on "The Unprecedentedly High Price of Rice," the gist of which we give below. In August of last year the price was 15 yen per koku. But it subsequently went up to 18 yen. Was the rise caused by the inadequate supply? Certainly not. Though the crop entirely failed in 3 North-East prefectures, in other parts of Japan there was an abundant yield. There are three main reasons for this rise in the price of rice. (1) The enormous increase in the convertible notes circulated by the Bank of Japan has affected the market. Five years ago these stood at about 180 million yen. They now stand at over 300 million yen. This increase could not well have been avoided by the Government. But it is a law of finance that the increase of paper money sends up the price of goods. Not only has specie undergone depreciation in this country, but large quantities of it have been exported, making us still more dependent on paper currency. (2) Another cause of the high price of rice prevailing is a large increase in the demand. Taking the decade from 1896 to 1905, we find that the increase in the total yield of rice was 15 per cent, and in the amount imported 12 per cent.; but the rice exported showed a decrease during that period of 8 per cent. According to the census of 1903 our population stood at over 46 million. The consumption of rice was put at 41,700,000 koku. Even allowing for a smaller quantity, say, 30 per cent. less, required as food for the old, the young, the sick and for foreigners, it is calculated that each person would need every year 1 koku, 2 to, 2 shō, 9 gō, 5 shaku. This is at the rate of 3 gō, 4 shaku a day. Considering that a good deal of rice is used for making sake and other purposes, it becomes plain that there are still a great many poor people who substitute cheaper food such as millet and barley for rice, though it is a fact that the number of such people has decreased enormously during the past two years, owing to the various ways in which the lower orders were benefited by the Government's heavy expenditure during the late war. Money is more plentiful among the lower orders to-day than it has ever been before. Hence the increased demand for rice and its high price. (3) Some suppose that the increase in the tax assessed on arable land has caused the rise in the price of rice, but this is a mistake.* There is no denying, however, that the import tax on foreign rice has contributed considerably to the rise in the price of Japanese rice. We have always opposed this tax, on the ground that as a source of revenue it is quite insignificant while at the same time it prevents poor people from obtaining cheap food. In addition to the above-named causes for the high price of rice the work of speculators must be taken into account. Every year the market is affected greatly by the rice congers which dealers are always striving to create for themselves and there are signs that this is the case now.

In the Taiseiyo the question of the desirability of the Bank of Japan's increasing its reserve fund is discussed by Messrs. Ikeda Kenzō, of the 100th National Bank, Mr. Hatano Shōgorō, of the Mitsui Ginkō, and Mr. Itō Kenichi, of the Tōkyō Stock Exchange. Here are the views of these three financial experts in an epitomized form. The action of all our banks is largely controlled by the policy followed by the Bank of Japan. The Bank of Japan has twice increased its capital; first in 1890, from 70 million yen to 85 million yen and afterwards in 1898 from 85 million yen to 102 million yen. According to some writers, the demands made on the Bank during the past 2 years having resulted in the issue of a larger amount of paper money than its specie capital covers, it should right matters by increasing its specie reserve fund. There is something in this, but otherwise there is no special reason for demanding an increase in the Bank's capital. Speaking of the general state of our money market to-day, it does not seem to me to be as dependent on help given by the banks as some people suppose. It was generally thought that one consequence of the resolve of the bankers at the meeting known as the Unagi kai, held on June 20th, to lend money on easier terms would be followed by an increased demand for advances, but nothing of the kind took place. Things went the contrary way. When the banks held back, would-be borrowers were plentiful; when the banks advanced and offered to lend, applicants markedly decreased and there was great slackness in the money market. (Sale karo to ieba kari-te ga sukunaku; kasamu to ieba, kari-te ga oimono de, chikagoro wa yūtsū roo motome Rikarimono ga wariai ni genshō shi, shitagatte kinyū shijō wa sukoburu kenanmash de aru). The fact was that the state of the money market was not affected at all by the action of the bankers on June 20th. The outlook seems to me to be distinctly encouraging, and, since the prospect of a good rice crop and a good yield of silk is bright, there is little doubt that in the share market there will be a general rise this autumn.

Mr. HATANO.—The talk about the Bank of Japan's increasing its capital began last autumn, and as a consequence the Bank's shares, which now stand at about 640 yen, ran up to over 1000 yen. I have serious doubts whether the increase of capital urged on the Bank by outsiders is at all necessary. It is said that in addition to the amount of specie reserve shown in its published reports, the Bank has about 40 million yen in London for the convenience of the Japanese Government. There is doubtless some good reason for separating this asset from the Bank's ordinary capital. But since the alleged insufficiency of its specie reserve is the only argument brought forward by those who clamour for an increase of its capital, would it not be best to allow the Bank to include this 40 million of specie in its public reports? The fact is that the agitation in favour of the increase of the Bank's Specie Reserve has been worked up principally by shareholders, who want to run up the price of shares by this device. There is nothing at all alarming about the Bank's issue of convertible notes beyond the amount of its specie reserve fund at such a time as we are now passing through. The Bank has in no way weakened its credit by this step, and in my opinion its doing this is preferable to largely increasing its specie reserve at the present juncture.

* Proof of this assertion is given in detail by the Asahi, but we omit the figures.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

MR. ITÔ KENICHI.—It goes without saying that the demand for the increase of capital of banks generally comes from persons who desire to obtain new stock from them. It will be remembered what a rage there was for starting new enterprises during the latter half of last year. Well, a good many banks increased their capital then in response to the general demand for shares, and the desire to see the Bank of Japan doing the same thing is prompted principally by the personal interests of those who are agitating this question. What it seems to me it is desirable to do, in order to test the reasonableness of the demand for an increase in the Bank's reserve fund, is to compare the amount of the Bank's specie reserve relative to the amount of the notes it has issued with the specie reserve held by European and American banks relative to their convertible notes. If the proportion of the specie held by our Bank is much less than is usual among first-class banks abroad, then an increase is certainly desirable. If this is not the case, then there is no need for immediate action.

In the pages of the Tûthiyo Mr. Hatano Shôgorô has a good deal to say on the system of taxation recommended by the Committee appointed to investigate the matter. Great dissatisfaction with the proposals of this Committee has been expressed in various quarters. As Mr. Hatano points out, the taxes now being collected are war taxes, and hence the nation expects radical reductions in the rates in certain particulars. The Committee has done no more than patch up a very imperfect and unjust system of taxation. Mr. Hatano is of opinion that the proposed new system of levying income taxes is too hard on capitalists. According to this system, incomes of over 100,000 yen a year will be taxed at the rate of 340 yen per 1,000 yen. Incomes under 500 yen are only liable to pay at the rate of 17 yen per 1,000 yen. Such one-sided taxation, says Mr. Hatano, is bound to defeat its own ends. Methods of escaping from it will of course be found. One method that is open to everybody is to buy government stock, which is exempt from taxation. This it would be well worth the while of big capitalists to do. Such heavy taxes on capital as it is proposed to levy tend of course to kill commerce and industry. Rather than pay such heavy dues men will refrain from putting capital into business. By adopting this policy the Government will be slaying the goose that lays the golden eggs. The measure proposed is eminently fitted to change capitalists from active promoters of paying enterprises into spiritless, idle holders of public bonds. No more suicidal policy could have been hit on. If report be true, Japan is following France in this matter, despite the fact that the French income tax system has been devised by Socialists, with M. Clémenceau at their head. Various ways of evading such huge taxes will suggest themselves to ingenious minds. Money can be invested abroad, or numbers of shares can be held in the names of friends, on which a lower rate of interest, if any interest at all, would be paid. The Government plea for this measure is the fact that men conceal their incomes to such an extent that even at this high rate of assessment they will not be able to collect a tenth of what is due. But the adoption of this policy cuts two ways, as the high rate of taxation will certainly increase the number of devices hit on for escaping from liability.

For many days past the papers have been full of descriptions of the terrible havoc made by the floods. Some of the papers say there has been no such flood for 50 years. The Jiji Shimpô and the Tôkyô Asahi Shinbun discuss the calamity in a serious way. They both ask, what would have happened had this flood occurred when Japan engaged in sending troops to the seat of war? The Asahi Shinbun, in an article entitled "Floods and the War Department," suggests that when the country is overtaken by such a huge calamity as this flood has proved to be the troops might well be employed in constructing dams, temporary bridges, railway lines and roads, and in helping to save life and property. The engineers could of course render splendid service on such occasions and their doing so would be a good object lesson to the country. Any expenses incurred might well be met by the State. It seems quite wrong, says the Asahi, that while there is so much distress everywhere, half of which could be alleviated by their help, thousands of men should remain shut up in barracks or be put through forms of drill and exercise that are less useful to others than would be the repairing of roads, the constructing of dams, and the like. In another article the Asahi draws attention to the backward state of public works designed to prevent the destructive overflow of rivers throughout the country. In this respect Japan is no better off than she was in the Tokugawa days. Small yearly floods do not seem to have sufficed to impress this fact on the public generally. But when losses run into millions of yen, as they have this year, surely it ought to result in the adoption of preventive measures on a large scale. The Yokohama Waterworks' case serves to show in what a slipshod manner work is sometimes done in this country.

For many months past the Tôkyô Asahi Shinbun has expressed strong disapproval of the Government's financial policy. It is of opinion that the Government should cease raising loans if it wishes to retain the confidence of foreign countries. During the war loans were unavoidable, but now the time has come to devise means for making the country pay its way without resort to borrowing, says the Asahi. In a recent article it reverts to this subject. It expresses the fear that one of the main objects in view in raising further loans is uncalled-for military expansion (Shakkin no shunyu wa itazura ni fusesan-teki jigyo ni kuchi teraruru no kenen ari. Sura ni tebis tsu xi teba, tohon fûhishiyô naru gumbi kôakuchô ni tsugi-komaruru koto arubeshi). What we always regret to see, concludes the Asahi, are the attempts of the Government to conceal the weaknesses of its present financial system by temporary expedients. These expedients for the most part involve increased burdens for the nation. We would rather know just how the national accounts stand and what are our actual liabilities. It is said that the real condition of affairs is not disclosed for fear of spoiling the foreign market for the raising of another loan. We reply that there could be no greater benefit to the nation than its being forced to fall back on its resources by the circumstance that the raising of another foreign loan under favourable conditions had been rendered impossible.

In his organ the Nippon oyobi Nipponjin Dr. Miake Yûjirô writes as follows concerning popularity. Most men are striving to make money or to make a reputation, or for both objects. The popularity of things depends largely on the benefits they confer on people and on the names they have succeeded in winning for themselves. But popular sentiment is very fickle, and it often undergoes astonishingly rapid changes. To keep popularity is often far harder than to obtain it, for the reason that popular sentiment is exacting: the more it gets, the more it demands. Among men few are popular for any length of time. Those who come in for the highest praise at one time so often become the objects of the greatest censure at another. The strongest characters disregard popular sentiment entirely to a large extent and go their own way. But to ignore it altogether is impossible, as we all have to live in society and to conform to its usages up to a certain point. But to decide on one's course in life, or to settle questions by appealing to popularity as a standard of what is right or desirable is plainly wrong.

In a magazine called Shiyôkai (The World of Culture) the connection of culture and happiness is discussed. The writer maintains that culture has two main objects in view, one being the development of high types of individual character, the other the elevating of popular taste and the brightening of human life by supplying new and superior forms of pleasure. The writer is a pronounced optimist, and he says that the highest pleasures are only enjoyed by the good, that the wicked get their punishment in this life by the mental misery that follows their wicked actions. In his conception the world is arranged so that the good always come out best and get the most happiness out of life. The world's progress in past centuries has largely depended on culture, observes the writer we are quoting; and high culture has always had the effect of raising the standard of pleasure and happiness. Lower forms of pleasure have invariably been replaced by higher ones.

In his August Character Sketches Mr. Toyabe Shuntei, in the pages of the Taiyô, deals with the careers of Admiral Yamamoto and Professor Jordan, President of Stanford University. Space will not allow of our doing more than make a few extracts from Mr. Toyabe's well written article. People are beginning to see very plainly, says Mr. Toyabe, that in Admiral Yamamoto we have not only a first-class naval administrator, but a very able politician whose opinion carries great weight in the councils of the State. Baron Yamamoto's astuteness and decision of character displayed themselves very conspicuously when Count Katsura was in power. Since that time his influence in political circles has grown, so that, unless for reasons of his own he retires from the political arena, in the event of the Saionji Government breaking up, from lack of external support or sufficient internal initiative, Admiral Yamamoto is almost certain to be asked to form a new Cabinet. In recent years our Cabinets have been entirely controlled by the military party. There was a time in the history of our politics when the right of military and naval men to take the lead in the councils of State was contested and the war party had no little difficulty in getting the Diet to vote the money required for military preparations. But when the war with Russia commenced, power was placed at once in the hands of the military. They have held on to that power. There are some ill-informed people who imagine that the fate of the present Cabinet depends on the action of Mr. Hara. They say that the influence of the present Cabinet centres in the Home Minister. But the truth is that Mr. Hara as regards influence is a mere figure-head in the present Cabinet (Hito arima gen Naime Daijia wo moku shite, gen Naikaku no chûshin-ryoku to nashi; kare noshintai (進退) wa gen Naikaku no somô ni kwan su to iu to iedomo, jissei (real influence) yori ichi, kare no gotoki wa ikko no hansoku daijin taru noni). The fate of the present Cabinet depends on General Terauchi, who has Count Katsura at his back, and Mr. Saitô, the Minister of Marine, who entered the Cabinet as the nominee of Admiral Yamamoto. If the Saionji Cabinet shows a readiness to comply with the demands of these two Ministers, it will remain in office, if the opposite is the case nothing can save it. That is the real situation to-day. It is of course quite impossible to predict confidently the course of political events, but nothing seems more certain than the fact that Admiral Yamamoto is the pivot on which the political wheel will make its next turn. Those who regard the Admiral as a man whose whole mind is absorbed in naval and military affairs, who measures all things by a military standard, (尙武本位), Shôbu hon-i, who is before all things else a man of war, are quite mistaken. He has on several public occasions expressed himself in unequivocal terms as in favour of peace. His whole attitude to the San Francisco question while passing through America a few months ago was conciliatory and diplomatic and went far to allay the excitement that had been worked up by a section of the American press.

Mr. Toyabe says that no one in America has espoused the cause of Japan in a more whole-hearted and fearless manner than Professor Jordan. Directly the San Francisco School incident began to cause excitement in the States Professor Jordan condemned the whole action of the local authorities in strong language. He said that race hatred was unworthy of America; that though it might be true that America was the white man's country, it was also true that it was the country of gentlemen, and that the action of the Californian authorities savoured of boorishness in addition to being most unjust. Professor Jordan attacked the enemy's camp. His speech in San Francisco stirred up a hornet's nest in the local press, and the three leading papers there set about working up an agitation against the President of Stanford University, urging that such a man was not fit to superintend the education of the flower of America's youth, and so on. But the worthy Professor treated the whole thing with supreme indifference and stuck to his colours. It would be impossible to overstate the effect of Professor Jordan's action on the American nation. All the better-class newspapers wrote in his defence. His position at the Stanford University is far too strong to be affected by a popular agitation such as that raised. The University is a privately endowed institution and Professor Jordan has been President since its first establishment. He is a born teacher and his lectures on biology in the University and elsewhere have always been very popular. During the 16 years that Professor Jordan has been President of the Stanford University he has been again and again the subject of press attacks. When the University was founded by Stanford it was said that its establishment was a species of penance for the shady manner in which its founder had piled up wealth. But Professor Jordan was unaffected by these slanders. The death of the founder of the institution, however, proved to be a great calamity. For a while the closing of the University for want of funds to carry it on seemed imminent, but by five or six years' strict economy the difficulty was tided over and the self-support of the University was assured. Subsequently a serious disagreement between Professor Jordan and two Professors (the Professor of Economy and that of History) caused much trouble, but Professor Jordan came out of this unscathed. Professor Jordan is a scientist rather than an educationist, concludes Mr. Toyabe. He is a well known authority on fish, having extended his investigations to all parts of the world, including Japan. I conclude this article, says Mr. Toyabe, by quoting pieces of advice given to Japan by Professor Jordan bearing on education. In Japanese education the following points are most important. (1) The fuller development of individual power and traits. (2) The recognition of the fact that integrity is of more importance than politeness. (3) That the best way of suppressing evil is not to be content with mere prohibition, but to try and raise the standard of personal conduct. (4) Since the home is the centre of all culture and purity great attention must be paid to female education. (5) The ultimate object of education is not the training of a number of Government officials or the production of a number of savants, but the fitting of a large number of persons in all ranks of life to discharge the duties of their several callings.

WHEN CHARITY DOES HARM.

It is now fourteen years since hard times in Yokohama led to the organization of the Fujin Jiseikai (Ladies Benevolent Society) whose efforts have since crystallized into the Charity Hospital in Negishi, where hundreds of sick poor are annually cared for.

From that time to this, the foreign community in Yokohama—than which there is no more generous one on the face of the earth—has contributed to various enterprises undertaken for the relief of distress—the Charity Hospital, the blind, the sufferers from earthquake, famine and fire; and lastly the day nursery, besides individual cases uncounted.

A considerable sum of money having been annually entrusted to me for distribution on these lines, I have in the effort to use it wisely, learned many valuable lessons—taken a regular course in practical sociology. I think that this knowledge I am bound to share with all who have helped me gain it. To none of the charities above mentioned does the heading of this article apply, but there are a large number of people who do not deserve help, some of them very clear impostors, and it is of these I wish to say a word. The people I have learned not to help are present themselves as Christians in distress. I have never found one genuine case among scores of such applicants. Not that I have never been deceived. It is not so very long ago that a poor man, who looked quite respectable told a pitiful tale of sudden calamity. He, with his family, had gone from near Kobe to the Hokkaido, intending to make that their home. The climate had been hostile, their venture had not succeeded, and they were on their way back with just enough money to pay their way. On arriving in Yokohama, the wife had been taken ill; the baby two days old, had died and there was no money to pay for its burial. It was not quite clear to me why he had come to me, a foreigner, but I believed his tale of distress and sent for my trusty Japanese Associate to go and investigate (according to our fixed rules). She was out and would not be back for some hours. The man did not over-urge, only said that he would surely return the money, if I would loan the amount needed. The mental vision of the poor sick mother with her dead baby decided me to risk the amount desired (two or three yen), and I gave it to him. Next day, when the Japanese lady I had asked, went to call, she found there was no such number as the one he gave me. The story was all false. I should have sent the man to one of the Christian preachers—they always live near their Churches—and let him investigate. That is not the only time I have been deceived, but it will suffice for illustration.

Second, Professional Beggars.—As we all know, many of the professional beggars are lepers. I have talked with a number, and tried to persuade them to go into hospital, but with no success. The feeling that misunderstanding or mistrust might account for this, led me to send a man out last New Year's time to talk with the beggars, and see if they would like to go into leper hospitals. His report was interesting. "Yes, we know that lady," they said, "but she does not seem to understand what we want, she always says 'hospital,' but it is only money that we want, nothing else." The messenger proceeded to urge the great desirability of getting into hospitals if it could be arranged, where they could have food and shelter, besides medical care as long as they lived.

Then the beggars explained that like others they had a guild, at the head of which was their chief, that he stationed them in different places, putting the most deformed ones, and the woman with little children in the places most frequented by foreigners and wealthy Japanese, that some times quite a large sum of money was received. All this was given in the evening to the father, "Who gave them all their food." It was much better they argued, to be free to live as they were doing, than to be shut up in hospital, besides, even if they wished to do so, the chief would not let them leave the guild.

A visit to the non-leprous beggars revealed another guild, under similar rules. Only one man showed any desire to give up the life he was leading, and he was interested only for his children, he would be glad to have them go to school and not grow up beggars, he said; he would ask the "father," and, if he consented, would let us know. We have heard nothing since then, so conclude that theirs is not a case for charity, but for the stronger arm of the law.

Third.—Cash to even needy persons is often harmful, because the temptation to put it to a bad or unwise use is too great, but the only general rule I have been able to evolve to insure charities being helpful as we wish them to be is to give work, if possible, but no money except what he earns, to one able to work, to help no old people whose own relatives are able to do it, but those too old, too young or too sick to work, and who have no one to work for them are legitimate objects of charity.

It is gratifying to see that the Christian Japanese are taking hold of these problems. The Aikui Sha, a Charitable Association formed entirely of Japanese gentleman, has recently begun work among the poor in Yokohama. Its object is to furnish decent rooms at a moderate rent and some work for the unemployed. It is still in the formative period, but when complete will have twenty magaya of six apartments each and a central building, where baths will be furnished at one sen each and where the little community can meet for any purpose. Wood carving and laundry are the two occupations already started. This is on right lines, and on a larger scale than has been attempted before and if successful will relieve the situation immensely.

Had I time to give a list of children rescued from sickness and from evil surroundings who have developed into strong earnest useful men and women, or who are advancing to that condition, I am sure that all who have contributed to our Yokohama charities would be glad to have done so.

To use this kind of work seems, in spite of occasional disappointments pre-eminently worth while. C.V.P.

YACHTING.

A light breeze on Saturday shifted in the course of the afternoon from about north-east to nearly north and finally dropped for the leading big boats, though Naniwa brought up some wind with her and was thus able to profit by her allowance. Naniwa had the best of the start but Mary soon drew ahead and 19 minutes after crossing the line she lapped round the end of the breakwater, Maid Marion following a couple of minutes later, Kingfisher next and Naniwa last, 30 minutes after the start. It was a pretty close race to the Lightship and as the weather just suited the Maid she soon walked up to Mary and passing her to windward squared away round the Lightship at 2.45.43, Mary second at 2.47.30, Kingfisher third at 2.53.00 and Naniwa, which had come up well, at 2.56.00. Sinkners were carried on the port side to the Widow Buoy, which Maid Marion passed at 3.16.00 Mary 3m. 55. Kingfisher 8m. and Naniwa 15m. later. All handed their spinnakers at this point and with the exception of Mary shifted them to the starboard side. At 3h. 43m. 30s. Maid Marion passed round the Nagahama buoy and 3m. 20s. later Mary rounded, Kingfisher coming next, at 3h. 55m., Naniwa 18m. astern of the leader. Two long legs brought them past the Widow Buoy and looking well up for the Lightship, which Maid Marion eased round at 4.53.15, Mary 35s. later, Kingfisher at 5.03.00 and Naniwa at 5.19.00. The leaders raced each other in to the harbour entrance, which they took almost together, and then in a lightening wind ran stem up the harbour, Mary getting her gun just ten seconds before Maid crossed. As will be seen from the record Naniwa takes the first and only prize on her allowance: Times:—

The 22-raters raced round the Tachibana-Mandarin Bluff course for the Hon. Secretary's Cup. Seven started. Winsome assumed the lead at the outset and retained it well round till Aimee got ahead before they reached the Mandarin Bluff mark the second time and, improving her advantage, got her finishing gun over two minutes before Winsome crossed. As will be seen, however, Chocho, which came in third on actual time, takes the prize by virtue of her allowance. Times:—

Eleven Larks started to race for a prize presented by Mr. Tom Abbey, the course being round the Lightship and the Tachibana mark, No. 12 finishing first, No. 10 second, and No. 5 third. The first prize, however, went on handicap to No. 15, No. 8 being second.

YOKOHAMA UNION CHURCH.

An extraordinary general meeting of the Yokohama Union Church and congregation was held on Wednesday evening in the Van Schaick Hall to receive for adoption the report of the Church Building Fund; also to receive a report from the Elders and Trustees, and to take action upon the following resolution: Resolved, that a call to the Pastorate of the Union Church be extended for a period of 3 years to Rev. T. Rosebery Good, of Mount Sterling, Illinois, U.S.A.

Rev E. S. BOOTH took the chair and there was a good attendance. The proceedings were opened with prayer. The minutes of last meeting were approved.

The CHAIRMAN expressed his appreciation of the action of the Church at the last annual meeting in re-electing him as their honorary pastor. He trusted that the action to be taken at this meeting would be such that he might speedily be released from his present office by being superseded by a pastor of their own. He went on to report what he had done while in America in behalf of the Church. He described how he had sent photographs of the memorial entrusted to him by the consistory to various religious and mission bodies and how general had been the sympathetic response, realising the great importance of the church having a pastor who was not identified directly with mission work and who would regard himself as the shepherd of this particular flock. But, he said, as expressions of sympathy did not seem to be weighty enough to secure the end he at length appealed to the committee appointed some years ago to enquire into the spiritual needs of English speaking communities on mission fields, a broad term which included not merely Yokohama or Japan, but also China, India, South America and even Mexico. It was found impossible to get a meeting of this committee, and after he had met the Chairman a meeting of secretaries was held in Philadelphia and a new committee was appointed and at the end of March had a meeting. Previous to that he had presented the subject to his own board which had pledged itself to a contribution for five years and appointed him to secure this amount outside the ordinary contributions of the board, for all the income of the board was pledged to its regular work. The new committee met in March and at their request he sent out circulars to various denominations. Later when he visited the city of Washington he made these things known to the press and had a hearing from some 25 or 30 pastors, nearly all of whom manifested deep interest in the subject. He might say the money pledged by the board had been all secured. Two candidates had been before the committee and one was expected in September but a letter had been received from him which had been accepted as a declination. Therefore they had to consider this resolution to extend a call to Mr. Good, whose qualifications as well as those of Mrs. Good were of the most excellent kind.

Dr. DEARING moved that the call be extended.

Mr. L. POLLARD moved as an amendment that the call be for 5 years and that the contract be terminable at 6 months notice on either side.

Mrs. BAGNALL seconded the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE seconded the motion.

The amendment was put and carried unanimously, being also adopted as a substantive motion.

The consistory were by motion empowered to draw up and transmit a form of call.

The report of the trustees of the Church Building Fund showed that the lot adjoining the new Church site had been secured as necessary for the scheme of church, manse and school, and Mr. Suzor had been asked for plans.

The report was adopted as a report of progress. In reply to Mr. Wallace, Mr. Pollard said the adjoining lot had been purchased by Mr. Bunting and would be held by him till January next for the church.

Rev. Mr. BALLAGH said he would not have parted with the lot if he had not understood it was going to the church.

Mr. POLLARD said next month the committee would probably be prepared with a more complete report.

Mr. C. GRIFFIN announced that a gentleman of Yokohama had intimated to him that if yen 2,000 could be raised by the end of the year, he would put up another yen 2,000 for the Sunday school.

This was all the business.

YOKOHAMA.

The Director of the Yokohama Customs on Sept. 13th issued a warning that the revision which was made in the Customs Tariff Law and which was promulgated on March 25th this year will come into force at the end of this year. As a result, goods affected by the revision, which are stored in any of the bonded warehouses will be dealt with under the revised law if the import application is not made before the day of the enforcement.

With regard to the proposed reception to Marquis Ito, Resident-General, by the leading citizens of Yokohama, which was fixed to take place on Sept. 17th or 18th in accordance with the convenience of His Excellency, Mr. Mitsuhashi, Mayor of Yokohama, on Sept. 12th visited the Marquis and asked him to settle the date. Marquis Ito reluctantly declined the invitation stating that he was too fully engaged with official business and his departure for Seoul must take place in the near future.

Counterfeit notes seem to be in circulation in Yokohama. On the evening of Sept. 11th, a forged to yen note was found at an exchange.

Two highwaymen Y. Otani (22) and H. Nozaki (20), were arrested by the Kaga-cho police on Sept. 12th. On the previous day they attacked a young woman named Sumi Osawa at Naka-machi, Ishikawa, Yokohama, and stole a pocket-book containing a small sum of money.

At 2.30 p.m. on Sept. 13th, fire broke out in the well-known Buddhist temple Tofuku-ji, which is commonly known as Aka-mon, in South Ota, Yokohama. As the water-supply was insufficient on account of the damage at the source of the Water Works, the flames at once spread throughout the building and to the quarters of the priests. The buildings were destroyed together with many valuable articles.

On Sept. 13th, the Yokohama City Office sent telegrams to the Foreign Office, the Russian Minister in Tokyo, the Russian Foreign Office and the Japanese Minister in St. Petersburg, congratulating them on the conclusion of the Commercial and Navigation Treaties and Fishery Convention.

A bye-election for a member of the Upper House to represent Yokohama took place on Sept. 14th. Mr. K. Otani, one of the highest tax-payers, was elected without opposition.

Mr. Bakmetiff, Russian Minister, now in Nikko, replied on Sept. 14th to the telegram of the mayor of Yokohama congratulating him on the conclusion of the Commercial and Navigation Treaty and Fishery Convention. His Excellency said that the treaties will secure the maintenance of happy peace between the High Contracting Parties and further strengthen the friendly relations between them in the future. It is reported that the Russian Minister will return to Tokyo to-day, Sept. 16th, after which he will visit the Yokohama City office to return thanks for the congratulatory message.

The leading citizens of Yokohama are making preparations to welcome Mr. Taft, American Secretary of State for War, who is expected to arrive at Yokohama about Sept. 25th by the Minnesota from Seattle.

Mrs. Mary Ortiz, proprietress of the Shamrock Hotel, No. 137, Yamashitacho, Yokohama, was arrested on Sept. 14th and removed to the Public Procurator's office of the District Court. It is alleged that Mrs. Ortiz on the night of Sept. 10th acted as a procuress with regard to a Japanese girl named Saki Takata, 14 years and 6 months old, one of her servants.

THE LAW COURTS.

CLAIM FOR MONEY LENT.

A case in which Mr. K. Geerts, No. 3,590, Negishi, claims yen 3,723.36 with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from April 27th, 1906, till the execution of judgment, from Mr. H. R. J. F. Klingen, No. 57, Bluff, Yokohama, came up on Sept. 17th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nakanishi.

Plaintiff was represented by Messrs. Yamada and Sakurai, and defendant by Mr. Ota.

Plaintiff's Counsel said that on July 28th, 1905, Mr. Klingen borrowed from Mr. Geerts eight thousand yen bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. The conditions were that interest must be paid on January 20th and July 20th every year, and the principal was repayable at any time when called up by the lender. As a guarantee, the borrower offered the land on lot No. 80, Bluff, his own perpetual lease and the building thereon. On Dec. 15th last year, Mr. Geerts, plaintiff, asked Mr. Klingen to return the loan, but the latter failed to do so, in fact he practically refused to repay the money. Plaintiff thereupon filed a petition in the Yokohama Local Court compelling the sale by auction of the land and buildings thereon, the securities specified in the contract. Judgment was given in favour of plaintiff. As a result, the property was sold on April 26th this year. Through this transaction, yen 4,276.64 was realized, leaving the balance claimed in the present case. Subsequently plaintiff asked defendant to pay the remainder yen 3,723.36. Mr. Klingen, however, refused to comply with the request. On May 23rd this year, plaintiff issued a formal request through the Yokohama Local Court. Mr. Klingen lodged in the same Court an objection.

Defendant's Counsel held that Mr. Klingen owed no money to Mr. Geerts. Referring to the land and buildings sold by auction, Counsel said that the property was offered by Mr. Klingen to Mr. Geerts as a guarantee for a certain monetary transaction, but not for the debt of eight thousand yen mentioned by plaintiff's counsel.

Plaintiff's Counsel produced evidence consisting of the contract between the parties regarding the transaction and various other documents. Counsel contended that there was no doubt that defendant owed eight thousand yen to plaintiff, and had offered as security the property.

Defendant's counsel stated that in the lower court he lodged an objection, but the objection was not sustained. As a result, the property was sold through the bailiff belonging to the court. Counsel said that there was no clear explanation in any of the documents of any loan of eight thousand yen. Doubtless the documents were not all connected with the case outlined by plaintiff's Counsel.

The Court decided to deliver judgment on Sept. 19th.

FUNERAL OF MR. H. C. LITCHFIELD.

The last sad offices of the Church of England were performed over the remains of the late Mr. H. C. Litchfield on Friday afternoon. Seldom has a larger cortege been seen in Yokohama, the big concourse testifying to the high esteem in which the deceased had been held. In the mournful procession, walked nearly all the prominent foreign residents of Yokohama, many official Japanese and representatives of the numerous commercial institutions and clubs with which Mr. Litchfield had been so long connected. The Rev. H. B. Walton officiated at the grave side, no religious ceremony taking place at the house, and everything was conducted in the quiet, unostentatious manner which accorded so well with the character of the fine old English gentleman who now takes his last long sleep in the land where he was loved so well.

The latest theory of science is that the world consists of a ball of nickel-iron surrounded by a stony crust, the stony materials having separated from the metallic mass like slag formed on a ball of solidifying iron in a puddling furnace.

DISAPPEARANCE OF MR. C. L. ANDERSON.

There does not seem to be much room for doubt as to the fate of Mr. C. L. Anderson, whose disappearance from Yokohama on Tuesday forenoon caused much anxiety to his friends. The Kobe Herald of Friday said:

"A British first-class passenger, named C. L. Anderson, on the Nippon Yusen Kaisha steamer Riojun Maru, which left Yokohama on the afternoon of the 10th instant for Kobe, was missed from the ship during the voyage to this port. On the morning of the 11th an attendant entered Mr. Anderson's cabin to inform him that breakfast was ready, but found that he was not there. A search through the vessel was made without result, and it was ascertained that the missing gentleman had last been seen at about 9 o'clock on the previous evening, when he was lying on a chair on deck. No particular attention was attracted by this circumstance, as many of the passengers were on deck on account of the heat. Earlier in the evening Mr. Anderson had complained of seasickness, declining to go to dinner for that reason. On an examination being made of his effects nothing was found beyond a 'toppee,' a five sen piece, and a document. He had not manifested any signs of mental derangement while on board, but appeared to be somewhat depressed. Mr. Anderson boarded the vessel shortly before the anchor was weighed, and had not booked a passage on shore."

It is now practically established that Mr. Anderson must have gone straight from his office to the ship. There is absolutely no clue to the cause of the occurrence. The missing gentleman was quiet and greatly liked by all who had come in contact with him. A native of Scotland, he was about 25 years of age and joined the firm of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co. some five years ago. He was only transferred from Shanghai to Yokohama in August a year ago. While the evidence, chiefly the manner of his leaving Yokohama, would seem to favour the conclusion that he committed suicide while in a state of unsound mind it is still open to suppose that he fell overboard accidentally, for a passenger may easily go overboard during the night without any one becoming aware of the accident. A person thoughtless enough to sit on the rail in order to catch the breeze might overbalance himself and once over the side his case would be hopeless.

BASEBALL.

The setting in of cool weather, combined with conscientious practice games, has worked a revolution in the baseball team of the Y.C. & A.C., and on Saturday they scored a meritorious victory over the U. S. S. Chattanooga by five runs to nothing. True the visitors have had no practice recently, but the game put up by the home side was excellent. Frey pitched capably and was supported well, every man justifying his position, and only four errors went down on the sheet against them, two to Miller and one each to Walker and Thompson. Bernheim, McSpadden and Courtman were the stars in the visiting aggregation. Summary:—

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

It is reported by Tokyo papers that Marquis Ito, Resident-General, will leave Tokyo about Sept. 25th for Seoul.

Two coolies, Y. Numata (27) and S. Ito (20), were killed by a train at Kanagawa on Sept. 14th while passing the railway crossing.

Typhus and dysentery are prevalent in the Fifteenth Division at Narashino. Since June 110 cases have occurred and thirteen of them were fatal.

As the tea season is about closed, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's American liners will not call at Kelung after Sept. 18th or at Shimidzu, Shidzuoka, after Sept. 29th.

It is reported by Tokyo papers that U. Kokolff, Russian Minister for Finance, will shortly leave for Manchuria and China to investigate financial conditions there.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's steamer Kumamoto Maru (1993 gross tons) now on the service between Yokohama and Kobe, will be sold by tender at Yokohama on Sept. 27th.

The Governor of Tokushima prefecture reports that at 10.20 a.m. on Sept. 13th, a conflagration occurred in the village of Tachibana. A hundred and ten buildings were burned down.

The Chinese gun-boat Kiang-i was launched on Sept. 18th at the Kawasaki Shipbuilding Yard, Kobe. The ceremony was conducted in the presence of the Chinese Consul and many Japanese.

An Otaru (Hokkaido) telegram says that on the night of Sept. 15th, fire occurred in South Hama-cho, burning down twelve warehouses. The damage is estimated at two hundred thousand yen.

We beg to acknowledge receipt of a copy of the report of the World's Student Christian Federation held in Tokyo April 3rd—7th in the present year, the proceedings at which were reported in our columns at the time.

Two small girls in an American country school were comparing progress in catechism study. "I've got to original sin," said one. "How far have you got?" "Me? Oh, I'm way beyond redemption," said the other.

F. W. Kennedy, proprietor of a restaurant, at No. 106, Yokohama, has been punished by the Kaga-cho police with a fine of 50 on a charge of having infringed the regulations regarding employees of hotels and restaurant.

A gambler, S. Suganuma (24), on the night of Sept. 17th, attacked another gambler named T. Ibisawa (50), at Meguro, Tokyo, inflicting fatal injuries with a short sword. The victim died an hour later. The murderer gave himself up to the Shinagawa police.

The Hochi says that Great Britain and Russia have decided not to publish the entente which was concluded on Aug. 30th. As Japan has special friendly relations with these Powers, a copy of the agreement, however, was recently sent to her by the high contracting parties.

During August, the Osaka Mint purchased 198 kwanne of gold. During the same period, silver coins struck were: 50 sen, yen 285,000 and 10 sen, yen 578,000. The gold and silver coins issued were: 20 yen gold, yen 659,780; 50 sen silver, yen 320,000; and 10 sen silver, yen 470,000.

According to a telegram from Mr. Iwasaki, Consul-General in Sydney, Sir John Forrest, Minister for Finance of the Australian Commonwealth, resigned on Aug. 30th. Later the following alterations were made in the organization of the Cabinet: Sir William Lyne, Minister for Trade and Customs, was appointed Minister for the Treasury; Mr. Austin Chapman, Postmaster General, to be Minister for Trade and Customs; and Mr. Samuel Morgan, honorary Minister of State without portfolio, to be Postmaster General.

Mr. K. Arai, Director of the Bureau of Accountants in the Department of Finance, having been recently made Vice-Minister of Finance at Seoul, Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Bureau of Loan Consolidation, has been appointed to the vacancy. Mr. T. Tsukata, Councillor, succeeded the latter.

On Wednesday, Sept. 18th, the Chilean National Holiday was celebrated by a reception at the Chilean Consulate. Governor Sufu and Mayor Mitsuhashi were present, being, with other prominent Japanese, civil and official, received by the Consul-General, Mr. A. Viel, and the Vice-Consul, Mr. C. V. Sale.

News has reached Bos-ton, Lincolnshire, of the death at sea of Capt. T. England Parker, the oldest shipmaster afloat. Capt. Parker in November last completed his fiftieth year of continuous command. He sailed from Liverpool early this year in command of the four-masted barque Holt Hill, and the cable announcing his death at sea is from Victoria, British Columbia.

There is general unrest among the remnant of the various military corps which still render ornamental service in the Vatican. The Noble Guard are at the forefront of the movement because the frugal mind of Pius X. has cut off all sumptuary privileges, and has decreed that henceforward all its members must serve gratis and keep themselves. In the Papal Guard and the pontifical gendarmery it is the same.

Two hundred and thirty-eight fishermen and sendoes have been arrested at Matsuzaki and Shimoda in Idzu peninsula. It is said that when the fire occurred on the German steamer Witz, on Sept. 15th, off Matsuzaki, the defendants gave assistance to the crew in putting out the flames, and at the same time stole many articles and much cargo from the steamer. On Sept. 18th, the accused were removed to the Shidzuoka Local Court.

Mr. Philip W. Sergeant, the author of "The Courtships of Catherine the Great," and formerly editor of the Hongkong Daily Press, is publishing with Mr. Werner Laurie "The Last Empress of the French," being the Life of the Empress Eugénie, wife of Napoleon III. The signs have been evident of late of a re-awakening of interest in the Imperial exile who has made England her home for the past thirty-five years. The present work is an attempt to deal with the now venerable lady essentially as a human being who has lived a long and stirring life amid the most varying fortunes, always preserving her own fascinating individuality from the days of her childhood down to an age to which few Empresses, even in the quietest surroundings, are wont to attain.

With reference to the report reproduced a few days ago as to an accident having befallen a Kobe resident in the neighbourhood of Nikko, the Kobe Herald has ascertained beyond all possibility of doubt that the gentleman referred to is Mr. W. E. Schmidt, Agent of the Union Insurance Company of Canton, Ltd. Mr. Schmidt, in company with Mr. Phipps, of H.B.M.'s Consulate at Kobe and two others, was at Yumoto on the 2nd inst., having walked over from Nikko. The party went on beyond the village to a hot spring, and were looking at the locality when the accident occurred. The party approached the spring—about a yard in diameter, with some planks over it—and were admiring the scenery, when Mr. Schmidt, to obtain a fuller view of a peak, stepped on one of the planks covering the spring. Unfortunately it gave way and Mr. Schmidt fell into the almost boiling water. His companions at once helped him out, but not before he had been badly scalded. They obtained a kago for him and conveyed him to Chusenji and ultimately to Nikko, where his burns were attended to. Mr. Schmidt is now in Hospital in Yokohama, and the latest advices give good news of his condition, the fever having been perceptibly reduced. He is expected to be about again within ten days.

The cricket world is provided with a new sensation in the definite refusals of George Hirst, of Yorkshire, and Tyldesley, of Lancashire, and Lilley, of Warwickshire, to accompany the M.C.C. team to Australia, especially as this action of the three Northern professionals will in all likelihood find an equally famous player in Hayward, of Surrey, also declining to go. The reasons given in all four cases are business interests in England. Without these famous names no English eleven can hope to represent English cricket adequately against a most powerful Australian eleven. So far England waits reinforcements to accompany the following eight certainties and one probable:—A. O. Jones (captain), K. L. Hutchings, P. Perrin (probable), Braund, Rhodes, Blythe, Fielder, Barnes, and Humphries.

"Those who know the City of London," says a writer in Cassell's Saturday Journal, "have probably at times been puzzled by the curious names borne by some of the localities. An antiquary thus explained a few of these:—"St. Margaret Patten" has no reference to footwear. The "pattens," were the patines, or plates used for the consecrated bread. "St. Mary Woolnoth" took its name from the wool market which once stood near it, "noth" being the old form of "nigh." "St. Mary Axe," popularly pronounced "Simmery Axe," gained its name from the fact that a house with the sign of an axe once stood in the street. "Crutched Friars" does not, as one might suppose, refer to crippled monks. It merely commemorates the cross worn by an order of friars who were known as "crossed" friars—"crossed" in course of time becoming "crutched." Thread-needle street was originally Three Needlestreet, from a house bearing the sign of the "Three Needles." Bread street was once the only street where bread was sold, while Friday street was the resort of fishmongers who provided the Friday diet of our pious ancestors.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

State census reports show that 22,000 heads of families have been lost to the state of Iowa in the past four years. It is estimated that 20,000 of this number moved to Canada, the larger portion going to Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The naval trial board has officially examined the new cruiser Washington and has found her to be in fine shape. The cruiser made 21.36 knots when put to the test off Cape May. This was faster than her sister ship, the Tennessee. All of the guns also were tested. Not a bolt strained when the heavy charges were fired.

Mr. Haldane, the British Secretary for War, confirms the report that an order for 100,000 sets of horseshoes has been placed in the United States. He adds that in the interests of the economical administration of the army he cannot disregard sources of supply which are satisfactory both as regards prices and efficiency.

Ex-President Grover Cleveland has given up all hope of leaving his Princeton, N. J., home for his customary summer vacation in New Hampshire because of the state of his health. Mr. Cleveland has been troubled with attacks of acute indigestion for a number of years, each more severe than the one previous. The present attack came as he was about to leave for his summer home. Mr. Cleveland now denies himself to visitors.

In compliance with a request from the Secretary of the Interior, Dr. J. Walter Fewkes of the bureau of American ethnology, has been directed by the acting secretary of the Smithsonian Institution to undertake the work of excavation, preservation and repairs to the cliff dwellings and other prehistoric ruins in the Mesa Verde National Park, Colo. The Mesa Verde National Park was created by an act of Congress approved June 29, 1906. It is on the border of the Montezuma Valley, just south of the ancient Montezuma road, and contains some of the best preserved relics of the prehistoric cliff dwellers in the country.

The itinerary of Secretary of War Taft, after leaving Seattle is as follows: Leave Seattle (ship Minnesota), Sept. 10; due Yokohama, Sept. 25; Kobe, Sept. 29; Nagasaki, Oct. 4; Shanghai, Oct. 6; Hongkong, Oct. 11; to arrive at Manila (via McClellan) Oct. 14. Returning: Leave Manila Nov. 4; arrive Vladivostok, Nov. 12; leave Vladivostok, Nov. 15; arrive Irkutsk, Nov. 16; Moscow, (stop two days), Nov. 23; St. Petersburg (stop two days), Nov. 26; Berlin (stop two days), Nov. 29; take steamer at Bremen, Hamburg or Cherbourg, according to best connections.

Information has reached New York from Rome that Pope Pius X. has bestowed the title of Countess on Mrs. Thos. E. Ryan, wife of the well known financier, in recognition of her charities and gifts to the church. The title, it is understood, was bestowed last December, but the fact did not become publicly known until now. Mrs. Ryan's gifts to the church and to charity, it is stated, ran into millions. The bestowal of this title is not the first favour she has received from the Vatican. Pope Leo XIII. granted her the dispensation of having a travelling chapel. This is installed in her private car, the Pere Marquette, and is the only one of its kind in America. The only other one in the world belongs to the Queen Dowager of Spain.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller is having more trouble in collecting $73.95 from the United States government for his travelling expenses and witness fees in the recent hearing in the federal court before Judge Landis. In making application for the amount due him, Mr. Rockefeller declared that he had travelled 1,149 miles to attend the session of court. He did not say, however, whether he came from Pittsfield, Mass., or Cleveland, Ohio. The government is therefore holding the money until it receives official information as to where Mr. Rockefeller started from when he came to court. Actually, United States Marshal Hoy knows that the claimant came from Pittsfield, but, officially, he does not know, and Mr. Rockefeller will not get his money until the marshal obtains the official information he is seeking.

The supreme court of California on August 10th in an opinion written by Chief Justice Beatty, decided that Mayor E. N. Taylor, of San Francisco, is legally entitled to hold office to which he was elected by the board of supervisors. The court directs the auditor and treasurer to recognize the signature of Mayor Taylor on the warrants for the payment of money from the city treasury and fully establishes that the appointment of Taylor as mayor was legal. It disposes of the claim of former Mayor Schmitz that his conviction and imprisonment for felony did not forfeit his tenure of office and removes the last vestige of doubt that the supervisors have the right to remove a convicted mayor and place a citizen in his stead. The decision of the court was unanimous and was signed by all the justices. It makes a most important victory for the graft prosecution and is a triumph for good government. The decision was rendered in a suit brought by Harry McKannay, secretary of Mayor Taylor, to compel the auditor to approve his salary demand, and to recognize the signature of Taylor as mayor.

If arrangements can be made for the reference of the Newfoundland fisheries dispute to The Hague Tribunal, it is quite probable that Canada will become a party to the same reference, as far as the coasts of Magdalen Islands and the Canadian Labrador are concerned, for on the latter the self-same difficulties arise as have led to friction with United States fishermen in Newfoundland waters. The interpretation of the treaty of 1818 as to the rights of United States fishermen on the coasts of the Magdalen Islands and Canadian Labrador, and as to the authority of the Canadian Government to establish rules and regulations for the preservation of these fisheries, binding upon fishermen of both countries would probably be acceptable to the Dominion Parliament, as they would obviate the risk of trouble that has already occurred between Americans and Newfoundland. The United States Senate, stubborn as it is, would hesitate before going the length of rejecting an award from The Hague on a matter of this kind, and perhaps, indeed, no better way could be found of clearing up the whole Atlantic fisheries question between Canada and the United States than an agreement to leave the interpretation of respective rights of Canadian and American fishermen on the coasts of the maritime provinces to the adjudication of The Hague.

DR. DE FOREST'S LECTURE ON "HOW TO BRING EAST AND WEST TOGETHER."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")
SIR,—In the concluding paragraph of a lecture recently given in America by the Rev. John H. De Forest, and reported in your journal of the 10th inst. he says:—

"There is but one organization on earth that speaks with unwavering confidence of the coming together of the East and West in one great Brotherhood of man. This is the Church of Christ, with its army of missionaries who have learnt the languages of the East, and lived in the homes of the people there. And to do this great work we must organize on large lines and work together, regardless of creeds, realizing that there is One God."

When will nine-tenths of the world cease to be led away by such platitudes as these? Mere words, which are not only meaningless, but which can be disproved by all the facts of history! For Dr. De Forest would have us infer that when East has been brought under the same belief as West with regard to "One God" the Brotherhood of Man will be attained, and as a natural consequence national wars must cease. How does the world's history of the last hundred years, i.e. from 1807 to 1907, agree with this theory? Can the bloodiest wars that have taken place between "Many God" nations, as those of the native Princes of India, the native Kings of Africa, the many chiefs of the South Sea Islands, etc., etc., compare for a moment with the terrible battles waged during the same period between the "One God" nations of the earth? Napoleon's latest wars with Austria and Russia, the Spanish Peninsular war, Waterloo, the Franco-Prussian war, the American Civil war, the first and last Boer wars, and the Cuban and Philippine wars, were all waged between nations which for centuries had believed (or professed to believe) in "One God"—with only certain creedal differences—while between "One God" nations and others have been those of the British in New Zealand, in India, Burmah, China, Zululand, and the latest Russo-Japan war, the histories of none of which redound much to the credit of the "One God" nations so far as the "Brotherhood of Man" is concerned, unless on the assumption that "Brotherhood" has too often meant grasping selfishness attempting to prove that "mine is right."

It is time the world outgrew such nonsense as that of the "Brotherhood of man under one God," becoming a means to the realization of universal peace, and regarded these matters as all "One God" nations always have done and always will do when international differences arise—from the point of self-interest and national expediency or self-defence only—without any reference to the question of "one God" or "many" Gods. And unless I am much mistaken, I think both the Japanese and Chinese (whom I imagine Dr. De Forest had in his mind when speaking of the "East") are quite shrewd enough to view the subject from the same point as

AN APPEAL.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")
SIR,—Among the numerous victims of the Hakodate fire there are few who so greatly deserve the sympathy of your many readers as the forty orphans of the Free School of the Sisters of St. Paul in Motomachi. Every one arriving at Hakodate could see this fine establishment standing on the hill. The work of education carried on there, well appreciated for the rest, was a homage to the sentiments of the noblest solidarity.

The conflagration destroyed the whole. Apart from the pupils now without a school there are the orphans without shelter. It will easily be understood what the asylum and maintenance of these dear children cost, after a fire such that everything became the prey of the flames except life and hope. There remain only ruins in Motomachi. Dispersed here and there, orphans and teachers await a provisionary shelter.

I doubt not that many of your readers will be willing to come to their aid.

I enclose my card, and with expressions of respectful consideration, remain

Your servant.

THE CATHOLIC MISSIONER IN CHARGE.

(Himself a victim.)

[We shall be glad to receive, acknowledge and forward subscriptions to this most worthy charity.—Ed. J. M.]

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

CHER MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR.—Parmi les nombreuses victimes de l'incendie, il en est peu qui méritent autant la sympathie de vos nombreux lecteurs comme des quarantins orphelins, de l'école libre des Sœurs de St. Paul à Motomachi.

Tout le monde en arrivant à Hakodate pouvait voir ce bel établissement se dresser sur la colline. L'œuvre d'éducation qui s'y accomplissait, bien appréciée du reste, était un hommage aux sentiments de la plus noble solidarité. L'incendie a tout détruit.

En dehors des élèves sans école, il y a les orphelins sans abri.

On comprendra aisément ce que coûte l'asile et l'éducation de ces chers enfants, après un pareil incendie où sauf la vie et l'espérance tout est devenu la proie des flammes.

Il si ya encore que des ruines à Motomachi. Dispersés ça et là orphelins et maitresses attendent un abri provisoire.

Je ne doute pas que beaucoup de vos lecteurs ne veuillent leur venir en aide.

En circulant ma carte je vous prie de me croire. Mousieur à ma respectueuse considération.

DR. MACKAY'S CRITICISM OF JAPANESE IN KOREA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I have read with great interest your leading article in last Friday's Japan Daily Mail, and find that your opinion and mine coincide. I saw Dr. Mackay in August at Petaiho, in China, where I found everywhere the European feeling very anti-Japanese, from Manchuria to Shanghai; and on very similar grounds to those described in your article. It was in vain that I protested that such conduct could not be with official consent, but must be that of the hooligan classes among the emigrants. Dr. Mackay's special mission seemed to be to stir up this feeling of antagonism among the missionaries; and I was personally approached by some of the latter to go to Korea and investigate the barbarous conduct of the Japanese as testified and sworn to by Dr. Mackay. I said that if this gentleman would put down any accusations in black and white which he could prove, and would further guarantee their accuracy by his own signature, etc., etc., I would have great pleasure in laying his statements before the highest authorities immediately on my arrival in Japan. Would you believe it? I had the greatest possible difficulty in squeezing the enclosed very trumpery statement out of the worthy Don Quixote, and even his signature had to be supplemented by another person as to his position, and then Toronto was omitted!! There was so much "fencing" on his own and missionary friends' part, because they feared names would damage "the cause;" and I only obtained the signature because I flatly refused to present any anonymous statement.

But having now shown this to certain Japanese here, they beg me to send it on to you as an illustration of the accusations made against their national conduct.

I am intensely grieved about it because I know the deep and growing anti-Japanese feeling in China amongst missionaries and others, and also know how very unjust it is; and I am so glad that you are doing what you can to vindicate them. I believe the rulers are animated by as high—or even higher—feelings as our own are at home.

Yours faithfully,

E. A. GORDON.

Member of the Japan Society, London.

[ENCLOSURE]

Petaiho, 1st August, 1907.

Mrs. GORDON.

DEAR MADAME,—In accordance with your request I state on paper the incident I repeated to you verbally, as a specimen of the treatment now being received by Koreans at the hands of the Japanese. May I say that this story was given me by a leading Korean—one of the sufferers, who called upon me when in Wonsan, hoping to get sympathy at least, if not helpful advice. My memory may not be perfectly accurate in some of the details, but the story is substantially as follows. The Japanese Consul sent to the villagers and said "We want your field and hill lands; you must give us deeds, and for so much (I think 1,700 yen) and if you do not give them up we will arrest you and put you in jail." The poor villagers were frightened and did sign away the property upon which they were only tenants, and which, of course, they had no right to do. When the proprietors heard of this they came to the Consul and remonstrated and said, "If you need this property for military purposes we will ask nothing for it until the war is over, but it belongs to us, and the price offered is no adequate estimate of its value." The Consul said, "That will do; we want it for military purposes until after the war; you will give us a writing to that effect." They agreed and went home and prepared a document granting temporary possession. When they brought it to the Consul he treated them haughtily and said he had no use for such a document, the deeds in his hands were sufficient. When they attempted to remonstrate further, he said he was a busy man and had no time to speak to them, and so they were summarily dismissed. I learned from other sources as well as from my Korean interviewer that a moderate estimate of the value of the property in question at that date would be 45,000 yen, and it has grown in value since that time. A new Japanese Consul is now in office and they called on him to see whether or not justice could be secured; he asked them to prepare a document stating the case fully and that he would consider it. That was the state of development when the gentleman called on me about the end of June, and asked what I thought they should do. My advice was that they prepare the memorial, do everything honourably and legally, so that whatever the Japanese did they might not be blamed.

That is the story so far as I have knowledge of it. Whether justice was done or not I do not know. I would be more hopeful were it not that I hear of so many parallel cases in different parts of Korea.

The story of the salt flats at Ham-Heung was given me by another Korean gentleman who called upon me and quietly asked "Is this western civilization?" He knew that I was a British subject, and that Britain is in alliance with Japan. I was for once ashamed of my country, in so far as Britain can be responsible for such conduct. May I add that this is the greatest disappointment I have met since I left Canada. During the war I was an ardent sympathiser with Japan. I prayed for her success in battle, because I thought her triumph would mean the dawn of righteous administration in the East. When in Egypt I saw, and was proud to see, what Great Britain did there and felt, "this is what Japan will help to establish in Korea and the East, a reign of justice and enlightenment and prosperity." I have travelled through Korea, east and west, and through Manchuria, and everywhere it is the same—oppression, immorality. But I cannot go into details. I return to Canada a disappointed man. I must speak out, no honourable man can be silent in the face of such misconduct. What an opportunity Japan has had! Has any nation ever enjoyed so fully the confidence and affection of the western world as she did at the end of the war? She is throwing it away and adopting a course that is rapidly winning for herself universal reprobation.

I am, Yours faithfully,

R. P. MACKAY.

Secretary of Canadian Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

LAUNCH OF THE "TENYO MARU."

In beautiful weather the Tenyo Maru, Japan's newest and greatest liner, was successfully launched from the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard's slips at Tateyama on Sept. 14th, says the Nagasaki Press. Considerably over one thousand invitations to witness the launch had been issued by the Company, and nearly that number of guests were present in addition to which practically the whole of the employees of the yard were as near the new vessel as they could possibly get. The bill at the rear of the shipyard was crowded with persons and the Nagasaki school-children were marched to Kozono and its vicinity, from whence a good view of the ship entering the water could be obtained.

The guests present included Governor and Madame Arakawa, Mayor Kitagawa, Rear-Admiral Takekuni (of the Navy Department, Tokyo) and a number of naval officers from Sasebo, the foreign Consuls, and a large number of Japanese and foreign residents including many ladies. Mr. S. Asano (President of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha), Mrs. Asano, and Mr. Shiraiishi (General Manager of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha), came from Tokyo to attend the ceremony. The steamship company's local agents, Messrs. Holme, Ringer and Co., were represented by Mr. J. H. Wallace. Mr. H. Shoda, of the Mitsu Bishi Company's Tokyo office, was also present.

Punctually at 11.30 a.m., Mr. H. Maruta (General Manager of the Dockyard) requested Mrs. Asano to cut the electric wire and release the vessel. For a few minutes the suspense was broken only by the noise of the workmen as they laboured to assist the movement of the gigantic hull, then a tremendous shout of Banrai was given by the immediate spectators as the vessel was seen to commence gliding down the ways and was re-echoed with greater volume by the people on the hillside and doubtless by the children on the Nagasaki shore. As soon as she entered the water the ships and launches in harbour blew their syrens and swelled the noise. The Oura Maru was in waiting, a towline was speedily made fast, and the Tenyo Maru was taken to Akunoura where she will be engaged.

This vessel was the first laid down of three sister ships ordered by the Toyo Kisen Kaisha (Oriental Steamship Company). She has various distinctions, among them that of being the largest merchant steamer ever launched in Japan or in fact in the Pacific and Indian Oceans. The turbine system of propulsion has been adopted and she will be the first trans-Pacific turbine liner as well as the first vessel to be built in Japan and adapted for the system. When completed, with her speed of 19 knots and superior accommodation, she will compare favourably with first-class Atlantic liners and be without a rival on the Pacific until her sister ships are in service.

The vessel's keel was laid down in November, 1905, so that she was twenty-two months on the stocks. Considerable delay in the arrival of the raw material from England prevented the builders from making record progress with the construction. The double bottom was completed in September, 1906, and the frame erection in December. About twice the quantity of steel has been worked into the Tenyo Maru of that in the N.Y.K. Tungo Maru which has hitherto had the distinction of being the largest product of Japanese shipbuilding enterprise, and was likewise built at the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard and Engine Works. Much of the success attained by the Mitsu Bishi Company has been due to the acquisition of only the most advanced and scientific machinery. An innovation in the construction of the Tenyo Maru has been a hydraulic riveter. The stern of the vessel is built on most graceful lines, the adoption of the turbine having greatly affected the shape. There are three propellers, of manganese bronze, but they are so small in comparison with those of ordinary steamers that one wonders how it is possible for the huge vessel to be propelled by them at even a moderate speed; they are expected to make 250 revolutions a minute, however, whereas 90 per minute is considered rapid with the ordinary type. The stern frame is of heavy cast steel and of an improved shape. The balancing rudder is also of heavy cast steel. An idea of the tremendous advance in size over the previous biggest vessel may be gathered from the fact that the launching weight of the Tenyo Maru was 8,200 tons, whereas that of the Tungo Maru was only 4,473 tons. Now that she has been launched, the engines—Parson's steam turbine—will be placed in the ship with all possible speed. All the auxiliary engines, condensing plant, etc., have been made at the Engine Works. The cabins, etc., have all been prepared in the carpenter's shop and can be built into the ship without further delay. All the woodwork is put together in the shop so that there shall be no question of error when it is being placed in position and the work of completing for sea can be carried out with celerity. The decorative features of the lounge, library, smoking room, saloon, etc., have been designed by Dr. Tsukamoto and are now being carried out effect by special skilled artisans. A well known Kyoto expert, Mr. Kawashima, has been entrusted with the upholstery work under special instructions from the Toyo Kisen Kaisha. There will be 78 first-class cabins, with 238 berths, and 12 intermediate cabins with 48 berths. Accommodation is also provided for 791 steerage and 1,260 Chinese steerage passengers. Her crew will consist of 238 officers and men. Special apartments on board the vessel will include a nursery, dark room for photographers, barber's shop, laundry, and hospital; the latter is to be fitted with special beds for patients in a critical condition. Disinfecting and fire extinguishing apparatus will be installed.

The Tenyo Maru has been built with a view to being employed as a cruiser—commerce destroyer—during war time. She will be fitted with wireless telegraphy apparatus and will thus be able to communicate with shore stations or other vessels similarly equipped.

The dimensions, etc., are as follows:—

Length between perpendiculars	550 feet.
Breadth moulded	63 "
Depth moulded (to upper deck)	38 ft. 6 in.
Shelter deck above upper deck	8 feet.
Promenade deck above shelter deck	9 "
Boat deck above promenade deck	9 "
Gross tonnage	13,500 tons.
Speed	19 knots.
Horse power	16,850

The vessel has been built under Lloyd's survey and to Teishusho (Communications Department) requirements.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

THE ST. LEGER.

London, Sept. 12.

The result of the St. Leger is as follows: Woolwinder, 2 Baltinglass, 3 Acclaim. The betting was 11 to 10 against Woolwinder, 100 to 8 against Baltinglass, and 8 to 1 against Acclaim.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTIONS.

The Russo-Japanese treaties have been published in St. Petersburg.

ADMIRAL IJIN IN AUSTRIA.

The Emperor Francis Joseph has received Admiral Ijin and his officers.

THE VANCOUVER SITUATION.

The combined Japanese and Chinese organization at Vancouver has made overtures to the Hindus to join in a general industrial strike. The Hindus declined to join on the ground that they are British subjects.

THE GERMAN ARMY MANŒUVRES.

Later.

The German army manœuvres have concluded. There is a divergence of opinion as to the operations especially as to fighting at short range in close formation. Extraordinary cavalry charges were made.

A DISTINGUISHED INVALID.

King Alfonso has been operated on for adenoids.

FRENCH WAR BALLOON AT CASABLANCA.

A French war balloon has ascended at Casablanca and reconnoitred the Arab position.

THE ACCIDENT TO THE TSAR'S YACHT.

London, September 13.

The Russian Imperial family have been safely transferred to the cruiser Asid. The public in St. Petersburg are ignorant of the accident. There is nothing about it in the morning papers.

VANCOUVER EXCITEMENT SUBSIDING.

The latest news from Vancouver is that the excitement is subsiding. The steamer Monteagle has arrived with 901 Hindus and 26 Chinese and Japanese.

Mr. Ishii, the Japanese Emigration Commissioner, says that according to a cablegram from Tokyo, Japan will not make an international incident of this affair, but will demand an indemnity for individual Japanese.

BRITISH MILITARY BALLOON.

London, Sept. 13.

The Daily Mail states that the British military authorities have established a station among the remote Athole mountains of Scotland, where experiments with a new aeroplane are being conducted with the strictest secrecy.

PROFESSIONAL CRICKETERS FOR INDIA.

The Sussex professionals, Messrs. Vine and Cox, are going to India to coach Prince Ranjitsingh's cricket team.

THE "LUSITANIA'S" MAIDEN TRIP.

Later.

Unprecedented interest is being taken in the voyage of the new Cunarder Lusitania on both sides of the Atlantic. Scores of Marconigrams are published showing the daily progress made. It is expected that she will smash the Queenstown-Sandy Hook record. Extraordinary preparations are being made to welcome her in New York.

DONCASTER CUP.

London, September 14.

The following is the result of the Doncaster Cup:—

THE RACE QUESTION ON THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

The Times prints a telegram from its correspondent in New York which says that all Japanese and Chinese at Bellingham have been warned to leave immediately.

Japanese working in the canneries have armed themselves and declare that they will resist any attempt to expel them.

Japanese and Chinese are arming in Seattle, where the anti Oriental League intends to hold a grand international demonstration.

The R. M. S. Monteagle proceeded from Vancouver to Victoria where her Japanese passengers were landed. She then returned to Vancouver to land the Hindus, but the steamship officials, owing to the enormous crowds which had gathered, ordered the Hindus back to the ship.

TROUBLE IN ZULULAND.

London, September 14.

The alleged increasing disaffection among the Zulus is causing concern to the residents of Natal.

THE "LUSITANIA'S" TRIP.

The new Cunard turbine Lusitania arrived at New York in 5 days 54 minutes. She was twice delayed by fog. Her average speed was 23.01 knots per hour, beating all westward maiden voyage records, but her average speed is below the records of the Deutschland and the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

RIOTERS COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

Later.

Nineteen of the Vancouver rioters have been committed for trial.

ADMIRAL IJIN AT TRIESTE.

Admiral Ijin gave a brilliant reception on board the Tsukuba at Trieste.

THE AMERICA'S CUP.

The Royal Irish Yacht Club have challenged for the America's Cup on behalf of Sir Thomas Lipton, the matches to take place in September, 1908.

THE ACCIDENT TO THE TSAR'S YACHT.

The St. Petersburg press attacks the naval administration in connection with the stranding of the Standart, the Slava declaring that the incident is worse than the defeat at Tsushima, and stigmatizes the ignorance of home waters as criminal.

THE LABOUR QUESTION IN CANADA.

London, September 14.

The Dominion Labour Congress at Winnipeg will consider the Oriental labour question. Some delegates advocate a general strike in Canada in order to show the national antipathy to Japanese and Hindus landed at Vancouver unmolested. A hundred weaklings have been ordered to be deported.

THE CHALLENGE FOR THE "AMERICA" CUP.

London, September 16.

Herreshoff has completed his preliminary designs for a ninety-footer to defend the America Cup. The extreme features of the former defenders have been abandoned.

MOROCCO.

The Sultan of Morocco has left Fez for Rabat, where he is expected on the 21st.

It is reported that Mulai Hafid is also proceeding thither with thirty thousand followers. General Drude reports that he has prolonged the armistice of 24 hours at the request of the tribesmen, most of whom avow peace.

CRICKET.

London, September 16.

The cricket match between the Rest of England and Notts, played at the Oval, was drawn.

ANOTHER RUSSIAN ASSASSINATION.

The Governor of Akatui prison, in Siberia, on leave at home, was shot dead by a man named Pekoff, after an excited debate where-in it was stated that the last Duma had alleged the ill-treatment of politicals in Akatui prison.

CANADA AND THE JAPANESE.

Later.

Mr. Scott, Superintendent of Immigration, has left Ottawa for Vancouver to investigate the whole position of Oriental immigration.

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

There have been 1663 cases of cholera in Astrakan since the outbreak and 849 deaths. The epidemic is increasing in Samara, Nijni Novgorod and elsewhere.

THE STRIKES IN EUROPE.

One thousand more English strike-breakers arrived at Hamburg to-day, but many others are growing tired of the continual confinement and are leaving the port. The strike has spread to Rotterdam.

PROSPECTS OF PEACE.

London, September 17.

The important Chaonia tribe at Casablanca have accepted General Drude's conditions and propose to return on Thursday with chiefs of each tribe and district to arrange terms for general submission.

FIGHTING IN PORTUGUESE AFRICA.

The Portuguese of Angola, West Africa, had a fierce engagement with the natives at Cuamahas on Sunday. Many were killed and wounded.

CANADA AND JAPANESE EMIGRANTS.

Mr. Templeman, the Dominion Minister for Inland Revenue, speaking at Victoria, strongly advocated admitting to Canada only immigrants likely by assimilation and intermarriage to assist to build up a homogenous population.

DUTCH DEFEAT IN CELEBES.

News has reached Rotterdam that a force of Dutch troops was defeated at Mandhar, Celebes, on the 9th of September, with great losses. Reinforcements have been sent.

DRUDE'S CONDITIONS.

Later.

It is stated that General Drude's conditions include surrender of the tribesmen implicated in the massacre, the payment of an indemnity for the massacre and the sacking of Casablanca and the handing over of hostages as a guarantee of good faith.

HOLLAND AND HER COLONIES.

Queen Wilhelmina, in opening Parliament, announced that serious efforts would be made to render the consolidation of authority in the Dutch Indies beneficial to the native population.

THE RACIAL QUESTION IN VANCOUVER.

London, September 18.

The Vancouver Asiatic Exclusion League threaten drastic measures unless the Dominion Government passes a relieving measure in respect to Asiatic immigration.

An international exclusionist convention will be held in Vancouver during October.

JAPAN'S CLAIMS.

The Japanese claims for compensation for the damage inflicted during the riots amount to £1,500 sterling. They have been sent to Ottawa.

INTERNATIONAL BALLOON RACE.

Later.

Twenty-nine balloons participated in an international balloon race at Brussels. The winner turned up in a German who covered 603 miles, landing at Bayonne; a Swiss was second with 563 miles; the Britishers, Huntingdon, 556 miles, and Rolle, 537 miles, were third and fourth.

CRICKET.

Prince Ranjitsinhji has engaged Lilley, the Warwickshire professional, as coach for his cricket team.

KAISER DECORATES RUSSIAN GENERALS.

Later.

The Kaiser has conferred five decorations on prominent Russian Generals. Kuropatkin received the Grand Cross of the Red Eagle.

THE STANDARD OIL COMPANY.

It is reported from New York that in the Government action the Federal Court annuls the charter of the Standard Oil Company in New Jersey. The evidence showed an aggregate profit from 1899 to 1906 of £98,063,187 sterling, the dividends paid being £61,671,886.

(By Special Arrangement with the "Tokyo Asahi Shinbun.")

THE DISTURBANCES AT VANCOUVER.

San Francisco, September 1.

A plot to burn down all the Japanese buildings is being hatched in Vancouver. A quantity of cotton soaked in kerosene oil has been found at the entrance of the Japanese Christian church. Mr. K. Morikawa, Japanese Consul, has asked the Mayor of Vancouver to take steps necessary to prevent the further outbreak of disturbances. The Mayor, consequently, asked Colonel Holmes, commanding the provincial militia, to despatch a force to the city.

All Japanese and Chinese employees have struck work. Many of the timber factories, etc., are unable to continue business, and steamers are unable to leave.

To-day, a steamer with five hundred Japanese, is expected to arrive at Vancouver. Probably trouble about them will take place with the mob. The Japanese and Chinese intend to burn down the whole city if the rioters attack them again.

VANCOUVER.

Ottawa, September 12.

The latest news is that the excitement is dying down in Vancouver. Many Asiatics have returned to work in the hotels. The Dominion Government is anxious to obtain a limit to Japanese immigration but it is hardly likely to make any overtures to Tokyo until the Canadian authorities are able to ensure ample protection for the Japanese.

Newspapers in New York in numerous articles talk about the impossibility of assimilating the Japanese and the gulf which exists between East and West, as well as the ineradicable racial prejudice which exists.

CASABLANCA.

Paris.

Peace negotiations at Casablanca with the Moorish tribes have met with fierce opposition. The French will advance and occupy Djeddert.

RUSSIAN REFORM.

The congress of Zemstovs has adopted a resolution tantamount to the indefinite postponement of local government reform.

THE RACIAL AFFAIR.

San Francisco, September 12.

The Japanese and Chinese residing at Bellingham in Washington State have received copies of an anonymous letter saying that they must leave the place at once, otherwise danger impends. The Japanese declare they will defend themselves with arms, and the Chinese are making preparations to leave the town. The managers of the various canning factories are saying that if the Asiatics go the salmon tinning industry must be abandoned.

The British steamer Monteagle, with a large number of Japanese, Chinese and Indians, arrived at Vancouver on the morning of September 12th. The Asiatic passengers all landed safely under guard of the police. The condition is generally quiet.

Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, left Vancouver on Sept. 12th for Ottawa.

San Francisco, September 13.

An anti-Japanese meeting will shortly be held at Vancouver. The police superintendent of the city says that he will not interfere with any peaceful meetings, but will take precautions to prevent the outbreak of trouble through the meetings. The Japanese who were employed by various family-stopped work and are assembling in the Japanese quarter.

A SCHOOL AFFAIR IN CHICAGO.

The superintendent of a Chicago school has applied to the city educational authorities for permission to take three Japanese, two Irish, and one British, one Portuguese, and one Persian child into the school. The educational authorities are opposed to taking the grown-up Japanese into school with white children.

FIGHTING AT CASABLANCA.

London, Sept. 13.

At Casablanca the French troops attacked the Moors who were utterly routed despite the intrepidity of the Arabs. The camp and village of Teddert were captured and burnt. The French artillery and infantry showed great dash.

THE ANTI-ORIENTAL CRAZE.

New York papers report that all Japanese and Chinese are warned to leave Bellingham. The Japanese workers in the canneries are armed and declare that they will resist attempts at expulsion.

At Seattle Japanese and Chinese are arming and assembling within the Oriental quarter.

At Vancouver a mob is trying to prevent the landing of 900 Hindus from the steamer Monteagle. A subscription has been opened to send them by train to Ottawa.

The labour unions have warned employers of Asiatics that they must replace them with whites, otherwise they threaten strikes and boycotts.

THE HAGUE CONVENTION.

Regarding the position of neutrals in naval warfare there is every indication that unanimity is unachievable on the subjects of neutral prizes, and the treatment of belligerent warships in neutral ports.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

Referring to the Russo-Japanese convention, the Star regrets the cession of the Kwangchengtze collieries to Japan and thinks the conventions will be a blow to Russian trade and a natural outcome of defeat.

VANCOUVER.

London, September 14.

The situation in Vancouver is quieter. The Asiatics were landed unmolested; and are amply supplied with money.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that the Svet declares the Russo-Japanese conventions to be perfectly normal embodiments of the most-favoured-nation principle. The Russ considers them to be unduly favourable to Japan. Several journals bitterly denounce the naval administration, instancing the disgraceful grounding of the Tsar's yacht.

THE GERMAN ARMY MANOEUVRES.

Telegrams from Berlin say that Colonel Gaedke, criticising the army manoeuvres, declares that strategy was absent and that the tactics were ancient. Men were compelled to march extravagant distances; commanders failed to ensure uniform independent action on the part of the troops.

PERSIA.

From Teheran it is reported that the Russian Legation has warned the National Assembly that unless the disorders in the northern provinces are quelled it may be necessary for Russia to intervene in a military sense.

THE VANCOUVER AFFAIR.

San Francisco, September 14.

On Sept. 14th, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of the Government, will have an interview with Mr. K. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, at Ottawa. They will conduct negotiations as to limiting the number of Japanese coming into Columbia. It is said that the negotiations are regarded in San Francisco as a preliminary step to settle the question of Orientals in Western Canada.

The Canadian Government on Sept. 14th despatched a special commission to Columbia in order to investigate question with regard to Orientals, especially Indians.

The Mayor of Vancouver has telegraphed to the Premier of Canada that nine hundred Indians had arrived in the city. The new comers are in monetary difficulties and have no work. The Mayor asked the Premier whether the Indians might be assisted at the expense of the Federal Government. The Premier replied that the poorer immigrants should be sent back to their homes, but the central government would take steps after investigation.

It is reported from Seattle that Mr. Hisamizu, Japanese Consul, and some journalists there have asked the police superintendent to stop the anti-Japanese meeting which is to be held shortly. The police superintendent replied that the request would not be acceded to and that the police would control the meeting so that there would be no damage to the Oriental quarters.

All the newspapers of San Francisco condemn the London Times with regard to the latter's comment that the disturbances at Vancouver are attributable to the instigation of American agitators. The journals also oppose Count Okuma's views with regard to the trouble.

UNREST IN THE PACIFIC.

London, September 15.

It is reported from Sydney that there is considerable unrest in the Pacific, where the inhabitants of Tahiti, the German possessions, and New Caledonia, under the influence of an acute industrial crisis, have petitioned for annexation by Great Britain.

ANTI-MILITARISM IN FRANCE.

Telegrams from Paris state that seven anti-militarists have been charged with inciting troops to mutiny and murder, and have been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

THE ASIATIC QUESTION IN CANADA.

It is reported from Ottawa that the Minister of Internal Revenue has delivered an injudicious speech deprecating Asiatic immigration as tending to weaken the homogeneity of the confederation.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, Sept. 16.

The Canadian Government will pay for the damage sustained by the Japanese through the recent disturbances. Fifty-six Japanese houses in all were damaged and the loss is estimated at over ten thousand yen. The actual amount of the Japanese claims has been considerably reduced by private instruction of the Japanese Government.

The Japanese claims consist of direct damage only and none of the indirect loss is included. The attitude adopted by the Japanese shows that they maintain friendliness towards the British Government.

Probably the Government will make the loss good, with which the Japanese are expected to be satisfied. It is said that after having repaired the damage, the Central Government will look for reimbursement to the city of Vancouver. The mayor, however, is reported to have declared that the city will not bear the burden and that the Federal Government is responsible for maintaining order in the city and the preventing of any trouble with its own police force thus protecting the foreigners residing there.

All the hotels of Vancouver have refused to accommodate or even to supply food to the Hindus who recently arrived there. The new comers are in a serious condition and have appealed to the mayor of the city, who, however, pays no attention to their requests.

A CHINESE REQUEST.

It is rumoured that the Chinese Government has asked the American Government for support against the aggressiveness of Japan, Great Britain, and France.

SUBMARINES.

Two new French submarines on Sept. 15th made a voyage of 222 nautical miles at a speed of 8 miles. It is regarded as a submarine record.

MR. TAFT'S CHANCES.

Popular belief as to the successful candidate in the forthcoming presidential election lies between Mr. Taft and Mr. Hughes. It is generally hoped that Mr. Taft will be elected as President and Mr. Hughes as Vice-President. Recently five hundred and twenty senators and journalists belonging to the Republican party conducted a trial election. According to the result, 280 votes were given for Mr. Taft and 213 for Mr. Hughes.

THE INSTIGATION OF THE RIOT.

San Francisco, September 17.

The instigator of the late disturbances in Vancouver was Mr. Fuller (?) secretary of the anti-Japanese-Korean Society of Seattle. He has declared that unless the anti-Japanese affair assumes importance in the British dominions the American agitation for Japanese expulsion can not be successful, and that on this ground he engineered the trouble. Mr. Fuller is now at Seattle attending to the Japanese expulsion movement.

PLAGUE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Thirty plague patients in all have died in San Francisco. Strict precautions are being taken by the sanitary authorities to prevent the spread of the disease. Most of the victims are Italians, and there are no Japanese among them.

THE HAGUE.

London, September 17.

There is some reason to hope that in the form which the Hague Tribunal proposals are now taking Japan may be able to accede to them.

Twenty-five States support the British proposals for the total abolition of the principle of contraband. The British have drawn up a draft convention whereby the States agree to abandon the principle, and will only exercise the right of search in order to establish the neutral character of vessels. America apparently tends to abandon the principle of conditional contraband.

THE FRANCO-JAPANESE TREATY.

The Paris Temps strongly refutes the suggestion made by ex-Minister Baugin that the Franco-Japanese Treaty is regarded by the French negotiators as a bait for a policy of aggrandisement. China has no grounds for disquietude.

CASABLANCA.

The Arabs are negotiating peace with the French.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Japanese and Russian issues have risen generally and close firm.

JAPAN AND CANADA.

Later.

It is reported from Ottawa that Mr. Ishii has conferred with the Premier, who expressed sincere regret for the Vancouver outrages, and intimated Canada's desire to effect an arrangement with Japan whereby immigration will be restricted to a moderate number yearly.

MR. MOTONO.

Diplomatists in St. Petersburg are much gratified at the honour conferred on Mr. Motono, who enjoys well-merited esteem.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

There has been a protracted debate with regard to the employment of submarine mines. Germany proposes to prohibit entirely for five years the employment of floating and anchored mines. Sir E. Satow declared that the conference ought to prohibit mines which can break loose from their moorings, and floating mines except during battle, and prohibit the employment of anchored mines to an area of ten miles from the coast. Mr. Tsuzuki said that if floating mines are entirely prohibited, the means of national strength would be materially altered. He favoured rather restriction in the employment of submarine mines.

(RECEIVED AT THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

Vienna, Sept. 12th, from Admiral Ijuin.

ADMIRAL IJUIN.

When our squadron arrived in this country the Minister of the Navy suspended the manoeuvres and came to Trieste to meet us. He gave a banquet to our officers on the 5th and on the 11th we were granted audience, graciously addressed by the Emperor and granted high Orders. Thursday we lunched with the Minister of Marine and in the evening were banquetted at the Palace, being conveyed there and back in Imperial carriages. We also had a special carriage to take us to and from Vienna, and in Trieste we were warmly welcomed by all classes.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

Vancouver, Sept. 12th, from Mr. Consul Morikawa.

VANCOUVER.

The 11th passed quietly. Mr. Ishii left this morning for Ottawa.

(SPECIAL TO THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SUCCESSFUL LAUNCH OF THE "TENYO MARU."

Nagasaki, Sept. 14.

The Toyo Kisen Kaisha's turbine liner Tenyo Maru was launched most successfully at 11.30 o'clock this morning from the Mitsui Bishi Shipbuilding Yard at Nagasaki in the presence of a thousand guests. The hillsides were lined with people. Mrs. Asano, wife of the President of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, performed the ceremony. At the luncheon following congratulatory messages were read from the Ministers for the Navy and for Communications.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28TH, 1907.

BIRTH.

At 118-C Bluff, Yokohama, on Saturday night, 2nd inst., the wife of REGINALD CARREW ROSS, of a daughter.

Home papers please copy.

DEATH.

At No. 90-C Bluff, Yokohama, on Tuesday, Sept. 24th, at 11 p.m., Mrs. R. P. BRIDGENS, aged 77.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

On Sept. 24th, snow again fell on Fuji.

Mount Fuji was crowned with snow on the night of Sept. 20th.

MR. M. KATO has been appointed Consul-General at Mukden.

BICYCLE races will be held on Oct. 6th in the compound of the Hachiman temple, Kamakura.

THE Government intends to rebuild the Houses of the Diet at a cost of twenty million yen and to complete the building within ten years, commencing in the forthcoming year.

A SHANGHAI telegram says that Mr. U-Chéng-fang has been appointed Minister to Washington.

THE Hiroshima branch of the Suwo Bank was destroyed by fire on September 18th.

A HUNDRED cases of typhus appeared on Sept. 20th among the students of the Kumamoto Normal School.

THE new cruiser Tone will be launched on Oct. 24th at Sasebo. The Crown Prince will probably be present at the ceremony.

A FISH torpedo was found off Haneda by a fisherman on Sept. 21st. It was at once landed at the village of Koyasu near Kanagawa.

AT 1 p.m. on Sept. 20th, a freight train on the Hokuyetsu Railway was derailed at Takata causing severe damage to the line. Traffic was stopped.

FIRE broke out on Friday evening a little before 9 o'clock at No. 142, Yokohama, occupied by Chinese, resulting in considerable damage to a godown.

THE Tsukuba and Chitose will leave Suez on Sept. 26th on their way home. The cruisers will call at Aden, Colombo, Batavia, Singapore and Manila.

TWO trains collided at Hakata station on the evening of Sept. 18th. The locomotive and a carriage of one train were derailed and damaged. No person was injured.

ALL the workmen employed at the hat and cap factories of Osaka struck on Sept. 20th for an increase of wages by 30 per cent. Probably the request will be granted.

THE armoured cruiser Kurama, which is under construction at Yokosuka, will be launched on Oct. 22nd. It is said that the Emperor will be present at the ceremony.

PRINCESS KAN-IN left Shimbashi on Sept. 23rd by the 7.45 train for Shimane Prefecture, to be present at a meeting of the local branch of the Ladies' Patriotic Society.

THE Japanese peerage consists of 15 Princes, 39 Marquises, 99 Counts, 377 Viscounts, and 377 Barons. Further promotions to the peerage were to be made on Sept. 23rd.

THE steamer Chugoku Maru (583 tons) went ashore on the morning of Sept. 22nd off Hana-saki, Nemuro, Hokkaido. She sustained serious damage. The crew were saved.

TIENSIN people are protesting vigorously against an order which has been issued by the Hongkong Government closing the British Post Office at Tientsin on Sept. 30th.

H. E. VICEROY CHANG CHIH-TUNG is said to have handed to the Throne between the 8th and 10th instant, during the first three days of his arrival in Peking, no less than forty-six memorials.

PROFESSOR REIN, of Jena, who has profoundly influenced education in Germany and other European countries, as well as in England and America, attained his 60th birthday on August 10. A great festival was held at the Volkhaus in Jena in his honour. An interesting episode was the presentation of a silver inkstand with an inscription from Professor Rein's English friends.

THE steamer Kwanio Maru on Sept. 22nd ran on the wreck of a steamer which was sunk at the entrance of Port Arthur during the war. Floating measures are being carried out.

TEN cases of cholera were reported on the evening of September 18th among the officers and soldiers belonging to the Nagasaki garrison. Major Minoda died the following morning.

OWING to a storm, the steamer Sunioyoshi Maru (1,342 tons) went ashore off Matono, Shima, province, at 7 p.m. on Sept. 17th on a voyage from Yokohama to Karatsu. The crew of thirty-four are safe.

OWING to heavy weather a fishing vessel was capsized on Sept. 18th off Idzu promontory. The fishermen, twenty-five in all, were drowned. On the following morning, three bodies were washed ashore at Shimoda.

A CASE of cholera appeared in Tokyo on Sept. 25th, the patient being a sendo employed on a lighter at the Creek near Toyosumi bridge, Hakozaki-cho, Nihonbashi, Tokyo. He died at 3 p.m. the same day.

THE wedding took place on Sept. 19th in Tokyo of Mr. K. Okura (26) eldest son of Mr. Okura Kihachiro, and Miss Kuni (19) elder daughter of Count M'zouguchi, descendant of the ex-feudal Lord of Shibata, Niigata Prefecture.

ACCORDING to the officials of the Yokohama water works, no damage was sustained at the source of the water supply during the recent flood or by the subsequent earthquake. The water of the Doshi is still about three feet over the normal level, and is very muddy.

A TELEGRAM from Usunomiya says that on the evening of Sept. 21st, H. Takahisa (27), a farmer, living in the village of Masu, murdered another farmer named Takayoshi, his wife and their son with a hatchet and also inflicted severe injuries on two other members of the family. The culprit escaped.

THE fishing vessel Iwate Maru (199 tons) belonging to the Niigata Deep Sea Fishery Company, founded on Sept. 9th owing to a storm, off Rijiri, Hokkaido, on her way from West Kam-chatka, etc. Twenty-four of the crew of forty were drowned. The loss by vessel and cargo amounts to thirty thousand yen.

THE funeral of Mrs. R. P. Bridgens, whose sudden death on Tuesday caused quite a shock to many old residents, took place in Yokohama on Thursday and was largely attended. The Rev. E. S. Booth conducted the ceremony and the chief mourners were the daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. van der Polder. The bearers were Messrs. Schwartz, J. de Cuera de Cogolin, R. S. Schwabe, J. E. Ekstrand, J. Carst and F. P. Solomon.

THE first meeting of the Matsudo Race Club, which is held not far from Utsunomiya, Tokyo, took place on September 22nd. There were few visitors. The second day of the meeting came off on the national holiday, Sept. 24th, when the pavilion was occupied by about four thousand visitors principally from Tokyo and Yokohama, including a number of foreigners. The races were carried out successfully, and the pari mutuel was largely patronised. Many of the committee of this Club are military officers.

KORÆA.

Friday, September 20.

The news is confirmed that the reigning Emperor of Korea did actually proceed on the afternoon of the 17th inst. to the Palace newly prepared for his reception. The object of this move was to separate the two Emperors, but that purpose was effectually frustrated by the ex-Emperor, who, in company with Lady Om, accompanied the reigning sovereign on the pretext of seeing him as far as his new residence. When, however, a question rose as to the ex-Emperor's return, he said that he could not leave his son until the latter had recovered completely from the effects of his recent accident. Thus the two Sovereigns are living together again as before, the only difference being that they have changed their place of residence.

As for the state of affairs in the disaffected provinces, much the same budget of news is iterated. Here and there small bodies of insurgents are discovered and partially annihilated, while, on the other hand, solitary Japanese police constables are attacked by the insurgents and assassinated.

The changes in the organisation of the Residency-General, which have been a subject of talk for some days, were submitted to the Privy Council on the 19th instant and received immediate approval. They were then presented to his Majesty, and it is expected that they will forthwith appear in the Official Gazette. The principal change is that a Vice-Resident General is to be appointed. Baron Sone, formerly Minister of Finance and now head of the Basei-kyoku, will be appointed to the new post, it is said. If this appointment be made it will probably provoke some comment, for Baron Sone is anything but a persona grata with the Seiyu-kai.

The Asahi Shimbun is the only leading newspaper that has hitherto commented on this creation of a new post in Korea. Its comments are not sympathetic. No valid reason for such a creation suggests itself, and the Asahi falls back on the hypothesis that Marquis Ito must have good reason for what he does. It does not appear to have struck our contemporary that one palpable consequence of this step will be to keep the administration of Korean affairs in the hands of the civil party, whether the Resident-General be present or absent. As things are now ordered, the control passes into the hands of the military from the moment when the Resident-General leaves Seoul.

There is another cloud upon the political horizon in Korea. It arises in connexion with the choice of a consort for the Prince Imperial. The Prime Minister is said to be pushing the interests of his own daughter and to have obtained the approval of the Court, whereas the Il Chinghoi, their leader Sung, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, and the refugees returned from Japan are marshalling themselves in opposition to this arrangement. Rumour has it that the project is a device of the ex-Emperor to win over to his side the party of the Premier.

Saturday, September 21.

Particulars are now published of the Mokdo disaster, which resulted in the murder of 7 Japanese and 4 Koreans. These men had been sent from Kunsan to reconnoitre the state of Mokdo Island where rumour said that some of the disbanded soldiers were behaving with great violence. As the boat containing the party approached the shore, it was observed by the Korean soldiers, and, concealing themselves until it was within easy range, they fired volleys which resulted in the death of all the reconnoitring party. Thereafter the whole of the inhabitants of the island, to the number of 600, fearing the consequences of the assassination, fled to some place which remains undiscovered. When another party of Japanese arrived a few days later to investigate, they found only two old women on the island, and from them the above facts were learned.

There are various reports from the disturbed provinces showing that several collisions have taken place with the insurgents. In each case the Japanese detachments were entirely successful.

A separation of the ex-Emperor and the reigning Emperor has been effected. It is not quite clear from what quarter the influence was exerted which produced this result, but the fact seems to be now certain that the ex-Emperor and Lady Om returned to the old Palace on the 18th instant. How much reality there may be in this separation remains to be seen.

Sunday, September 22.

The Mainichi Dempo's Seoul correspondent sends news that the separation of the two Sovereigns is being converted into a comedy. The ex-Emperor and Lady Om spent one night, it is true, at the Palace to which the reigning Emperor has moved, but they repaired thither again on the following day, and all appearances go to indicate that daily visits and nightly absences are to be the programme henceforth. It is pleasant to see so much affection between a parent and a child.

At Yangheung in the vicinity of Seoul there has been a three hours' engagement between a Japanese detachment and a body of insurgents. The latter ultimately fled, leaving 20 of their number on the field. The Japanese do not appear to suffer any casualties in these various encounters. Meanwhile the Throne has issued a proclamation which is to be scattered broadcast throughout the country. It calls upon the people to abandon their futile resistance and to resume their regular occupations. If they continue their present riotous behaviour, they will merely throw away their lives futilely, and will lose their crops which are now ripening, so that distress if not starvation will be the fate of their families.

There is again talk of sending reinforcements to Korea. The military authorities are persuaded that order and peace can be fully restored before the end of October, with the present troops, but it will depend entirely on Prince Ito's dictum whether two more regiments are despatched.

Japanese papers attach a great deal of importance to the projected visit of the Crown Prince of Japan to Korea. His Imperial Highness is to be accompanied by a large retinue, the principal personages being Prince Arisugawa, Marquis Katsura, Baron Hanabusa, Count Togo, Prince Iwakura and Dr. Sato. It is thought that this visit will be an unequivocal demonstration of the light in which Japan intends to regard the Imperial House of Korea, and that it will thus have a signal effect in calming the people's minds.

Prince Ito left Japan on the 21st inst. for Oiso, where he will remain until the 26th or 27th and then start for Korea.

Monday, September 23.

The ex-Emperor of Korea continues to spend his days at the Palace with the reigning Emperor and to return at night to his own Palace. His Majesty seems to be swayed by extreme solicitude on account of the welfare of his son. It was expected at the time of the latest intelligence that the Cabinet would enter a strong protest against this method of procedure.

It seems probable that a serious question of compensation will have to be faced in connexion with the disturbances in Korea. Great numbers of Japanese—they are said to aggregate some thousands—have been compelled to fly for their lives from the interior of the country, abandoning all their property which necessarily includes the crops raised on land reclaimed by years of labour. They are naturally alleging a right to be compensated for these losses, but thus far neither the Residency-General nor the Seoul Government shows any disposition to recognise the claim. There is talk of a mass meeting and of an appeal to the people of Japan.

Marquis Katsura is quoted by the Hochi Shimbun as saying that he accompanies the Prince Imperial to Korea not as a civil official but in his old role of a General officer. He expects to be released from attendance on the Prince shortly after reaching the Peninsula, and he will then undertake a tour through the whole country to investigate the state of affairs. From the language attributed to the Marquis, it would seem that he advocates the despatch of reinforcements to Korea. He does not regard the insurrection as in any sense serious, but he thinks that it concerns Japan's prestige not to lose a day in restoring peace and good order and in affording due protection for life and property.

Tuesday, September 24.

Wearisome details continue to be telegraphed about the goings to and fro of the ex-Emperor and the reigning sovereign. One is disposed to imagine that their movements are dictated by a desire to demonstrate that nothing can keep them apart. There is, of course, no valid reason why they should not be in communication of the intimate nature befitting the relation of father and son, but where the father's influence is thrown entirely into the scale of intrigue and insurrection, the matter assumes a different aspect. It would have been better, apparently, had the original programme been adhered to, namely, the removal of the ex-Emperor's residence to Suwon, 25 miles from Seoul.

It is alleged, and indeed we can well credit the opinion, that the strength of the insurgents in Korea has greatly waned. If it were possible to make an arithmetical statement of the number of their collisions with the Japanese and of the resulting casualties, the record would be very formidable. But it is not to their losses in open combat that their decline of strength is attributed: it is rather to the exhaustion of their ammunition and to the difficulty of getting provisions. They are said to be breaking up into parties of from 3 to 5 men each, who devote themselves mainly to marauding. This fact that ammunition is becoming scarce may possibly account for the failure of the insurgents to inflict any loss on their assailants. Thus at Yangchi there took place on the 22nd inst. an engagement in which 200 Koreans were concerned. The fight lasted two hours and the insurgents ultimately fled, leaving 21 of their number dead or dying upon the field, whereas the Japanese had no casualties whatever. Indeed "no casualties" is the general return made by the Japanese commanding officers in these affairs, and it awakens a sentiment of pity in the mind of anyone reading the reports, for, after all, these Koreans, if they are willing to stand up thus and be shot fruitlessly for the sake, as they imagine, of their country's independence, must be imbued with a much stronger sentiment of patriotism than the world has hitherto been disposed to believe. Those that have been busy during the last two years preaching to these unfortunate people lying sermons about Japanese designs and Japanese iniquities, have a great deal to answer for.

On the 22nd inst. the insurgents made a raid against Chiksan where gold mining operations are carried on by foreigners. Some houses were burned, and it is stated that 50 Japanese and 5 foreigners escaped with their lives.

There are signs of growing impatience in Japan because of these protracted troubles in Korea. It is urged by certain publicists that the gloved hand has been too much in evidence and that the hour for the mailed fist has now arrived. There is no doubt that although the insurgents can not hold their own for a moment when they are brought into contact with Japanese regular troops, they are successfully creating a state of affairs more injurious to Japanese interests than would be several military contetemps. For it has become almost impossible for any Japanese subject to reside and carry on business in the disaffected regions. We read daily of men being obliged to fly from their domiciles leaving behind them the fruits of many years' toil, and the trouble is not limited to the losses actually incurred by these fugitives but extends also to Japanese immigrants in general, who naturally hesitate to take the risk of settling in a country where so little security exists for life or property. Of course it will be a matter of the simplest justice to compensate these sufferers, but that is a very minor feature of the situation. What is imperatively wanted is to sweep the insurgents out of the field and to completely restore law and order. Japan has put her hand to the plough and there can be no looking back. Besides it is not as though the whole of the Peninsula were in an unquiet condition: the turmoil is confined to a comparatively small area in the vicinity of the capital. The exercise of a little more strength would soon restore the situation, and although drastic measures might involve suffering for innocent people, to palter with the trouble is the surest way of extending its dimensions. The Mainichi Dempo writes very strongly on this subject and comes to the conclusion that Prince Ito's policy of consideration must give temporary place to a heroic programme.

The Kokumin Shimbun has an interesting statistical article showing the extremely backward condition of agriculture in Korea. The most eloquent feature of this arithmetic is that, whereas there are 319 inhabitants to each square mile in Japan and only 118 in Korea, the rice produced in the Peninsula averages only half a koku per head against one koku in Japan. There is no evidence that Korea is less richly equipped by nature for agricultural purposes than Japan: the explanation seems to be simply laziness and bad administration. Our contemporary urges that great opportunities offer for Japanese farmers, but recommends that any persons intending to emigrate should not proceed as individuals but should combine to form communities which would settle in one place and have a reasonable command of capital while also possessing self-defensive competence. Such a guild is already in process of formation in Fukuoka Prefecture.

Wednesday, September 25.

The Seoul correspondent of the Mainichi

Dempo sends a long telegram which is decidedly pessimistic in tone. He alleges that the ex-Emperor is just as potent as ever and is deliberately exercising his powers as though he were the reigning Sovereign and his son a mere figure-head. It is not merely that the ex-Emperor and his consort spend their whole days at the new Palace and that the nights are busy with telephonic messages and other communications between the two Palaces, but also that in all matters coming within the purview of the Court the nominally reigning Sovereign is openly relegated to an altogether secondary place. Much of the responsibility for this state of affairs is placed upon the shoulders of the Minister of the Household and the Chief Chamberlain, and it is thought that these officials will have to resign in the face of pressure brought to bear on them by the Ministry. It is alleged that telegraphic communications have been addressed to Prince Ito by the Seoul Cabinet, seeking instructions in this dilemma and that Prince Ito has returned a very urgent reply. However that may be, the situation is certainly disquieting, for if these conditions exist in the capital, we can be tolerably certain that the ex-Emperor is employing all his influence to encourage the provincial unrest which he doubtless desires to have construed as a protest against his own abdication. It is inexplicable that there should be so much blindness on the part of Korean statesmen and politicians and that they should so singularly exaggerate their own potentialities vis à vis Japan.

Meanwhile the projected visit of the Prince Imperial of Japan is said to have produced a most excellent effect. Preparations on a large scale are being made for his reception, and it is stated that a Prince of the blood will be sent to Chemulpo to welcome him and that the Korean Prince Imperial will receive him at the southern gate.

Thursday, September 26.

It has been found that the Japanese Post Master at Lienchong in the province of Kwangwondo, who was reported some time ago as missing, fell into the hands of the insurgents and was murdered.

The telegrams continue to show that the disturbance in the central provinces is far from being quelled yet. Four attacks made by more or less numerous bodies of insurgents at as many different places are reported. In one case they achieved the success of assassinating a Korean local headman, but in the three other instances they were repulsed by Japanese gendarmes and police with heavy loss. We also read of one operation by a Japanese military detachment in another region. It closed in on a body of 100 insurgents and put them to flight, killing five of their number and arresting nine.

DOMESTIC POLITICS.

Nagano Prefecture has recently been the scene of a contest which attracted much attention in political quarters. The occasion was the election of a member of the House of Representatives in succession to the late Mr. Ishizuka. That gentleman was a seceder from the ranks of the Seiyu-kai, and after his death the Daido Club, with which he had affiliated himself on leaving the Seiyu-kai, approached the latter with a proposal in the sense that another member of the same Club should be allowed to stand for the seat without a competitor. Failing an agreement in that sense, the Daido Club declared that all the parties hostile to the Seiyu-kai would unite to bring about the election of their own nominee. The Seiyu-kai refused to listen to this proposal and thus the contest became a trial of strength between the Seiyu-kai and a combination of its three opponents, namely, the Progressists, the Daido Club and the Yukokai. The result was known on the 21st inst. when the Seiyu-kai's candidate, Mr. Kobayashi, received 17,862 votes against 14,378 polled by his opponent, Mr. Horiuchi. This victory for the Seiyu-kai is regarded as proving the justice of their forecast, namely that they will secure a majority of all the seats in the House at the next general elections. It is to be noted, however, that no less than 17,000 persons who possess the franchise in this prefecture refrained from voting, so that the issue of this particular election can not be regarded as indicating the sentiment of the majority of the voters.

Recent incidents are considered to have exercised upon Japan's domestic politics an influence not apparent on cursory examination. Observers of current events know that the Daido Club was originally formed by the last Cabinet to hold the balance of power between the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists. It discharged that duty with great adroitness and effect for a considerable time, but during the last session of the Diet the Party lost prestige by a premature and abortive attempt to defeat the present Ministry's Bill for the abolition of the Gus system of local administration. Of course Marquis Katsura did not appear openly in this matter, but Viscounts Sone and Kioura were supposed to have directed the Daido Club's movement. Since that time, however, Korean affairs have come to occupy a large space on the political horizon and have been a means of re-cementing the relations between the leading statesmen of the day, a result which has been additionally promoted by the honours just conferred on account of the war. Viscount Sone goes to Seoul as Vice-Resident-General; Marquis Katsura accompanies the Crown Prince thither and will probably remain for some time in the Peninsula, and finally the present Cabinet has been brought into the closest possible relations with the Elder Statesmen. These circumstances are believed to have been reflected in the Nagano election, and it is considered that the combination of three parties has for the present no chance against the Seiyu-kai pending the next general elections, and even these are not thought likely to disturb the situation. We may add that Japanese newspapers attach great importance to the Nagano election as indicating not only the intrinsic strength of the parties opposed to each other but also their capacity for organisation and co-operation. It is considered, indeed, that the Seiyu-kai now have the stage virtually to themselves, and that the only possible way of opposing them is a well-knit combination of the three other parties, the Progressists, the Daido Club and the Yuko-kai. But there is a difficulty about bringing this last into such a coalition, namely, that Mr. Shimada Saburo, its most prominent member, is a strong advocate of reducing the expenditures on the army and navy, a policy which the Progressists would not endorse and which would not be popular in the country at present.

Meanwhile the elections for the City and Prefectural Assemblies commenced on the 23rd inst. and their results are watched with much interest as an index to the relative strength of the parties.

CHINA.

Friday, September 20.

Viceroy Chang is reported to have presented to the Throne a memorial of 18 articles on the subject of constitutional government. Seventeen of these articles are said to have been adopted by the Council of State.

The two great Viceroys have exchanged visits in Peking and have dined together. The result of this meeting is said to be that all doubts as to their friendly attitude towards each other have been removed.

It is rumoured that Prince Pu-lin, who is one of the three candidates for the position of Prince Imperial, has been ordered to proceed to Japan by way of return for the visit paid by Prince Fushimi to Peking last year.

The Chinese Government's action about the grain veto is extremely disappointing, if the telegrams may be trusted. We read that instead of withdrawing the veto altogether, Peking's idea is to enforce it in a modified form. With regard to imports of grain into the leased territory, they are to be restricted to occasions when actual scarcity exists in that region, and the reality of such occasions is to be determined by a committee of investigation. As for exports of grain from the leased territory, they are to be limited to cargo for Chinese ports. We can scarcely believe that the telegrams are correct in this matter, for the proposed arrangement is of an almost comically nondescript character. It goes without saying that Japan will not consent to such restrictions.

The riot in South China, already reported by telegram in these columns, is thus described by the correspondent of a native paper in Hongkong (translated by the China Mail) writing from Canton on September 8th:—

It appears that the situation at Kinchow, near Lienchow, is somewhat serious. According to official reports, the rioters, who have been scattered about Pakhoi, Kinchow and Lienchow, have joined the disbanded braves of Nanning, and on a sudden signal being given a combined attack was made on the Fong City, which was taken by the rioters without resistance. As soon as the city was in the hands of the rebels, fire was started in several places and general looting commenced. His Excellency Wu, the Officer Administering the Government, received a wire from the Bureau for foreign affairs at Tung Hing to the effect that Magistrate Sung Chou Yuen and nineteen members of his family had been butchered by the rioters. His Excellency Wu wired to Kinchow for confirmation, but up to the present no reply has been received. Under orders from the Acting Viceroy, Admiral Li Chun left for the scene of the riot on board the Chiyuen with two regiments. Admiral Tsun, of Canton, was summoned to the Viceroyalty yesterday, and so far as can be discovered Tsun has been instructed to get another two regiments ready for despatch at any moment to the scene. There is much excitement here among the officials, and all telegraph stations are under orders to accept no telegrams about the riot. A telegram embodying the above was handed to the telegraph office here for transmission to you yesterday but was refused. On enquiries being made, the fact has been elicited that all stations in the two Kwong Provinces have similar instructions. Further developments will have to go by post.

The China Mail adds that the Chiyuen left Hongkong on the 9th for Pakhoi with 800 Chinese troops aboard.

Saturday, September 21.

The Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent quotes Viceroy Chang Chih-tung as saying that his age precludes him from putting his hand to any novelty. He might consent to undertake a task which was along the lines of his experience and in accord with his long cherished and often expressed views, but outside these limitations he is not prepared to go. He will have nothing to do with the task of administrative reorganization, his opinion being that the needs of the time are to reconcile the Manchu and the Chinese and to convoke a national assembly. To the latter he would entrust the task of drafting a Constitution, for he does not believe that China can have a Constitution emanating from the Throne as the Japanese Constitution did. In fact he is opposed to the notion of China attempting to follow Japan's example in these matters.

If this précis of the Viceroy's opinions be correct, it would seem unlikely that he will be found coöperating heartily with Viceroy Yuan.

Sunday, September 22.

On the 21st inst. an important edict was promulgated in Peking. It provides for the creation of a body which, in the telegrams, is expressed with different ideographs so that we are uncertain whether the meaning is "administrative council" or "advisory council," but the latter seems more probable. The decree frankly acknowledges the necessity for having a constitution, but as to the creation of an upper and lower house, it says that the time is not yet ripe for such a step, and that this new council is to be by way of preliminary. Prince Pu-lin, who was spoken of recently as one of the candidates for the Crown-Principship, and his Excellency Grand Secretary Sun Chianai are appointed presidents of the new body, and are directed to confer with the Council of State for the purpose of drafting regulations. It is expected that the drafting of these regulations will give rise to much friction. So far as we can see, this advisory council is a replica of the Genroin (Senate) which constituted the foundation of constitutional government in Japan, and was abolished in 1885 to be succeeded by the Privy Council. It is an interesting coincidence that in describing the necessity of recourse to popular advice in conducting State affairs, this Chinese edict uses precisely the words which appeared in the celebrated oath taken by the Emperor of Japan at the time of the Restoration. The telegrams say that much surprise is expressed in Peking with reference to the personnel of the above two Presidents. The nomination of Sun Chianai is very natural, for he possesses all the qualifications most esteemed in China, being an Optimus and having been in occupation of high posts ever since 1883. But it had been generally expected that Prince Tsai would have represented the Manchu element in the presidency and no one seems to have thought of Prince Pu-lin. It will be remembered that Prince Pu-lin is believed to have been appointed Special Envoy to the Court of Japan for the purpose of returning the visit paid to Peking last year by Prince Fushimi Jr.

Monday, September 23.

The Asahi's Peking correspondent says that a diary written by the hand of the Emperor of China himself has just been published. It shows that during the past twenty years, that is to say since his Majesty was 17, he has suffered from constantly increasing nervous debility. His present condition is almost intolerable. The slightest noise or the slightest exertion brings on violent palpitations, and any exposure results in catching cold. A foreign medical expert is quoted as saying that unless radical measures be taken, his Majesty may at any moment fall into a state of insanity.

Rumour was right in saying that his Excellency Chang Chih-tung would be appointed Minister of Education. The nomination has been made, and will doubtless be universally approved, for the ex-Viceroy is one of the most accomplished classical scholars in the Empire.

The Advisory Council which is to form the basis of constitutional institutions in China, will hold its first meeting, it is said, immediately after the Chinese New Year.

In the columns of the Hochi Shimbun it is justly pointed out that there is an important difference between the newly created Advisory Council in China and the Senate (Genroin) which formed the embryo of constitutional government in Japan. The difference consists in this, that whereas the members of the Japanese Senate were nominated by the Sovereign, those of the Advisory Council are elected by the people. We say "by the people," but it is to be noted that nothing has yet been stated about the qualifications for the franchise. The process only is known, namely, that each district elects a certain number of representatives; that these district representatives en masse elect provincial representatives; that the provincial representatives elect delegates to a central government body, and that this last elects the members of the Advisory Council. It is expected that another travelling commission will be appointed to visit Japan, England and Germany, the constitutions of which countries are to be taken as models by China.

It is alleged that the Chinese Government has resolved to purchase back the Lu-Han (Peking-Hankow) Railway. Arrangements have been made for approaching the Franco-Belgian Syndicate with that object, but nothing is said as to the source from which funds are to be obtained for such an extensive operation. We can well understand China's desire to recover possession of this, the main trunk line of the Empire, but it is pretty certain that she will have to pay heavily for the satisfaction of that wish.

Somebody has evidently been lying grossly to the inhabitants of the province of Fuhkien. They have been persuaded to believe that the Japanese press has interpreted the Franco-Japanese and the Franco-Russian Ententes as preliminary to the partition of the Chinese Empire, Yunnan going to France, Fuhkien to Japan and Mongolia to Russia. We need hardly say that nothing of the kind has been published by Japanese journals, but that fact does not appear to have proved any obstacle to the sensation-mongers. The people of Fuhkien became so excited that they proposed to hold a mass meeting for the nominal purpose of investigating the question. But the eventualities connected with such a meeting were so disquieting that the leading men of the province and the officials combined to prevent it.

Tuesday, September 24.

China seems to be really in earnest about her rights-recovery policy. We stated in our last issue that she was making arrangements to approach the Franco-Belgian Syndicate with a view to repurchasing the Peking-Hankow Railway. It is now stated that she entertains a similar intention with regard to the Yunnan line, which is a French asset. Another design attributed to her is the recovery of Weihai-wei which she desires to make once more into a naval port. She is said to have preferred a request in that sense to the British Government, and possibly those who now preside in Downing Street may be induced to listen favourably. The interesting point about the above railways is the providence of funds. China can not borrow without giving security, and if she pledges the railways for a debt, there will not be a very great difference between the position she desires to occupy and the one she actually now occupies.

We extract from the Shanghai Mercury the following translation of the new Press Law (provisional) compiled by the Board of Civil Administrations:

Article I.—Those who establish a newspaper or periodical office shall first apply to the police office for sanction, without which no publication is allowed. The offices of newspapers or periodicals already in existence shall also apply for the same.

Article II.—Either daily, weekly or monthly periodicals shall have the name and residence of the publisher, editor, and printer in each copy of the same.

Article III.—The following matters shall not be published:

- 1.—Matters which insult the Imperial family.
- 2.—Matters which affect the national dignity.
- 3.—Matters which disturb the public peace.
- 4.—Indecent matters.

Article IV.—Matters concerning diplomatic or military affairs which have been notified not to be published by the Yamen concerned, shall not be published.

Article V.—Undecided criminal cases shall not be criticised.

Article VI.—Corrections signed by the person or his friends of the matter published which are incorrect shall be published.

Article VII.—Those who violate these stipulations will be punished in the following manner according to the circumstances: Publisher, Editor and Printer—imprisonment of one month to one year or fine of ten dollars but the printers will be punished only when they knew the violation or they may be left unpunished.

Article VIII.—For violation of these stipulations a daily newspaper may be ordered to stop its publication from three to seven days and in case of weekly or monthly from one issue to three issues and in cases of a serious nature the publication may be stopped altogether.

Article IX.—When the publication is stopped the publisher and the Yamen concerned shall report the fact to the post office and telegraph office to stop the circulation and telegraphing the news and to notify the public of the same and news-vendors are not allowed to sell the paper.

Article X.—These are provisional laws pending the Press laws to be sanctioned by the Throne.

Wednesday, September 25.

A mysterious telegram from Peking says that the projected visit of Prince Pu-lun to Japan is attracting much attention in diplomatic circles, but why that should be the case there is no suggestion. The Prince's mission seems to us a very simple affair, nothing more than an acknowledgement of the courtesy shown by Prince Fushimi in visiting Peking last year.

Viceroy Hsu has been summoned to Peking on important business. Shanghai says that he actually set out on the 21st inst., but a more trustworthy account indicates that he did not receive the summons until the 22nd inst. and that he was to start for the capital on the 28th. His Excellency's projected trip to Kilin has therefore been abandoned for the present. He speaks of returning to Mukden in a fortnight, but that is considered very uncertain, one view being that he will be appointed Minister of War vice Tieh Liang, who has long been known as an opponent of Viceroy Yuan. This departure of the Manchurian Viceroy will of course prove a further obstacle to the progress of the negotiations with Japan.

The Viceroy has taken steps to have suitable punishments inflicted on the Chinese police who behaved with so much violence towards Japanese inhabitants, and has instructed them to observe greater circumspection. On the other hand the Japanese Consul General has warned his nationals in Mukden to be careful in their demeanour and action towards the police.

Quite a notable event is the issue by the Sicauei Observatory of the "Annales de l'Observatoire Astronomique de Zô sè." We read in the N.-C. Daily News that An incredible amount of work was required for the adjustment of the large refractor and accessories, and the triangulations connecting Shanghai with Sicauei and Sicauei with the Hills, which did not require less than twenty triangles. This part of the work led to the discovery of a slight error, due to a misprint, in the longitude hitherto admitted for the flag-staff of the British Consulate, the meridian of which is the primary meridian in China. It appears that Shanghai and indeed all places in China, the longitude of which was determined with reference to Shanghai, are one-tenth of a second of time more distant from Greenwich than was universally admitted. This means about 130 feet and will not require any change in the time-tables of the navigation Companies. It may show with what degree of accuracy the position of Shanghai is known. There have been three telegraphic determinations of the distance from Greenwich to Shanghai—via Siberia, via Madras and via San Francisco. These three agree to four-tenths of a second of time (500 feet). It may be useful to give here the conclusion of the Rev. F. Chevalier's discussion, the result of which is that the longitude of the flagstaff of the British Consulate is 8h. 5m. 55.7 E. G. and its latitude 31° 14' 41".9. In ascertaining this error the directors of the Sicauei Observatory wish to express their thanks for the valuable assistance they have received from the Heads of the Public Works Department.

Thursday, September 26.

The approaching visit of Viceroy Hsu to Peking is variously explained, some saying that the intention is to consult him about the questions pending between Japan and China, others that he is to enter the Central Government. According to statements published by the leading journal of Shanghai, the ex-Viceroy Chang Chih-tung, on the occasion of his recent audience, denounced Viceroy Hsu as weak and incompetent. Possibly the summoning of Hsu to Peking may be a direct result of that denunciation. If so, the last act of his administration at Mukden will be counted not the least creditable in his career, for he seems to have shown a really earnest desire to protect the lives and property of Japanese subjects in Manchuria against outrages on the part of the police or the soldiery.

Viceroy Yuan is said to have been received with marked favour at the recent audience in Peking. The ordinary routine on these occasions is that the senior official present at the audience act as the mouthpiece of his colleagues and replies to all questions put from the Throne. But on this occasion a marked exception was made by the Sovereign, for although Yuan was by no means entitled to such treatment on the ground of seniority, to him almost alone were addressed the interrogations from the Throne. After the audience he is said to have stated his determination to push forward along the path of progress and in no circumstances to recede, and he is also said to have affirmed that the new Advisory Council in Peking will certainly be opened by next spring. With reference to the above, the Fiji Shimpō's correspondent says that, while Yuan is trusted implicitly by the Throne, he also has the cordial co-operation of Prince Ching, ex-Viceroy Chang and even of the Minister of War, Tieh Liang. This is interesting, inasmuch as, according to general rumour the Minister of War is hitherto supposed to have been inimical to Yuan. Possibly an explanation furnished by the Hochi Shimbun's correspondent may be the true one. He says that the origin of the enmity between these two high officials was a memorial addressed to the Throne by Yuan, in which the condition of the Chinese army was animadverted on in very strong terms. The Minister of War, not unnaturally regarding this memorial as a slap in the face for himself, signified his intention of tendering his resignation. But Yuan then informed him that the memorial to which he objected was not directed in any sense against the Minister of War but only against the existing military system of China, which did not meet the requirements of the time. This explanation appears to have entirely pacified Tieh Liang. Thus all accounts agree that Yuan's star is more in the ascendant than ever. It is further said that he has expressed his desire and intention of cultivating the friendliest possible relations with Japan.

One of the princes of the Chinese Imperial House, says the N.-C. Daily News, is so anxious to get back the entire control of the Peking-Hankow Railway that His Highness has been recently trying to impress upon H.E. Yang Shih-kai, the Special Commissioner to the islands of the South Pacific, the importance of getting wealthy Chinese in those islands to join together and refund the money that is owing to the Franco, Russo-Belgian Syndicate which holds the mortgage on that railway. To the persons who succeed in obtaining the huge funds necessary for this object the Prince holds out the promise of a peerage.

It is reported from Peking that when H. E. Grand Secretary and Councillor Chang Chih-tung went to the Great Gate of the Imperial Palace on Sept. 14th to report according to etiquette his arrival in Peking, His Excellency got two of his servants to support him on either side in order to show that he is too weak to walk unsupported and is still in frail health. This, says an exchange, also gave His Excellency the chance to decline all appointments and enables him to obtain leave to retire into private life.

The British cruiser King Alfred, (flagship) which left Nagasaki on the 6th instant for Weihaiwei, when off the south of Race Point, south of Korea, sighted a steamer with a distress signal flying, at 8 a.m. on the 17th. On closing with the steamer it was seen that she was well down in the bows and the crew had taken to the boats. The mate of the steamer boarded the cruiser and reported that his ship, the Oshimi Maru, had struck a rock at five o'clock that morning and was rapidly filling, and they were unable to beach her owing to the fires having been put out by the water. Some of the crew returned to the vessel and, collecting their belongings, transferred them to the boats, finally leaving the ship at 9.45. They had not been away from the steamer 5 minutes when she was seen to give a lurch, and her bows went under and she sank from view, apparently blowing up as she foundered. The steamer Taian Maru, No. 2, arriving on the scene, the crew went on board her for passage back to Japan, the King Alfred telegraphing the disaster to Nagasaki by wireless telegraphy and then proceeding to Weihaiwei, where she arrived on the 8th.

M. Louis Rocher, Commissioner of Customs at Nanking, is reported to have retired from the Customs Service and to be about to return to his home in France. M. Rocher is one of the senior and most experienced commissioners, a keen sportsman, and a fluent English and Chinese scholar, says the N.-C. Daily News. He is well known in Shanghai, where he was Commissioner from April 1896 to May 1900, during which time he took an active interest in commercial and public questions. M. Rocher was a prime mover in the representations at Peking which led to the restriction placed on the export of pheasant skins which, at one time, threatened the wholesale destruction of game inland. The successful establishment of the Sanitary Station in Shanghai is also chiefly due to his efforts. Many good wishes will go with M. Rocher in his retirement.

According to the N.-C. D. News a sad fatality occurred the other day at Singyangchou, Hupeh, whither the district magistrate of Hanyang, Mr. Li Fa-yi, had escorted ex-Viceroy and Grand Secretary Chang Chih-tung, who was on his way to Peking. It seems that the guard of the Ex-Viceroy's special train, not being aware that the Hanyang magistrate desired to get off the train at Singyangchou, had given the signal for it to start. Mr. Li Fa-yi feeling the train move hastily arose from his seat in the Ex-Viceroy's carriage and having bade his Excellency goodbye, started to jump off to the platform. In the meanwhile the train had been gathering way, and as the unfortunate Magistrate jumped the momentum carried him under the train and he was immediately crushed under the wheels.

The N. C. Daily News states that on Saturday evening, the 14th instant, at that hour when the outer apartments of the Astor House (hanghai) are usually quiet and unoccupied by all but the bar-boys and attendants, who secure a brief respite from labour while the patrons of the hotel are dining, consternation was spread among the resting menials by the appearance of two Americans, named Leary and Johnston, riding China ponies into the bar-room. The boy expostulated, but the riders insisted upon being served with drinks on horseback. A visit, still mounted, was then paid to the hall in front of the billiard room; and following that thoroughfare the indoor-horsemen rode past the office and along the main hall towards the lift. Meanwhile the frenzied servants and the sound of clattering hoofs had penetrated to the dining room, and there was a general exodus to view the local adaptation of a scene common enough in the Wild West. The hotel officials then undertook active measures of ejection, assisted by friends of the hotel and friends of the unusual visitors. Eventually the ponies were led out into the street where a third rider was waiting for the other two. The former had arrived with them, but refrained from joining the expedition which charged the bar.

THE EXHIBITION OF 1912.

The site for the great Exhibition of 1912 has not yet been fixed. Until quite recently the public imagined that Aoyama had been definitely decided upon, but talk then arose about the superior eligibility of Ueno, and now there are many advocates for choosing Tsukishima, where the big jail used to be in olden times. Meanwhile the Tokyo Municipality is stated to be much perplexed as to the source from which necessary funds are to be obtained. The total sum required is 10 million yen, of which 3 millions have to be paid in yearly instalments of 500,000 yen each to the Treasury, and the remaining 7 millions are the estimated cost of building bridges, roads and various other public works which the enterprise will necessitate. Of course the simplest plan would be to impose some special tax, but the Municipal Council appear to think that it would be very difficult to obtain official assent to such a measure, and that a loan will have to be contracted. The difference, however, is only one of time, for due provision will have to be made for the repayment of the loan, and that would involve additional taxation in some form or other. As to the site, we may mention that the idea of Aoyama seems to have been definitely abandoned. There are three objections, first that the citizens of that district have run up the price of their land to an almost prohibitive figure; secondly that the removal of the parade ground would be a troublesome matter, and thirdly that the Imperial Botanical Gardens can not be lent for the purposes of the Exhibition. Ueno has been condemned by some people as being too small, but the place is capable of any degree of extension in the Oji direction. Such extension, however, would make the Exhibition inconveniently remote. Hence at present the Tsukishima scheme finds many supporters. That site would be the nearest of all and there is plenty of room for all purposes. Of course a big bridge would have to be built across the Sumida, but such a bridge forms a part of the City Improvement programme, as does also a wide straight street from Ginza to the bridge-head.

FOREIGN TRADE WITH KOREA.

A business report recently issued by Messrs Noel Murray and Company, of Shanghai, dealt with what the writers regarded as an imminent contingency, namely, the exclusion of all nations except Japan from the trade of Korea. We alluded to the matter in our issue of September 5th and, while sympathizing with the watchful solicitude of British merchants in the East, we said that we failed to appreciate any such danger as the result of official action, inasmuch as all the Powers have with Korea treaties which secure to them most-favoured-nation treatment, and those treaties can neither be arbitrarily set aside nor ignored. A telegram to the Asahi Shimbun from Shanghai says that Messrs. Noel Murray and Company's last circular traverses our view and repeats, with greatly increased emphasis, the conviction that all the treaties between Foreign Powers and Korea have virtually become a dead letter; that the relations between Occidental States and Korea may be said to have been completely terminated; that nothing remains but to quietly watch the process of Korea being swallowed up by Japan; that when that result is consummated, the trade of the United States and Great Britain with the Peninsula will be totally extinguished, and that England's supine attitude in the face of such a contingency must be said to favour these untoward results. That is an accurate précis of the telegram, and we may assume the latter to be a trustworthy version of the business circular. If so, the views of the Shanghai firm give much food for reflection. We are quite without any statement of the practical reasons which form the bases of Messrs Noel Murray and Company's forecast. It seems certain that there has not yet been any tangible evidence of an attempt on Japan's part to discriminate unfairly against foreign trade in Korea, and, in the absence of such evidence, is it justifiable to assume that a policy of exclusion will be resorted to? We may remark, en passant, that the record of Japan's foreign relations during the past 50 years does not furnish any ground for suspecting her of unfair discrimination. Still that argument has no conclusive force: the future can not always be inferred from the past. We are bound to assume that the Shanghai firm has some material grounds for its acute apprehensions, and we suggest that intelligent discussion would be greatly facilitated by a clear exposé of those grounds. We repeat that the project of a Japan-Korea customs union has not travelled beyond the limits of irresponsible newspaper suggestion, and has been at once excluded from the domain of practical politics by Prince Ito's emphatic repudiation of such a programme. So far as we can discover, the fears entertained by the Shanghai firm are based mainly on the probability of such a union, and consequently we believe that no solid cause exists for alarm.

MR. SOYEDA ON JAPANESE FINANCE.

At a dinner given by the Bankers Club of Tokyo to welcome Mr. Soyeda, President of the Industrial Bank, and Baron Kikuchi, who have just returned from England, the former gentleman made a speech with reference to Japan's position in the European money market. He assigned the comparative failure of the South Manchurian Railway loan to three causes. The first was that altogether incomprehensible alarm with reference to the relations between Japan and the United States was suddenly engendered in the minds of British capitalists at the very moment of floating the loan; the second, that the condition of the money market was unsuitable; and the third, that British capitalists were already amply supplied with Japanese securities. Was it to be inferred then that this country could not look for any further funds from the European market? Certainly that question must be answered in the negative. Japan would have no difficulty in obtaining accommodation if she offered a productive and sound enterprise as security. But as for loans on account of unproductive purposes, any attempt to float them must only injure Japan's credit. Mr. Soyeda laid great stress on the nature of the machinery employed in approaching the foreign money market. Japanese borrowers might place themselves in the hands of an apparently excellent syndicate, but without the aid of first-class underwriters and banks enjoying high credit the transaction could not succeed. He said that he had found in the West high appreciation of Japan's military prowess but no appreciation whatever of her financial position. It was imperative for the promotion of her best interests that she should gain the confidence of Occidental capitalists by setting herself to develop her industrial resources and by evincing a genuine desire for peace.

YACHTING IN SHANGHAI.

Yokohama yachtsmen may be interested to read of a race sailed a few days ago by the boats of the Shanghai Yacht Club. The course was from Prince's Pier at Woosung round the Kiutoan Lightship and back, a distance of 40 miles, and the prize was the Commodore's Cup. Six boats started at 11 a.m. on Sunday, Sept. 15th.—Atlantic, Viola, Sirene, Kid, Phyllis and Meitoo. The wind was E.S.E. and about force 3. After passing the Outer Bar Light-boat, the strong ebb against the wind set up such a sea that Phyllis turned back, Viola being in the lead, the Kid second. Near the Blockhouse Buoy, Meitoo, a new steel cat-boat, gave up and below the Kiutoan small beacon Viola carried away her tiller and had to put back, Atlantic also getting out of the race because of sea-sickness among her crew. These events left only two boats, Kid and Sirene, in the race. At the Lightship a very heavy sea was running but Kid rounded in safely and ran home comfortably, reaching Woosung at 3.00.10, having taken six hours and ten seconds to go over the course. At the Lightship Sirene carried away her jib and ripped the copper off her bows; her native crew refused to go on deck and set another jib, but the skipper and his mates accomplished this without them. Both boats were washed fore and aft by heavy seas at this point. In the sequel, Sirene, arriving home at 3.10.00 won the cup by ten seconds on her allowance of ten minutes from Kid. The race is said to have shown that the present type of boat in Shanghai is quite unsuited to meet the high steep seas outside Woosung and the hope is expressed that members intending to build new yachts will submit their plans to the Club Committee before laying down the keels. It may be remembered that the Kid was the probable choice of the Shanghai Yacht Club to meet Yokohama in interport racing. Last year she was described as a sloop, 23.2 feet load water line and sail area 919 feet, which would have made her 27 1/4 rating under Yokohama rules.

THE CHIENTAO QUESTION.

The Chinese Government is reported to have addressed two notes to the Japanese Legation on the subject of the Chientao question. One of these notes, according to telegrams in the Fiji Shimpō, quotes a report sent in by Viceroy Hsu to the effect that Japan is steadily sending troops into the disputed territory, and the Chinese Government requests that these be immediately withdrawn. The second note says that there is no room whatever for discussion about the ownership of the territory, but that if there be any confusion of boundary in the district of the Tumen River, the problem can be solved by means of a joint committee of delimitation. China seems to be quite in a hurry about this question. Probably her precipitancy is to be attributed to the prevalence of the rights-recovery fever. Of course it is not credible that Japan is sending troops to Chientao and we can not but wonder that Viceroy Hsu makes himself the medium for transmitting such statements without full previous investigation of their accuracy. Japan will doubtless confine herself for the time being to affording protection for the lives and properties of Korean subjects settled in Chientao. She is not pressing for a radical solution of the boundary question, nor is it likely that she will approach the subject diplomatically until ample evidence is forthcoming.

According to the Chuo Shinbun the Japanese Government has replied to China's protest on the subject of Chientao, though the Hochi had previously stated that no reply would be formulated pending the collection of full details. It is not impossible, however, to reconcile the two statements, for everything would depend on the nature of the reply. The Japanese Government, as is now alleged, may have declined China's proposal for a boundary commission on the ground that a prior question has to be determined, namely, the title to the territory in general. If the Chinese Government insists that the territory belongs wholly to the Middle Kingdom, and if commissioners be instructed to delimit the boundaries on that hypothesis, it is evident that China's contention would be established from the outset. Some preliminary understanding must therefore be arrived at with regard to the proximate position of the boundary. Meanwhile, according to our contemporary, Tokyo statesmen limit themselves to saying that Chientao is Korean territory; that inasmuch as its Korean inhabitants greatly outnumber its Chinese settlers, the duty of protecting the lives and properties of the former devolves necessarily on the Korean Government, and that, therefore, the despatch of a small force of Japanese gendarmes by desire of the Korean Government for that purpose is a natural and proper step to which China has no right to object. Meanwhile it is notable that a Japanese post-office is to be opened on the 1st of November at Lungching in Chientao.

The Chientao question seems to be attracting in Peking a degree of attention which it scarcely deserves. It is again stated that orders have been issued for the despatch of troops thither and that China is sending Mr. Tao to conduct special investigations. The Nichi Nichi Shinbun translates an article from a Chinese newspaper which accuses Japan of acting with perfidy in this matter and which sets forth at considerable length the arguments in favour of Chinese ownership. But it appears to us that this newspaper does not by any means advance its country's cause. Our readers are aware that the contention lies between two rivers the names of which have nearly the same sound but are written with different ideographs and are therefore clearly distinguishable. If then any tangible evidence be forthcoming to indicate which set of ideographs should be accepted, the problem will be solved. There is such evidence. It is furnished by the inscription on the boundary stone which stands on Changpeh Mountain. But the Chinese newspaper quoted above appears to be entirely ignorant of the existence of this stone. It accuses Japan of attempting to base a claim upon the phonetic similarity between the names of the two rivers, whereas that is precisely what Japan charges China with doing. We should imagine that for a people who attach such overwhelming importance to the ideographic script as the Chinese do, an examination of the Changpeh stone ought to settle the matter definitely.

According to the Asahi's Mukden telegrams, Viceroy Hsu, on the 23rd inst. addressed to the Japanese Consul-General a request which can be interpreted only as evidencing a strong determination on China's part to assert her claim to the whole of Chientao. His Excellency asked that the Japanese gendarmes and officials should be removed from the district, and he intimated that a force of Chinese infantry and cavalry was to be sent thither, having attached to its staff Mr. Chien, a former graduate of the Japanese Military College in Tokyo, whose presence with the troops was intended to avert any danger of a collision between them and the Japanese. Meanwhile Peking seems to be still convinced that Japan has sent a force of 300 soldiers to Chientao. The Waiwupu is said to have addressed the Japanese Legation on this subject and to have asked that the soldiers should be immediately withdrawn. The Japanese Representative replied that no soldiers, few or many, had been sent to Chientao, that the only Japanese force there was a small body of Japanese gendarmes, and that consequently China's demand for their recall could not be acceded to. This is certainly a curious incident. How does it happen that Peking is so signally misinformed? One does not expect the Foreign Office of a great Power to prefer international demands based on wholly false information as to the state of affairs existing within its own dominions.

DEATH OF THE REV. ROBERT SAMUEL MACLAY, D.D.

On the 18th of August, at his home in Los Angeles, California, in his 84th year, this eminent missionary passed away. Sixty years ago he was appointed a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to Foochow, China. For a quarter of a century he laboured in that station, for most of this term the superintendent and treasurer of the Mission. He mastered the Foochow language, and, collaborating with Rev. Dr. Baldwin, produced a dictionary, Chinese-English, of great value. From his pen much valuable literature for the native Christians was created. Two annual conferences, with a total of 18,000 members, 658 preachers and helpers, and 74 missionaries, were organized; also the Anglo-Chinese College, and a school for young women were established. In the year 1872, he was appointed the superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Mission in Japan, and arrived in Yokohama in May, 1873. In August of the same year the Mission was duly organized by Bishop Wm. L. Harris, who appointed Dr. MacLAY the superintendent. At the same time, the Rev. Julius Soper, the Rev. J. C. Davison, and Rev. I. H. Correll and Rev. M. C. Harris were appointed to various stations under him. He laboured for fifteen years in Japan, thus rounding out forty eventful years of service in the Far East. In 1887 he retired from the service and returned to California where for a few years he presided over the MacLAY School of Theology, in Los Angeles. For many years now, he has lived in retirement, no longer being able for active duties. His faculties remained unimpaired until the last, and he kept in touch with events in Japan and China, evincing a peculiar interest in these lands where his active life had been lived. In Japan he was superintendent until the formation in 1884 of the Conference, when this office lapsed. He was the first president of Aoyama Gakuin and had much to do in shaping the early history of this institution. In the translation of the New Testament, he took an active part, being a member of the Committee on the translation of the Bible into Japanese. He came as a pioneer, and was therefore a foundation builder, and he used well tempered mortar and acquitted himself as a "wise master builder." In Japan he belongs to the class of "worthies" such as Drs. Hepburn, Verbeck, S. R. and Nathan Brown, Bishop Williams, David Thompson and the Ballaghs. In China he is to be classed with men of the early day, some of whom survive. In Foochow many opportunities of making money in an honorable way came to him; but he scrupulously refused all such and lived on the humble stipend of a missionary. He rests from his labours, but his works do follow him.

BORDEAUX'S RECEPTION OF THE JAPANESE SQUADRON.

We gather from French papers that the reception accorded to Admiral Ijuin and his officers and men at Bordeaux was quite notable. The cruisers arrived from Brest on Aug. 1st and anchored about 8 a.m. at the mouth of the Gironde between Point de Grave and Royan. Mr. E. Bertin, Commissaire-General of the Maritime Exposition being held at Bordeaux, and other officials went in the afternoon to Verdon and called upon the Admiral, remaining to dinner on board the Tsukuba. The following morning Admiral Ijuin and a number of his officers, leaving Verdon by train, arrived in Bordeaux at 9 a.m. being received by the Consul for Japan, M. Braquelaye, and others. After making official visits and being welcomed to the city by the Mayor, the party went to the Exposition. A special ceremony took place at the section of the Red Cross Society, where an eloquent speech was made by the President of the Red Cross Society Departmental Committee, and at noon they were present at a dejeuner given at the town-hall in honour of the Admiral and officers of the Japanese squadron and the officers of the Argentine cruiser Presidente-Sarmiento, then also in the Gironde. The usual toasts were exchanged and the French papers mention that much applause was accorded to M. G. Campredon, who spoke in Japanese. He mentioned that he had resided for twenty years in Japan and appreciated the charm of the country and the steadfastness of her relations. He proposed success to the Franco-Japanese entente. In the afternoon the party again visited the Exposition.

MANCHURIA.

We have been accustomed hitherto to regard China as a country which endeavours honestly to maintain good faith in its international dealings, but, if rumour speaks correctly, that belief will have to be modified. Our readers doubtless remember that among the subjects recently discussed in Mukden, one was the ownership of mines along the Mukden-Antung Railway. This matter was disposed of without much difficulty on the basis that the exploitation of these mines should be carried out by China and Japan in co-operation. That agreement was embodied in a document which, pending signature, was forwarded to Peking for approval. A long delay then ensued. The Japanese negotiators pressed their Chinese colleagues to sign the convention so that no time should be lost in giving effect to its provisions, but Viceroy Hsu pleaded the absence of instructions from Peking. It now appears that the Viceroy has entirely gone back upon this arrangement. He has made the carrying out of his previous agreement provisional upon Japan's consent to a sweeping measure, namely, that the same principle shall be adopted in the case of all the mines along the railway from Changchun to Port Arthur. That is playing fast and loose with a vengeance, and if Viceroy Hsu has really taken such a course, it will be hard for the Japanese to trust him hereafter as a negotiator.

A verbatim copy is published of the document presented to the Foreign Office in Tokyo and to the Japanese Legation in Peking in the sequel of a mass meeting held by the Japanese residents of Mukden on the 7th inst. It is a very strongly worded document. The compilers—whose representation was unanimously endorsed by the meeting—say in effect that the rights-recovery mood has assumed in Manchuria a strongly anti-Japanese character. The Chinese newspaper published in Mukden does everything in its power to foment this feeling. Day after day it prints notes and articles intended and calculated to make the Japanese subjects of odium and to incite the people against them. Nevertheless no attempt whatsoever has been made by the Chinese officials to check these mischievous utterances. Opprobrious songs are also scattered broadcast among the people and sung by youths without any interference on the part of the authorities. All this is supplemented by the fact that the soldiers and the police behave in a most outrageous manner towards the Japanese settlers, breaking into their houses, stealing their property in broad daylight and carrying them off to prison under frivolous or false pretences. The representation adds that this state of affairs is quite intolerable. The signatories ask therefore, first, that the police and the soldiers shall not be allowed to carry side-arms; secondly, that the Japanese residents who have suffered at the hands of the police and soldiers shall be compensated; thirdly, that the responsibility for these outrages shall be clearly determined; and fourthly, that the police shall be strictly forbidden to interfere hereafter with the Japanese.

The Hochi Shinbun publishes what professes to be a statement made by a responsible Japanese diplomat with reference to the Yalu timber-felling question. We read that China shows a singular lack of sincerity in this matter. Having agreed explicitly by the Treaty of Peking that the timber-felling industry on the Yalu should be conducted conjointly by Japan and herself, she now attempts to impose limits which would reduce that agreement to a mere farce. Those limits are that the timber-felling area should extend from the upper waters of the Yalu to its 24th affluent, counting down stream. This would mean a length of 17 miles, and inasmuch as the whole of the forests within that district may be said to have been felled already, it would seem that the Chinese Government is not influenced by any spirit of sincerity in this matter. With regard to the recently received news that Peking had made a concession pointing to compromise, we learn from the same source that this concession amounted to nothing more than an extension of the proposed limit through a distance of 3 miles down stream. That makes it all the more evident that China is not in earnest, and her attitude towards this problem as well as towards all the other questions outstanding between herself and Japan inspires an apprehension that she has no real desire to find a practical basis of working. The Japanese Government, according to this informant, will therefore quietly rest upon its oars pending some evidence that China is really in earnest. Japan can afford to treat the matter in a leisurely manner for she is actually exploiting the mines and working the forests which form the principal subjects of dispute.

WAR REWARDS.

On the 21st instant the following rewards in the shape of patents of nobility and decorations were gazetted, the ceremony of conferring them being held in the Palace with great eclat (we take the list of names from the Japan Times):—

CREATED PRINCE.

Marquis Ito, Resident-General of Korea.
Marshal Marquis Yamagata, President Privy Council, Marshal Marquis Oyama.

CREATED MARQUIS.

Count Matsukata, Elder Statesman,
General Count Nodzu,
Count Katsura, late Premier.

CREATED COUNT.

Viscount Yoshikawa, ex-Minister for Home Affairs,
Viscount Sakuma, Governor-General of Formosa,
Fleet Admiral Ito, ex-Chief of the Naval Board of Command,
Admiral Baron Yamamoto, ex-Minister of the Navy,
General Baron Kuroki,
General Baron Oku,
General Baron Nogai,
Baron Komura, Ambassador at the Court of St. James, Admiral Togo.

CREATED VISCOUNT.

Baron Kiyoura, ex-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce,
Baron Sone, ex-Minister of Finance,
Admiral Baron Inouye, ex-Commander-in-Chief of the Yokosuka Naval Station,
General Baron Hasegawa, Commander of the troops in Korea,
General Baron Okazawa, Chief Aide-de-Camp to His Majesty,
General Baron Nishi,
General Baron Ogawa,
Admiral Baron Kawamura, Member of Supreme Military Council,
General Baron Oshima, Governor-General of Kwantung,
General Baron H. Oshima,
General Baron Oseko,
Surgeon-General Baron Saneyoshi, I. J. N.
General Terauchi, Minister of War.

THE NEW PEERS.

The following gentlemen are raised to the peerage with the rank of Baron:—

Admirals Shibayama and Samejima, retired;
Vice-Admirals Hidaka, Katoaka, Aina, Kamimura, Uchida, Urie, Dewa, Kimotsuki, Ijima, Mitsu, Ito, Inouye, Hashimoto, Sakamoto, Yamanouchi, Kano, Nishida, Mochimaru, and Nakamiz; Lieutenants-General Mukoyama, Uchida, Okazaki, Watanabe, Utagawa, Tomioka, Iida, Uyeda, Tsuchiya, Miyoshi, Sakai, Sumeshima, Asada, Tsukamoto, Inouye, Okubo, Haraguchi, Nishijima, Kigoshi, Ando, Fujii, Yamanaka, Nakamura, Hirasa, Yabuki, Yamauchi, Katsuda, Kurose, Matsunaga, Ishimoto, (Vice-Minister of War), Fukushima, Arisaka, Nishimura, Yamane, and Ichiji;

Dr. Sakai, Minister for Finance;
Surgeons-General Sato and Koike,
Mr. Tomatsu, Director of Military Comptroller's Bureau;
Kanetake Oura, Esq., ex-Minister of Communications;
Sutemi Chinda, Esq., Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Yuzuru Kubota, Esq., ex-Minister of Education.
Keichoku Hatano, Esq., ex-Minister of Justice.
Kenjiro Den, Esq., ex-Vice-Minister of Communications.

Vice-Admiral Saito, Minister of the Navy.
Paymaster-Admiral Murakami.
Constructor-Admiral Miyabara.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

Prince Tokugawa, President 1st Class Rising Sun.
Marquis Kuroda, Vice-President, 2nd Class Rising Sun;

Marquis Kuga, 2nd Class Rising Sun.
Marquises Asano, Nabeshima and Saionji, Viscounts Tani and Watanabe and Baron Akamatsu the gift of 2,000 yen each.

Viscount Katsunosuke Inouye, Mr. Koki Matsuo, Viscount Soga, Barons Kato, Nabeshima, Hirata and Noda, 1st Class of the Rising Sun.

Other members were also duly decorated, 219 persons receiving the Minor Cordon of the Rising Sun (4th Class Order).

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Sugita, President, Minor Cordon of the Rising Sun (4th Class Order);

Mr. Minoura, Vice-President, 2nd Class Order of the Rising Sun of Double Rays.

Mr. M. Matsuda, the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun (1st Class).

Mr. K. Hara, 2nd Class Order of the Sacred Treasure.

Mr. Shogo Kurizuka, Middle Cordon of the Rising Sun (3rd Class).

All other members were given the Minor Cordon of the Rising Sun (4th Class) the dead being so honoured under date of their death.

It will be observed from this list that the usual rule of one step at a time has been departed from in the case of six persons; namely Barons Yamamoto, Kuroki, Oku, Nogi and Komura, and Admiral Togo. All these have been created "Counts," though in the normal course the Barons should have become Viscounts and Admiral Togo should have been made a Baron. Some newspapers question whether the honour conferred on Togo is adequate to his merits, but all agree that the conferring of a Count's patent without any preliminary grade is an extraordinary honour.

The Fiji Shimpō, in an article which we entirely endorse, expresses surprise and regret that the names of Count Okuma and Marquis Saionji do not appear in this list.

The process of conferring titles by way of war rewards is continuing. Titles are to be given to the eldest sons of distinguished officers who fell in battle or died in the discharge of their duties. Among others Viscount Kodama's son will receive the patent of Count. It will be remembered that General Baron Kodama was raised to be a Viscount after the war had already been in progress for some time, but this step was clearly differentiated as a recognition of services rendered in Formosa and was well understood not to have anything to do with the distinguished officer's services in the field of the Russo-Japanese War. After the naval and military men and the official classes have been duly rewarded, the turn of the civilian classes will come, and it is stated that among those created Barons will be Mr. Matsuo, President of the Bank of Japan, and Mr. Kondo Rempai, President of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. It may be noted that the new titles gazetted on the 31st inst. bring the number of Japanese Peers to the following, exclusive of Princes of the blood:—Princes 15; Marquises 39; Counts 99; Viscounts 377; and Barons 377, the grand total being 907.

The process of conferring titles and honours in the sequel of the war is still going on, but the list has not yet reached beyond the ranks of those directly connected with the Government. We take the following from the Japan Times :—

CREATED COUNT

Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household Department.
Viscount Kagawa, Lord Steward to the Empress.
Viscount Tono Ogii.

CREATED VISCOUNT

Baron Hanabusa, Vice-Minister of the Imperial Household Department.
Baron Suyematsu, Privy Councillor, and Doctor of Literature.
Baron Kaneko, Privy Councillor.
Baron Ito, Privy Councillor.
Baron Watanabe.
Baron Tajiri, Doctor of Law.
Baron Hashimoto, Doctor of Medicine.

CREATED BARON

Shin Hambo, Esq., President of the Tokyo Imperial University.
Jun Iwasa, Esq., Doctor of Medicine.
Shinsen Matsuo, Esq., President of the Bank of Japan.
Gishin Seki, Esq., ex-Inspector-General of the Metropolitan Police.
Tanetaro Megata, Esq., Financial Adviser to Korean Government.
Morimasa Takei, Esq., Member of the House of Peers.
Yujiro Nakamura, Esq., Lieut.-General, Director of the Imperial Iron Foundry.
Koreiyo Takahashi, Esq., President of the Yokohama Specie Bank.
Genke Oka, Esq., Chief Physician in waiting to the Emperor. Of these gentlemen, Viscounts Suyematsu and Kaneko were in England and America respectively during the Russo-Japanese War. They have rendered the country exceedingly valuable services in a most peculiar manner. Their mission was to keep the foreign nations well-informed on things Japanese, and this mission they worthily discharged. They were always in touch with the public through the press or by speech-making. It was largely due to their indefatigable efforts that many foreign misconceptions with regard to Japan were dissipated.

GRANTS TO THE PEERS.

The Toyō Tsushin learns that whereas it has been the usage for the Emperor to confer monetary gifts accompanying the patent of peerage according to the established rule; namely, yen 50,000 to a Prince, yen 40,000 to a Marquis, yen 30,000 to a Count, yen 20,000 to a Viscount, yen 10,000 to a Baron, in conferring the recent honours His Majesty was pleased to grant a special gratuity of yen 20,000 to those who have been raised from Baron to Count. Some of the newly created Counts and Marquises have been also granted special gratuities of yen 50,000 and yen 100,000 respectively.

GENERAL LINEVITCH ON THE FAR EAST.

An interesting interview, though perhaps partially apocryphal, has been published in San Francisco and forwarded to Tokyo telegraphically by the Asahi's correspondent. The General, speaking to an American journalist in St. Petersburg, is reported to have said that the United States made a fatal mistake in assuming towards Japan during the war an essentially friendly demeanour, and in using its good offices to promote the restoration of peace at a comparatively early moment. Russian interests, the General said, did not clash in any way with American interests in the Far East. America had one unique aim, namely, the expansion of her trade; and in that field she had nothing to apprehend from Russia, whereas Japan on the contrary must be a most formidable rival. The United States then might be said to have played Japan's game in the teeth of America's best interests. The Washington statesmen now found themselves confronted by a problem of great difficulty, namely Japanese immigration. Unless this was stopped serious economic trouble would result, and to stop it effectually would be pretty sure to involve the war, whatever attempts might be made to shift the responsibility from the Central Government to the States and from the States to the people. The General then went on to speak of a subject concerning which his opinions are more valuable, namely the result of such a war. Briefly speaking, he did not consider that the United States would fare well in such a conflict. They could not strike an effective blow against Japan, and they would certainly lose the Philippines, upon which islands, whatever might be said to the contrary, Japan's eyes were longingly fixed. The General expressed, in terms so plain as to be almost incredible, his conviction that the reliance put by the Americans on their fleet would be found misplaced, and that although to the Americans must be conceded the possession of all the qualities for which the Japanese were remarkable, namely patriotism and bravery, there was no denying the fact that the former lacked experience in war and in this important respect would be found inferior to their adversaries. The United States would lose the Philippines, and would see the Pacific slope at the mercy of the Japanese.

Such are the views attributed to the ex-Commander-in-chief of the Russian Army. General Linevitch may be a very great soldier. He had the good fortune of being commissioned to retrieve a difficult position without having to show his ability in practice, and his reputation rests therefore on what he might have done, not on what he actually did do. But it is greatly to be wished that neither he nor any other prominent publicist would seriously treat this question of war between Japan and America. The thing is out of the question physically and morally alike.

NAVAL NOTES.

The closing days of October will be a busy time in Japanese naval building yards. No less than three men-of-war are to be launched between the 21st and the 24th of that month. Two of them are the first-class cruisers Kurama and Ibuki, each of 14,500 tons. The former is building at Yokosuka and will be launched on the 21st of October; the latter is under construction at Kure and will be launched on the 22nd. Finally there is the cruiser Tone (2,500 tons). She is on the stocks at Saseho and will be launched on the 24th of October.

Turning to the work of repairs, which has been going on steadily for some time on the captured ships, we read that the Tsugaru, originally the Pallada, a protected cruiser of 6,630 tons and 20 knots speed, built at St. Petersburg in 1899, has emerged from dock at Saseho and will soon be fit for sea. Also the Hizen, originally the Retvisan, a battleship of 12,700 tons with a speed of 18 knots, which was built by Messrs. Cramp of Philadelphia in 1900, has had her repairs very nearly completed at Saseho and will come out of dock at the end of October. She will ultimately be drafted into the second-class battleship-squadron. The Soya, originally the Varyag, which, when she went down in the harbour at Chemulpo, was supposed to have gone to her grave forever, is now a smart cruiser of 6,500 tons and 23 knots speed, and will be added to the strength of the Japanese Fleet next spring.

The Mainichi Shimbun states that the delay in laying down the first-class line of battleship which stands on this year's construction programme, has been due to some uncertainty with reference to plan. The construction committee recommended a vessel which would have been the largest in the world, namely over 21,000 tons with an armament of twelve 12-in. guns. But in consequence of the information collected by Viscount Admiral Yamamoto on his recent trip to Europe, this plan is to be slightly modified. The vessel will displace only some 19,000 tons, and her main armament will be reduced by two guns. She will be fitted with American turbine engines and will have a speed of 20 knots, which is one knot less than that of the Dreadnought.

The battleship Mikasa is to emerge from dock on the 30th inst. and the fact is alluded to in tones of supreme satisfaction by Tokyo journals. Of course a mere question of expedition or delay in repairing a battleship would not attract much attention, but the Mikasa's case is special. The Japanese nation evidently considers that she had not fully emerged from the fighting line when she met with the terrible accident at Saseho, and that had her repairs been found impossible she would have had to be added to the losses directly incurred in the war. This no doubt partially explains the great satisfaction now evinced on learning that she has come out of the repairers' hands in better condition than ever and that she is found not to have suffered structurally in any way. Of course, after coming out of dock, she will still have to receive her armament, so that she will probably not be ready for sea before next spring.

JAPANESE EMIGRANTS.

It is stated that the Japanese Government projects the formation of a new bureau in the Foreign Office to be called the Imin-kyoku (colonial bureau). The duties of this Bureau will be to investigate all matters relating to Japanese emigrants and to the conditions existing in places that invite colonization. These functions are now entrusted to the Communications Bureau in that Department, but they have attained sufficient magnitude to occupy the exclusive attention of a special office. It is stated that the Diet will be invited next session to make an appropriation on this account. The matter of Japanese emigration is of course beginning to attract greater attention than ever in Japan. The Yorodan Choho, referring to this new bureau, opines that it is intended to serve as a ladder for the Government of Japan to climb down in face of Western racial prejudice. The Mainichi Shimbun also writes on the general subject in a somewhat perturbed tone. It takes for its text an article which appeared in a recent issue of the San Francisco Chronicle, attributing to Mr. Ishii a statement that Japanese emigration would be henceforth limited to Manchuria, Korea and Russian Siberia. Our Tokyo contemporary does not doubt that the San Francisco Journal has employed its own imagination to embroider Mr. Ishii's assertions, but it nevertheless evidently thinks that there is a substratum of truth in the Chronicle's report, for it asks whether the Japanese could possibly be content with the imposition of such a restriction. Japan like every other growing nation must have an outlet for its surplus population, and the Mainichi Shimbun naturally thinks that Manchuria, Korea and Siberia do not constitute a sufficient outlet.

Baron Sakatani, Minister for Finance, who had been travelling in western places, returned on Sept. 23rd arriving at Shimabashi by the 9 p.m. train.

BUSINESS NOTES.

Friday, September 20.

A representative of the Hochi Shimbun had an interview with Mr. Soyeda on the 18th inst. The President of the Industrial Bank is quoted as having spoken very frankly. He said that he had to acknowledge a failure in the case of the South Manchuria Railway loan, but the causes were very plain. One was that, just at the moment of the loan's issue, British capitalists became alarmed about the relations between Japan and the United States; the other, that the market was eminently unfavourable for such transactions. All attempts to float foreign loans proved abortive, even South Africa being a rejected candidate. Indeed, if the record of the South Manchuria Railway loan showed anything, it showed that Japan enjoyed exceptional credit in Great Britain. For the moment financial business is suspended in London, as is always the case at this season, but as for the general condition of the money market, its amelioration is only a question of time. Before long, British capital will be again seeking profitable investments, and if it can find them in Japan, it will flow thither. The Hochi Shimbun itself, though not professing to speak on its own authority, refers to the fact already mentioned more than once in these columns, namely, that it was not a very tactful act on the part of the Japanese authorities to contract with United States manufacturers for the purchase of over 20 million yen worth of plant for the railway, and then to go to London for a loan to meet this expenditure. Great Britain used at one time to receive the whole of the orders from Japan for railway plant, and neither British manufactures nor Englishmen in general are prepared for one moment to admit that England cannot supply just as good articles at quite as moderate prices as any other country in the world can. Thus that the Japanese should go to London asking for money to make extensive purchases of rails and rolling stock in America was, to say the least, a very naive procedure. When it comes to raising the second half of the Manchuria loan, we recommend this country either to go to New York for funds or to place its orders in England.

Mr. Sonoda, President of the Fifteenth Bank, has made some interesting remarks to one of the Jiji Shimpō's staff on the subject of Japan's State finances. Speaking broadly, the eminent economist says that in order to fully carry out the post bellum programme of public works, a sum of about 100 million yen annually is needed over and above the revenue normally in sight. How is this money to be obtained? So far as next year's budget is concerned, there will probably be no difficulty, special funds being available in the shape of the payment on account of the Russian prisoners and surpluses from the ordinary revenue and from the War Fund. But when these exceptional items cease to be forthcoming, what is to be done? There is talk of the Government including sugar among the State monopolies, but evidently the policy of nationalizing the great industries one after the other can not be sound. Are then loans to be resorted to? Some people maintain that the policy of loans is correct where their proceeds are to be applied to productive enterprises, but before endorsing that view, one has to consider carefully whether it is wise to draw into the Treasury the funds available for private enterprise in order to devote them to public undertakings. The plain upshot of such procedure would be to paralyze the industrial energy of the nation at large, unless we assume the existence of a thing which certainly does not exist largely in Japan, namely, surplus capital seeking investment. Still more objectionable would it be to augment the present rates of taxation or to make additions to the list of taxes, in view of what has been done in both these directions during the last three years. Mr. Sonoda thus arrives at the conclusion—and we think that all thoughtful persons will endorse his verdict—that the State must cut its coat according to its cloth and must suspend or curtail its enterprises so as to bring them fully within the scope of its financial competence. Mr. Sonoda hints also that there might very well be some retrenchment in the matter of the army and navy, for although he would be the last to suggest any weakening of the country's defences, he nevertheless evidently thinks that Japan has displayed her prowess quite sufficiently for the time being, and that in view of her alliance with England and her ententes with Russia and France, she may well give herself a little breathing space in the matter of armaments. Put into a nutshell these remarks of Mr. Sonoda may be summed up in two words, "go slow." For our own part we think that no better advice could be given to the country.

The first call of capital for the new steel foundry in Hokkaido is to be made by the 15th of next month. It amounts to 2½ million yen, which will be put up in equal parts by the English and Japanese shareholders, and the first general meeting will be held early in November. The experts sent out from England are expected to reach Japan on the 10th of October in company with Vice-Admiral Yamanouchi, who is to be superintendent of the factory. The number of directors, originally fixed at six, is to be increased to eight, four appointed in England and four in Japan. The Japanese directors are expected to be Mr. Inouye Kakugoro, Mr. Amenoniyi, Mr. Dan and Baron T. Mitsui. On the English side the only directors yet determined upon are Sir Andrew Noble and Mr. Vickers.

We read in the Asahi Shimbun that one result of the recent inundations will probably be to reduce the revenue from the State railways by 2½ million yen, divided in about equal proportions between the cost of repairs and the suspension of traffic.

The restoration of fine weather caused a sensible depreciation in the market price of rice, but had no effect upon the Tokyo share market except perhaps to steady it a little. Things still remain in status quo, and a singularly depressed status it is. We may add that the number of shares to be settled this month is 118,572; those for next month are 109,220; and those for November 69,280. It is thought in some quarters that all the weak holders have now sold out, and that short sellers will have to begin buying in very soon.

Saturday, September 21.

Our readers know that there has been talk recently of making Maizuru an open port. The Minister of Finance is now on a visit to the place, and is reported to have made a speech in which he alluded in strong terms to the excellent conditions existing there, alike from a commercial and a naval point of view, and he urged the inhabitants to take vigorous steps for utilizing these advantages. If Mr. Sakatani's suggestion be carried out, Maizuru and Tsuruga will be the two chief ports on the west coast of Japan. The nationalization of railways interrupted a service of steamers between Vladivostok and Maizuru, as the steamers had been the property of the company by which the Osaka-Maizuru Railway was constructed.

The recent opening of the Hokkaido Railway as far as Kushiro has brought the latter place within 121 hours' journey from Nagasaki, allowing for all stoppages and assuming an average speed of only 15½ miles per hour. When the speed is raised to 25 miles the journey will take only 3 days. The distance is 1846 miles.

The Yorozu Choho repeats its often circulated rumour of an amalgamation between the Tokyo Railway Company and the Tokyo Electric Light Company. There is no doubt that such an arrangement would be much in the interests of the latter, for public opinion is beginning to declare strongly in favour of the Railway Company's lights, which are not only much cheaper but also very much better than those of the Electric Light Company. We may here mention that although official sanction has been given to the Railway Company to extend its lighting enterprise to all parts of the city traversed by its lines, the detailed working programme still awaits approval, and consequently the Company's lighting operations are confined to the suburbs included in the original charter of the Round-the-Moat Line. Reverting to the Yorozu's article, we find it stated that while the directors of the Electric Light Company are not averse to amalgamation, they consider the time inopportune, and would prefer to wait until they are in full possession of the projected water power. It will be remembered that the Electric Light Company's water-power scheme was spoken of as likely to be completed in September, but there are as yet no signs of such a consummation. Meanwhile rumour attributes to the Electric Light Company a project of immediately lowering its charges, without waiting for the completion of the water-power works. The public are evidently perplexed, for the Stock Exchange Report, day after day, shows practically no transactions in the Company's old shares.

It is stated that the Kei-Han (Osaka-Kobe) Electric Railway Company, acting through the Murai Bank, has arranged a loan of 4 million yen with American financiers at a rate less than 7 per cent.

Tokyo journals state that Canada has announced her intention of being largely represented at the Japanese International Exhibition of 1912.

The 3-million yen loan of the Dai Nihon Sugar Refinery closed on the 20th instant. A success was made. Tokyo and Osaka alone put up all the money, Tokyo subscribing 2 millions and Osaka one. Among the Tokyo applications 1,300,000 worth were at a premium.

The Stock Market goes from bad to worse. All quotations fell on the 20th instant, and no critics seem to understand the reason. The Shogyo Shimpō says that the Japanese market is merely keeping in line with foreign markets, which are everywhere depressed, but it is hard to endorse that view. The Asahi Shimbun gives a different explanation. It says that sales have been made by experts, especially in the case of the Tanko S.S. Company's new shares, and the stocks of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the spinning companies and the Tokyo Stock Exchange, and the consequent fall in these shares has affected the market generally. In the case of the Tanko S.S. Company, the reason assigned is that in the distribution of funds consequent upon State purchase of the Company's roads, the new shares fared unexpectedly ill. In the case of the Yusen Kaisha the cause alleged is that the Company has made heavy losses on account of the Hakodate fire and bad business returns. In the case of the Stock Exchange the idea is that the recent increase of capital is not warranted by the times; and nothing is said as to the spinning companies. Of course the state of the weather is also believed to be more or less responsible.

Sunday, September 22.

The Toyo Kisen Kaisha has decided to abandon the service of steamers established by it between Japan and South America after the war. This service has hitherto been maintained with 3 steamers chartered by the Naval Department to the Company, but the steamers were ill fitted for the work, and the result of their working was a loss of some 70,000 yen during the last half year. This, indeed, was the main cause of the unfavourable report which the Company had to present to the last general meeting. The Naval Department has not yet consented, it is said, to cancel the charter of the vessels, but that can be a question of time only.

It is stated that the big steamship company called the Senshu Domei-kai is likely to be dissolved without reaching the stage of practical operations. There will be a general meeting early next month, when the fate of the enterprise will be decided. This Company presented, at one time, very formidable dimensions. Its prospectus spoke originally of a capital of 30 million yen, 10 millions representing the value of the ships already in possession of the members, and 20 millions for floating capital. Then followed talk of reducing the two sums to a total of 15 millions, and it is probable that the general meeting will be asked to choose between that diminution and the total abandonment of the project.

During the 10 days ended on the 20th instant the exports from Japan exceeded the imports by 2,282,000 yen. As usual the latter half of the year seems likely to make up for the excess of imports during the first half.

This month is expected to pass over without any financial commotion. Discount rates remain unchanged and there is no demand for money except on the part of tradesmen who are laying in their winter stocks of goods.

The share market continued in a state of marked depression on the 21st instant. Nearly all stocks showed a decided fall from the very low points at which they already stood. Doubtless the weather had much to do with this, but none of the experts ventures any longer to express definite opinions about causes or results in this field of finance.

Monday, September 23.

There is talk of very extensive progressive measures in Formosa. Irrigation, harbour works, road-making and so forth are spoken of on a large scale, and a total sum of 160 million yen is said to be needed. Since the savages were driven from the central highlands, the Viceroy has made a tour of inspection, and has discovered that a large table-land exists on the eastern coast similar to that on the western. This table-land is 80 miles long and from 8 to 10 miles wide, and would make a splendid field for the cultivation of rice were it properly irrigated. Moreover the eastern coast is at present without any proper harbour, and the idea is to construct one at Taito, which was visited recently by a Japanese man-of-war, probably for the first time in the history of the world. This work is estimated to require an expenditure of 10 million yen. There appears to be an idea that the money for Formosan enterprises may be obtained by means of a domestic loan, but considering that Japan's domestic industries are themselves dependent more or less on foreign capital, it is difficult to see how Formosa's needs can be supplied from this country.

Mr. Shiraishi, Managing Director of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, is disposed to blame the Government for the Company's ill-success on the South American line. He says that this service was started at the end of 1905, not merely as a maritime enterprise but also as a national undertaking, the idea being that Japanese emigration to South America was destined to assume large dimensions in the near future. So far, however, from encouraging such emigration, the Government actually prevented it by refusing to give permits on the ground of insufficient investigation. Thus the outlook which had induced the Company to undertake this business was effectually obscured, and nothing now remains except to abandon the service. It is thought probable, however, that the Nippon Yusen Kaisha will take up the work.

There appears to be considerable commotion in connexion with the electric railway projected some time ago by Messrs. Tsuji and Kitamura to run between Iida and Tatsuno. The prospects of such a line are sufficiently rosy, but it happened that the enterprise was started just simultaneously with the commencement of the debacle in the share market, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the first call on the shares was paid up. There are now two parties among the shareholders. One is for continuing the enterprise. The advocates of this course claim that with the funds accruing from the first call the line can be sufficiently well built at a cost of 30,000 yen a mile, which would show a return of 8 per cent. The other side claim that the work could not be done for that money and that the contemplated source of water-power electricity is quite insufficient. The Company also experienced a disaster in connexion with the liquidation of the Fuso Bank, which incident involved the fixing of 40,000 yen of the Company's property. A general meeting is to be held on the 30th inst. to decide on the fate of the enterprise.

Tokyo newspapers say that the detailed scheme for electric lighting by the Tokyo Railway Company has made great progress and is now on the point of receiving official sanction. Under this new charter a company will commence operations in the Shiba district.

Tuesday, September 24.

Treasury bills to the amount of 36 million yen stand for redemption this month. Of that total 20 millions fall due on the 25th inst., and it is the Government's intention to pay back 15 millions, and to re-write 5 millions. The remaining 16 millions of the grand total fall due on the 27th inst. and will be entirely refloated. The sum of 21 million thus carried forward will bear interest at the rate of 1.6 sen daily and will be redeemable during the last ten days of December.

The total subscriptions to the Sugar Refinery loan amounted to 3,866,580 yen whereas the sum required was only 3 millions. With the exception of 480,000 yen the Company sells the whole of its bonds at a price above par.

The Industrial Bank's issue of debentures is also producing very favourable results. All the reports have not yet been received, but, so far as is known, the subscriptions up to the 20th inst. when the loan closed, totalled 2,700,000 yen, whereas only 2½ millions were called for. In connexion with this transaction it is stated that a large number of the subscriptions were for very small amounts, which fact shows that a considerable sum of money is still scattered abroad among the people.

It has been decided to dissolve the Manchuria Industrial Company. This enterprise never actually reached a working stage and its story has been checkered by much dispute amongst its projectors and principal shareholders. The recent resignation of Mr. Otani Kahei and other prominent men gave the coup de grâce, and it has now been determined to wind up the concern, and to pay back 11.50 yen out of the 12.50 yen originally put up by each member.

The Stock Exchange maintained its depressed condition on the 23rd inst. When the market opened in the forenoon some signs of improvement were visible, but in the afternoon things relapsed into their old slough. A multitude of reasons are assigned for this long continued depression. The principal seems to be uncertainty as to the rice crop. The second official report of crop prospects will not be published until the 3rd or 4th of October and pending that information doubts must continue. Connected with this particular month there was a special cause of depression, namely, that many buyers who had purchased at the comparatively high prices ruling in July have to settle their accounts before the 30th of September. That factor of disturbance has now been eliminated. It appears, however, that there is considerable friction between the public and the brokers. Men who were caught in the welter which commenced in March are following the example set by Mr. Hiranuma and are endeavouring in every possible way to recoup a part of their losses by compelling the brokers to pay back the bargain money. Several lawsuits with that object are now pending and they naturally tend to increase the depression.

Wednesday, September 25.

Tokyo newspapers state that a new company called the Seiken Seishoku (Silk Manufacturing and Weaving Company) is about to be formed by foreign firms of Yokohama in combination with Japanese. The capital is put at 500,000 yen in 10,000 shares of 50 yen each, 4,000 of which will, it is said, be taken up by the well known firm of Messrs. Strachan & Co. of Yokohama, and 4,000 by the Japanese projectors, the remaining 2,000 being offered to the public. The new Company will, it is said, purchase the Yori-ito Kaisha of Ashikaga and will commence operations during the course of the current year.

Mr. Sonoda Kokichi, speaking through the columns of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, refers in interesting terms to the success which attended the recent flotation of the Sugar Refinery Loan. This was the first instance of the formation of a syndicate of banks in Japan to underwrite a business loan on the security of the borrowers' property; in other words, the first transaction undertaken by banks under the Trust and Loan Law. The success of the innovation is interpreted by Mr. Sonoda as showing that the public have become more or less disgusted with speculative translations on Exchange and prefer to put their money into enterprises of a solid character. He differentiates, however, between loans of this nature and loans floated on account of municipalities. The latter do not commend themselves to banks, inasmuch as they require the fixing of capital for a long period, and they are therefore likely to remain, for the present at all events, beyond the range of transactions undertaken by banking syndicates. Mr. Sonoda further interprets the result of this last transaction as proving that there is plenty of money in Japan for sound enterprises and for purchasing the shares of really stable concerns.

Thursday, September 26,

There was a further debacle on the Tokyo Stock Exchange on the 25th inst., which is attributed mainly to the continuance of inclement weather threatening the rice crop and to numerous sales made for the purpose of closing the month's transactions. The Niroku Shimpō quotes Mr. Fukushima, who is perhaps the principal broker in Tokyo, as saying that no considerable appreciation of stocks is likely to take place in the near future. He thinks that some time will still be needed to cure the heavy wounds suffered by speculators continuously since March last.

"AND THEN THE SCHOOLBOY."

The educational world has made tremendous strides forward since the early Victorian ideals held sway in the home and in the school room. The principles of discipline and education laid down in "Sandford and Merton" or in the "Chronicles of the Fairchild Family" or in any of the didactic tales of Miss Maria Edgeworth have been swept away, never to return, we hope, in the flood of new ideas and broader principles which heralded the dawn of a brighter day. Indeed the boys and girls of to-day are better circumstanced by far than were many a man or woman who have not yet come to Thackeray's "forty-year." Distinguished scientists interest themselves in the well-being of the younger generation to an extent not thought possible twenty years ago, and congresses are even held upon such a subject as school hygiene. Naturally this Congress met under the auspices of the University of London, ever the leader in such matters, and the presidential address of Sir Lauder Brunton, the great physician, teemed with the latest ideas of science as to the proper education of children. We reproduce an epitome of the address from the columns of The Times:-

Sir Lauder Brunton said that in savage communities, where the chief objects of life were war and hunting, education was comparatively simple, and was thoroughly well adapted to the end in view. But in civilized communities the complexity of conditions sometimes led, and indeed had led, to mistakes in education, and the very meaning of the word had been forgotten, so that, instead of drawing out and developing in every child all its possible powers of body and of mind—so that in its life it should do the very best of which its nature was capable—education had degenerated into a system of cramming and cultivating one or two faculties of the mind, and especially that of memory, to the injury of others, while the condition of the body as the servant of the mind had, to a certain extent, been lost sight of in this country. They were now awakening to the necessity of attending to the body if the mind was to be developed, and many efforts were being made in various countries to secure a system of mental and physical training which would ensure the best development of children. One of the most important subjects of all in this respect was that of medical inspection in schools, because this was the keystone of physical education. The confinement and work in school had an exhausting effect upon many children, who suffered in consequence from anaemia and debility, and were ready to succumb to any active disease by which they might be attacked. In order to prevent this it was necessary that the children should have as much fresh air and sunshine as possible, that the ventilation of the school-rooms should be perfect, and the children be in the open air whenever it could be managed. A most important departure in this respect was the recent establishment by the London County Council of a Waldschule, or open-air school at Abbeywood, where weakly children had the open air, rest, and abundant food necessary to restore them to health and strength. The technical training which cripples at present received ought not to be limited to them, and the amount and kind of physical exercise which was proper for one child might be either excessive for another or inadequate for a third, and only by medical inspection could physical exercise be adapted to the needs of each child. The movements of drill at the word of command and the performance of new and unaccustomed muscular actions involved considerable mental, as well as bodily fatigue, and must not be looked upon as relaxation. Marching or dancing to music after the steps had already been learned, and regular play, such as games of ball, tended, on the contrary, to remove mental fatigue and to develop the body. One of the most useful stimulants to the circulation and nutrition, both of children and grown-up people, was pleasure, and anything that added to it helped to develop both mind and body. There was a great fear in this country of militarism, but he doubted if there were any one who could not watch children without seeing what an enormous pleasure a pop-gun gave them, and he doubted if there were any one in this country more desirous of peace than himself; but he doubted if one could find three peoples fiercer from the military spirit than the American settlers who beat our armies a little over a century ago, the Boers who nearly did the same a few years ago, and the Swiss, who spent more on education and less on military training per head than any nation of Europe. Shooting with rifles properly adapted to their size and strength was an exercise which tended to bring out many of the best qualities of boys, but what one would hardly imagine was that it had sometimes a powerful moral effect for good on a household. One street boy won a prize at Hissley, and from that moment his home changed for the better, because the pride his father and mother took in him enabled them to become sober and industrious and live up to the level of what they thought their boy had attained. If boys were trained to shoot, many of them would, he thought, when they left school, join the ranks of the Volunteers instead of becoming hooligans. Moreover, if they once got a liking for shooting they would not become intemperate, because intemperance would make their hands unsteady and spoil their chances of successful aim. But all attempts to develop a healthy race would be ineffectual if they took care only of the children who were at school now. They must look a generation ahead, and consider that the children who were at school now 15 or 20 years hence would be the fathers and mothers of a fresh set of school children whose physique would depend very much upon the way they had been treated and fed in their infancy and childhood. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance that boys and girls should be instructed in the laws of health, the need of cleanliness, the dangers of impure food or water, and the evils of alcoholic abuse.

Sir James Crichton Browne, another eminent physician, in the course of his address struck a different note to his colleague. He was in a pessimistic vein, perhaps, for in looking at the masses of England he saw a widespread modish influenza, some general decay of minor morals. They heard of hooliganism in the large towns, and, as regards one part of the country with which he was specially familiar, he could not but believe that the boys and young men were coarser in manner, more profane in language, more wantonly destructive in their habits, more self-assertive, and less considerate for the feelings of others than were the boys and youths of 50 years ago. They were better educated no doubt, and might be all right at the core, but the crust was offensive; and our schools should set themselves to cure the cutaneous eruption by the introduction of that sovereign remedy for this and many other maladies recommended by Goethe—reverence. Under the best scholastic arrangements individuality must suffer if there were not family life behind it and around it. That was of far higher physiological significance than the school, and must some day have a congress to itself.

Readers of the home papers will have noted that Baron Kikuchi, who was educated at University College, Gower Street, and St. John's, Cambridge, in the course of some recent remarks, advised the educational authorities of England to set about revising their methods of education, especially with regard to this very subject of reverence.

THE WEATHER.

On the 22nd inst. there were no less than three centres of depression which more or less invaded the eastern half of Japan while leaving the western half untouched. One had its origin in Choshi of Shimosa Province, and broke seawards at Sendai. A second came up from the Bonin Islands and, arriving at Awa and Kadzusa, made its way into the Pacific; and the third, arriving at Tosa in Shikoku swept over the Kishu Peninsula. This last is identified as the Riukiu centre of depression which had been threatening the country for some days. There is not yet any report as to the damage done by these storms, but it is judged to have been comparatively insignificant. Normal conditions seem to have been restored on the 23rd inst., but that they will continue long would be a rash prediction in view of the evident disturbance of atmospheric equilibrium displayed by the climatic record of the past few weeks.

There are different opinions about the weather prospects, some holding that a complete clearing up has taken place, and others alleging that a new centre of depression is developing in the South Sea. The only certain fact is that the meteorological authorities withdrew their warning from all parts of the Empire on the 23rd inst., which proves that there are no expert apprehensions of atmospheric disturbances for the present.

There is a heavy centre of depression in the Yenshu Nada, and although it remained stationary up to the night of the 24th, its proximity caused considerable rainfall in various districts along the Tokaido. There is also a still more serious centre of depression on the south of Formosa but this too has hitherto remained immovable. The temperature throughout the Empire is slightly below the normal, but that phenomenon is not of a serious character.

The centre of depression which was reported as having developed on the east of the Riukiu Archipelago, advanced thence northward and at 11 a.m. on the 25th inst. reached the Yenshu Nada. It passed over the provinces of Awa and Kadzusa and went out into the Pacific from Choshi promontory. Thus the regions along the Tokaido experienced a more or less heavy rainfall. Another centre of depression which had advanced from the Mariana group and shown itself in a very aggravated form on the south of Formosa, headed thence westward and is considered to have passed out of the range of danger for Japan. On the morning of the 25th inst. warnings were issued by the Meteorological Bureau to the districts of Tokyo, Sendai and southern Kyushu, but the weather is now considered to have cleared up, for the present at all events.

THE RUSSIAN REPRESENTATIVE.

His Excellency M. Bakhrmeteff is stated to have granted an interview to one of the municipal reporters of the Tokyo press. The Russian Representative gave a polite but pointed piece of advice to his interviewer in the sense that newspapers should endeavour to publish truth rather than sensation. He hinted that the recent unfortunate occurrences with reference to Russian spies might have been prevented had the Tokyo press treated the matter more judiciously. Speaking of the war, he said that it had not been the outcome of any rooted animosity between the two belligerents, but had been caused merely by a temporary misunderstanding. This had been removed by the Portsmouth Treaty, and the atmosphere had been completely cleared by the subsequent Entente, which was heartily welcomed by the majority of the Russian nation. Russia's internal condition being still more or less disturbed, it was inevitable that any act of the Government should provoke some opposition, but he felt justified in saying that this Entente had the approval of the bulk of the nation. Nothing now remained except to extend the trade between the two Empires, for a community of commercial interests was the best guarantee for cordial relations between two countries.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Tokyo Municipality and the business men have decided to organise a grand entertainment on the 10th prox. in honour of the Russo-Japanese Entente. The streets will be decked with Russian and Japanese flags, and there will be fire-works and all kinds of rejoicings. The times have certainly changed most happily since Tokyo held similar fetes for a very different purpose.

The Government's endeavours to promote the emigration of Japanese subjects to Saghalien appear to have been successful. We find in the Nichi Nichi Shimbun figures showing that the island has now 47,831 inhabitants, of whom 36,425 are males and 16,306 females. They inhabit 5,615 houses, and in the total are included 12 Chinese (2 women), 14 Koreans (1 woman), and 208 Russians (23 women).

Tokyo journals state that his Excellency Mr. Inouye, Japanese Ambassador in Berlin, is about to return to Japan at the instance of his father, Count Inouye, and that he is not likely to go again to Germany. Viscount Aoki has been spoken of as his successor, but rumour points to Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku as the most probable candidate for the post. Mr. Tsuzuki is now at the Hague, where he represents Japan. He speaks German as well as English fluently, and is universally recognised as a man of the highest ability.

The appointment of the Duke of Connaught to the new military command in the Mediterranean aroused a good deal of gossip in England. The Birmingham Post, a very well-informed journal, gathers that the reason for the new departure arose in this way. When the present Liberal Government took office the Premier pointed out to the King that it was undesirable to have as Inspector-General a member of the Royal Family as the Government contemplated drastic Army Reforms, which would be better discussed if the personality of such a dignitary were removed from the possibility of being introduced into the debate. The King at first demurred but afterwards agreed, and the new post was created in the Mediterranean for the Duke of Connaught. It will not necessitate such absence from London as will deprive him and his family of the society of their friends and on the other hand the Duchess is delighted to spend the early part of the year in the pleasant places of the Western Mediterranean. So everybody is satisfied.

We are glad to record that Baron Iwasaki's condition is said to have somewhat improved. A minor operation has revealed the fact that the malady is not so serious as was at first supposed. It will, however, be necessary to perform a major operation, and the patient will enter the University Hospital in a few days for that purpose.

The German Admiral at Tsingtao, the Commander of the Italian cruiser now at Tsuruga, the Captain of the Austro-Hungarian cruiser at Nagasaki and Admiral Evans of the U.S. Navy, have all telegraphed earnest expressions of condolence to the Naval Department in Tokyo, in connexion with the Kashima disaster.

Japan is preparing to welcome Mr. Taft with all her usual hospitality—hospitality which never fails to be conspicuously displayed towards American visitors. Mr. Taft will be the guest of the nation. The Shiba Detached Palace will be assigned as his residence during his stay in the capital and the arrangements for his comfort will be in the hands of a committee specially appointed by the Imperial Household. There is talk of a reception by the Tokyo Municipality and by the Business Men. As a general rule one is inclined to think that Japanese hospitality is over-lavish, but such a criticism can not apply in this case, since an opportunity is furnished of refuting the silly talk indulged in by certain American publicists.

EARTHQUAKE IN YOKOHAMA.

A severe shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama at 4.50 a.m. on Sept. 22nd. Vertical and horizontal motions occurred at the same time, the horizontal shock being more severe than the other. Eight seconds after the start, the motions became intense at the maximum amplitude of 9.1 mill. per 1.6 seconds. The intensity continued for twenty seconds during which some severe motions were felt. Subsequently, the tremors became slighter lasting for fifteen seconds. The whole duration was three minutes and thirty-five seconds and the direction was west and east. According to the Yokohama Observatory Office, the source of the earthquake seems to have been near at hand, probably in the Bay of Tokyo.

In consequence of the earthquake some damage was sustained on the Bluff. A large arch stone of a window, the upper one of the left side of the French Consulate facing the creek, fell. Fortunately no damage was done by the falling of the stone. Some stone or brick chimneys were destroyed at other parts of the Bluff, and some roof tiles were shaken down. Several old stone fences were damaged. The falling of lamps, etc., from tables and of ornaments, vases, etc., took place in many houses. Much minor damage was sustained in Yamashita-cho. In the Japanese town, the damage was inconsiderable. A woman in a porcelain shop, Ise-ya, Yoshida-machi, sustained slight injury on the head through the falling of a large piece of earthenware from a shelf while trying to run out after the occurrence of the shock. A clock and watch merchant of Benten-dori says that all the pendulum clocks were found stopped after the earthquake.

WEDDING IN TOKYO.

At Trinity Cathedral, Tsukiji, Tokyo, on the 23rd of September, the quiet marriage took place of Miss Margaret Jane Summers, daughter of the late Professor James and Mrs. Summers of Tokyo, to Mr. James Norman Strong, only son of Mr. and Mrs. S. Strong of Bristol, England.

The Rev. E. R. Woodman of Tokyo performed the ceremony. The bride, who was given away by her brother, Mr. James Summers, looked charming in her simple and pretty gown of ivory chiffon over white satin. The bodice was tastefully trimmed with fine Alençon lace and ribbon. Her tulle veil covered a tiara of orange-blossom in her hair, and she carried a bouquet of white and shaded roses.

There were neither bridesmaids nor pages, but Miss Cassie Summers (sister of the bride) attended the bride as maid-of-honour. She wore a dainty creation of white silk and lace and a hat to match.

Mr. W. Melland Booth acted as best man. The wedding party afterwards met at the home of the bride where a few friends had assembled to wish good luck to the happy couple.

Early in the afternoon Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Strong left for Kyoto en route for Daire. The bride, travelled in a smart coat and skirt of black cloth with a cream, real guipure lace blouse and a chic toque to match.

Among the presents, which were numerous and handsome, was an exquisite tea service which had been one of the exhibits at the late Exhibition. It was presented by the staff of Messrs. Sale and Fraser, Yokohama.

THE BOOKSHELF.

Me and Myn, by S. R. CROCKETT. London, Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

Mr. S. R. CROCKETT having won an audience grows careless of his renown. "Me and Myn" his latest novel, is dangerously akin to the tribe of pot-boilers. The story opens well enough, but soon the Crockett mannerisms become too pronounced and before long it becomes a weariness to the spirit to finish the reading of the adventures of Sam Brown, Millicent Sykes and Jenny Sands. Indeed the last few chapters are purely farcical and not worthy of the writer. Crockett has also been careless in other things beside literary workmanship. At times one is led to imagine that the story deals with the days when the stamp-collecting mania had only just begun, say in the early seventies of last century, and yet ever and anon the characters bring in allusions to events as recent as the Boer War and the launch of the Dreadnought! The scene is laid principally in a North Country town on the east coast of England, but the mother of Sam Brown is a Lowland Scot and hence Mr. Crockett can indulge in much of his canny humour. But we prefer him when he deals solely and wholeheartedly with Galloway folk.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

IT must be confessed that a certain number of American citizens are betraying most unmanly nervousness and a singular want of the sense of proportion in their present attitude towards Japan. No one could well conceive any greater absurdity than that one man should slap another's face and then accuse him of wanting to fight. Yet that is in fact the line taken by no less a person than Mr. HEARST. Japan has been absolutely passive throughout the whole of the recent labour complications, whereas American mobs and American municipalities have inflicted considerable injury on her. America then is the aggressor and Japan is the object of aggression, yet here we have an American publicist openly declaring that Japan desires war. Moreover, there appears to be quite a sensation about the Philippines. That wretched little scrap of land called Pratas Island has been magnified into an important site for a naval station, and Japan has been represented as intending to convert it into a place of arms for attacking the Philippines, though in truth Japan's action has been limited to an accidental visit paid to the island by a traveller from Formosa. America is far away from Japan, yet if American men of note set themselves to publicly discuss the relations of the two countries, they ought at least to inform themselves of rudimentary facts. It might occur to them also, one imagines, that the labour question as between the West and the East can not rationally be put to the arbitrament of the sword. It was possible for Western Powers fifty years ago to force Japan to open her doors because she lay virtually at their mercy. But Western countries do not lie at the mercy of either Japan or China in any sense, and if their labouring classes refuse to compete with certain classes of Oriental workmen, and if their employers of labour refuse to make use of such workmen, how in the name of the commonest common sense can these antipathies be corrected by the sword? One expects the shrewd American to apprehend these facts clearly instead of setting himself to agitate the surface of perfectly calm waters. The idea that Japan wants war with America is quite absurd, and the notion that she covets the Philippines may be classed in the same category. She has not given the slightest sign of either disposition. We can not but think that what is happening in America might have been foreseen more than two years ago when the disgruntled war-correspondents took their way back to the United States. It is characteristic of human nature to base national feelings on personal experiences. Many of these correspondents, in fact we may almost say the majority of them, were so chagrined and even enraged by their own failure to pull down the curtain of secrecy which Japan hung before her military pageant in Manchuria that they became bitterly exasperated against the Japanese people in general, and vowed to get their knives into these dashed Orientals, so soon as ever a favourable opportunity offered. Each of the angry gentlemen has since that time been a nucleus of anti-Japanese feeling in the States, and the various little circles thus created have been gradually widening their circumferences until they now probably constitute quite an appreciable area of influence. Whenever Japan or any Japanese affair comes upon the tapis the attitude assumed towards it by these publicists is a foregone conclusion. Undoubtedly this is a very unfortunate state of affairs, but there it is and Japan has to make the best of it. She has done very well so far, for with the exception of unwise utterances by one or two politicians and journalists, and offensive cartoons by the Tokyo comic paper, an absolutely placid and conciliatory demeanour has been preserved. Nothing is needed except to maintain that attitude, though we admit that, as the Japanese proverb says, it is hard to show a perpetually smiling face towards a man who strikes a truculent attitude. That sort of self-possession, however, is a moral feat of which we believe the Japanese to be entirely capable, and they will not forget, we are confident, that no fire can burn without fuel.

YOKOHAMA.

S. Tanaka, a raw silk trader, of Honcho, Yokohama, has prosecuted a well known silk manufacturer named Y. Hirabayashi, in Nagano prefecture, in the Yokohama District Court for fraud. It is alleged that the manufacturer received from Tanaka twenty thousand yen on condition that a quantity of silk corresponding to that sum should be supplied this year. The manufacturer is alleged to have failed to carry out his promise.

During ten days ending Sept. 20th, the foreign trade of Yokohama was as follows:—Exports, yen 7,901,361; imports, yen 5,191,956; and exports of gold coin, yen 451,100.

At 9.10 p.m. on Sept. 20th, fire broke out in a warehouse, No. 141, Yamashitacho, belonging to Messrs Vidal Bana and Co., No. 246. The roof and the contents of the building, principally consisting of various spirits, were severely damaged. About 1.30 a.m. on the following day, another outbreak of fire occurred in the same building. The flames, however, were put out at once. Tobacco ashes are believed to have been the cause.

An old man, on the night of Sept. 19th, committed suicide by placing himself on the railway near West Tobe, Yokohama, where a train ran over him, smashing his head.

Mr. M. Matsuoka, of the Board of Auditors, has been appointed to examine the ordinary expenditures of the Kanagawa Prefectural Government and the Yokohama Hygienic Laboratory. Mr. Y. Yamano has been appointed an official of the Kanagawa Prefectural Agricultural Examination Office.

On Sept. 23rd two cases of cholera appeared in Yokohama the patients being sendos on lighters, one belonging to Mr. K. Hamaguchi, a transport agent, and another to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. One died the same evening and the other is undergoing treatment at the Manji Hospital. On Sept. 24th, also two cases were reported. One of the patients is the wife of a sendo on a vessel called the Ichinose Maru at present in the creek near the Yokohama Railway Station. The other is K. Maruyama (38) an employee of a rice merchant named T. Tanaka, Shinamachi, Kanagawa. He died at noon on the same day at the Manji Hospital.

The Kanagawa Prefectural Government on Sept. 22nd, established two special quarantine stations at Uraga and in Yokohama Harbour to examining all vessels from Osaka and Kobe where cholera is prevalent. Messrs. Yokoyama and Hachiko of the Yokohama Harbour Office, and twenty sanitary officials were appointed to the new quarantine stations.

On Sept. 25th, Governor Sufe issued an urgent notification (No. 91) ordering all the owners of sampan, fishing boats, and lighters in the creek and harbour to carry out disinfecting measures on their vessels as three cases of cholera were reported on Monday and Tuesday among the crews of such vessels. The Governor has appointed two sanitary officials to examine all the steamers in the harbour.

Mr. Bekkey, one of the Directors of the Yokohama Specie Bank, will leave at the beginning of October for Europe and America via Shanghai, Hongkong, etc., where there are branches of the bank. He will investigate the business conditions of the branches and also the general financial situation.

A horse belonging to Mr. C. V. Sale became restive at 3.30 p.m. on Sept. 24th at Ishikawa, Ichome, while being led home by a betto. The horse getting out of control, galloped through Jizo zaka and ran over an old woman inflicting severe injuries upon her, and also caused slight injuries to two men. The animal was caught by the police and jiarikisha coolies.

In connexion with the general election for the Kanagawa Prefectural Assembly, a Public Prosecutor and three Judges of the Yokohama District Court, on Sept. 25th, proceeded to the districts of Oiso, Hatano and Isabara, where strong rivalry prevailed among the candidates. They searched the houses of T. Ito, S. Kato and Z. Sudzuki at Oiso who were supporting the election of Y. Sudzuki, on suspicion that they had infringed the Election Law. The parties suspected disappeared while the domiciliary visit was in progress.

Two cases of cholera appeared in Yokohama on Sept. 25th. One of the patients is T. Mitanihashi (34) employed on a steam-launch belonging to Capt. Weston and living at Moto-anchi, Ichome. The other is a sendo named O. Tatsuaki (30) employed on a lighter. The latter died the same evening at the Manji Hospital.

The ballots for the Prefectural Assembly were examined on Sept. 26th. The result was as follows:—

	Votes.
Mr. Z. Sudzuki	347
Mr. M. Sato	341
Mr. S. Tange	308
Mr. V. Shimura	308
Mr. S. Kawamura	298
Mr. K. Tazawa	293
Mr. C. Saito	280
Mr. K. Ikeda	277
Mr. M. Makino	277
Mr. M. Masuda	255
Mr. M. Okawara	242
Mr. I. Morita	236

Mr. T. Hidaoka obtained 212 votes and Mr. S. Nakase, 151. These, however were unsuccessful as the foregoing twelve candidates filled the requisite number of seats.

At 7 a.m. on Sept. 26th, the body of a woman, apparently some 25 years old, who seemed to be a servant, was washed ashore at the French Hatoba. She had a number of large stones in the sleeves of her kimono.

On the morning of Sept 26th, the body of a man about 27 years old, was found in a warehouse at South Otamachi, belonging to Messrs Curnow and Co., No. 82, Yamashitacho. He was hanging by a cord.

GRAND HOTEL, LIMITED.

At an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders of the above named company, which was held on Monday afternoon at the hotel, and at which there was a large attendance, it was decided, nem. con. to confirm the special resolution passed on the 6th inst. for the reconstruction of the hotel buildings, the Directors receiving full authority to take the necessary steps in that end.

IS EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANITY DECLINING IN THE UNITED STATES.

A correspondent writes:—In the Japan Times of September 18th is a statement that Evangelical Christianity in the U. S. is "a dwindling cause. Men have nearly quit going to church and as women become more educated they are gradually falling away also!"

The following are the facts of the case as given in an address by President J. F. Goucher, LL.D. of Baltimore. This is not the address in full but extracts only.

"In 1800 the Protestant church members were to the population of the U. S. as four to 58, in 1900 as four to 17; i.e. during the century the evangelical church membership increased 3.41 times as fast as the population. The 2,340 churches, valued at $1,500,000 in 1800 had increased to 187,800 churches, valued at $724,900,000. Progress is a relative matter, and while we are yet far from the goal, the power of the gospel of Christ to redeem men, to uplift society, and to make a nation strong by righteousness, has been demonstrated, and this force was never stronger, nor strengthening more rapidly in the United States than to-day. The spirit of Christianity is more manifest in its varied activities, has a larger following among men of culture and influence and is more widely diffused and operative upon our problems than ever before. Dr. John Watson says: Never in any age nor in any land was that which saves and sanctifies presented more clearly and forcefully than it is, by word and life in the Christian Church in the United States at the present time. On an average, twelve to fifteen churches are being completed and dedicated every day of every week in the year within the commonwealth. The churches through their Church Extension fund Societies are giving annually $6,000,000, largely in grants for new churches to less favored communities. In 1900 the churches spent for the maintenance of their activities, for philanthropy and for Christian education, $287,047,300. In the last four years they made a net gain of 17,771 ministers, 13,633 churches, and 3,433,959 communicants. If to this be added the number who have died and been dropped for various causes the sum total would be 4,833,959. If the church members are not so jealous for a peculiar system, they are more concerned for righteousness and the larger Kingdom of God. A notable absence of controversy, a kindliness of spirit, a hopefulness and expectancy in the discussions of our national denominational assemblies, mark the dawn of a better day. Instead of the dissipating rivalries, which at times have embroiled the Church, federated activities and organic union among branches of the same denominational family are securing economy of resources, broadening of influence, and increasing efficiency. If the historic and literary setting of the Bible have been examined more critically and discussed less reactively, nothing has been disturbed but a few human interpretations, and unthinking credulity is giving place to a more intelligent faith. The proportion of students in the colleges and universities who were members of evangelical churches seventy-five years ago was only 25 per cent., and fifty years ago 33 per cent., while to-day it is 53 per cent. with no sign of abatement. President Harper, late of Chicago University, said: "There is to be found to-day a religious interest in our colleges which is absolutely unparalleled. It is unquestionable that the life of the students to-day is more natural, more wholesome, more pure than in any previous period of education!" President Butler of Columbia University, says: "Christian Associations exercise a powerful influence in college and intercollegiate athletics. Their members are almost uniformly among the leaders in the social, athletic, and scholastic life of the schools, and in their religious talk and living there is a refreshing and convincing note of manliness and whole-heartedness." From a History of Yale University we quote:—The personal advance in the deepening of the moral and the spiritual life is fully as conspicuous as that in the physical and mental realm! E. N. Hardy says: Every year the proportion of students who are Christians when entering college rises, and while the stated revival is disappearing in both church and college, the average annual number of conversions is to the total enrollment of students proportionately larger. Never in the history of America was there such a large and superb body of young men and young women of college education eagerly pressing into the hardest places of service for Christ and the Church. A large number of the secular papers, both daily and weekly, regularly print the weekly Sunday School Bible lessons, with carefully prepared expositions, while most of them have from one column to a page or more devoted to religious items and comments, and all, with rare exceptions, ring true, editorially at least, to the great ethical questions and benevolent activities which interpret Christianity. In September, 1906 I instituted inquiries concerning the religious affiliation of the members of Congress, and regret that want of time prevented me from securing complete returns. Of the 252 members of the House of Representatives who reported, 216, or 85 per cent. are members of the evangelical churches. Of the 60 senators who reported, 53, or 88 per cent. are connected with the evangelical churches, and nearly every member of both Houses of Congress is a believer in some form of Christianity. Of the nine members of the Cabinet, 7 are evangelical Christians, 1 a Roman Catholic, and 1 a Unitarian. Of the 9 members of the Supreme Court 8 are evangelical Christians, 2 Roman Catholics, and 1 a Unitarian. There has never been an atheist or agnostic (with possibly one exception) among the judges of the Supreme Court. Of the twenty-three who have been elected President of the United States, all have been believers in Christ, sixteen have been Christian communicants. Since President Lincoln, who was a man of faith and prayer, every one elected to that high office has been a communicant in some one of the evangelical churches. Discount as we may for conventional or lax profession of faith in Christ, must we not recognize that these facts bear forceful testimony to the pervasive influence of the spirit of Christianity. Christianity is the pervading and directing influence in American education. Each year the number of Bible classes maintained by the students for devotional study increases and the interest deepens, while the colleges are more largely offering systematic Bible study as an elective in their regular curriculum. Last year (1906) the churches in America made a net gain of 4,300 ministers, 3,635 churches, and 820,389 communicants, and gave $8,980,448 to extend the ministries and knowledge of Christian truth among non-Christian people. Evangelical Christianity, so patient and persistent in effort, so essentially educative and uplifting, has been the potential cause of our growth and transformation. By the gentle persuasion of loving ministry, by the inherent energy of the simple truths concerning God and man as revealed in Jesus Christ, by the living force of consecrated lives, the wilderness has been made to blossom as the rose; a world power has been developed where there was no people; loyalty to principle has evolved an unprecedented wealth of resources; and the fundamental conviction of the large majority of the American people is, "That righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people."

CRICKET.

A dull, grey day, with a sprinkling of rain just before play finished, favoured the tenth match between the "Born in Japan" eleven against The Rest of the Y.C. & A.C. As Tuesday was a Bank holiday it was possible to make the event an all-day match and play began fairly promptly. The Rest went to bat first and lost their first wicket for 3—a single and two byes. Then Ross joined Bousfield and 20 was telegraphed before Kingdon caught the former. The third wicket fell for 57 and when an adjournment was made for tiffin 85 had been knocked up. Play was resumed at a quarter to two W. D. S. Edwards and Major Champain being then at bat with the elder Kilby brothers trundling the leather. For a time the partnership seemed invincible and runs came very freely, but at last Edwards skied a ball which V. A. Hearne held. The retiring batsman had contributed 45 by excellent play and the score stood at 137. But less than 30 more runs were made ere the rest of the side were dismissed. At five minutes to three Born in Japan began their innings. The light was anything but good but the chances notwithstanding were in their favour. As a glance at the score will show they won handsomely, securing 172 runs for the loss of five wickets. It seemed almost a pity that the game was declared at this point for H. W. Kilby then wanted but two more runs to complete a century. Score:—

DEATH OF MRS. REYNELL.

The Kobe Herald of Sept. 23rd says that deep sorrow has been occasioned by the death of Mrs. Reynell. The sad event took place at the International Hospital, whither she had been removed from her residence at Shiota some days previously, in order to ensure every benefit that skilled nursing and the best medical science could afford. Despite every attention the unfortunate lady gradually sank and on Saturday last her case was seen to be so desperate that the members of the family were summoned to the bedside. During her long illness Mrs. Reynell bore up to the last with splendid fortitude, and only the most intimate friends of the family realised the full gravity of the illness. The deepest sympathy is felt for the bereaved husband and the other members of the family. Throughout her long residence in Kobe Mrs. Reynell has taken a prominent part in the social life of the port, her many estimable qualities winning for a host of friends.

The local branch of the Chartered Bank are in receipt of a telegram from the London Office intimating that the Directors have declared an interim dividend for the half year ended the 30th June last at the rate of 13 per cent per annum, free of Income Tax.

KEIHIN KEIBA CLUB.

The half yearly meeting of members of the Keihin Keiba Club was held on Monday afternoon at No. 74. Mr. J. de Cuers de Cogolin presided and there was a fairly large attendance.

The report and accounts were presented were as follows:—

The Committee have the pleasure to submit to the members of the Club, Report and Accounts to 31st August, 1907.

ACCOUNTS.—The annexed accounts are submitted for the approval of members. The amounts allotted as Rent of the Course, Reserve for the Club, Charitable objects etc., are subject to the approval of the Baseikyoku.

COURSE.—The course suffered no material damage from the floods and only the ordinary work is required to put it in good order for the Autumn Meeting. A Motor Roller is expected to arrive shortly and will greatly facilitate the work to be done. It is intended to lay the course with turf in time for the Spring Meeting, 1908. A scheme of drainage is under consideration.

BUILDINGS.—The Company is erecting a very fine stand for the accommodation of distinguished personages and members of the Club and Owners. The Building will not be completed in time for the Autumn Meeting but it is intended to complete a portion of the ground floor with Weighing and Committee rooms by that time.

WATER.—The important question of the supply of good water is having attention.

AUSTRALIAN MARES.—The Club has ordered 40 well bred mares to arrive early in 1908, half from Sydney and half from Melbourne.

COUNTRY-BRED HORSES.—The horses bought for subscribers up to the present have not, with some few exceptions, been very satisfactory, but 25 young horses of a better class have been bought which will be ready to run in the Spring 1908.

COMMITTEE.—The term of office is three years. Until vacancies occur there will therefore be no elections to the Committee during that period, but your Committee are of opinion that the term of office might with advantage be reduced to one year and as the Articles of Association need revision in many matters, your Committee would like an expression of opinion from members on this point.

The thanks of the Committee have been given on behalf of the members to those gentlemen who kindly assisted in various official capacities at the July Meeting.

A. M. T. WOODWARD
DR. T. ISHIURA
SHINNOSUKE KIMURA } Supervisors.

Some discussion was instituted by Mr. J. Kimura with regard to the proxies, a large number of which bore no name and eventually Mr. A. Bouffier proposed that all unnamed proxies should be filled up in the name of the Chairman, Mr. A. M. T. Woodward seconded.

Mr. WOODWARD explained that though his name was put at the foot of the accounts as a supervisor he had not examined the accounts; his name was there against his wish and he wished to withdraw from the office of supervisor. Mr. Woodward subsequently withdrew this resignation.

In reply to Mr. Kimura the Chairman said the amount of yen 66,000 had not been paid because it was subject to the approval of the Basei Kyoku.

After some discussion Mr. Lefebvre pointed out that one of the auditors had declared that he did not see the accounts and another said he only saw part of them. How could they know that the buildings, etc., cost what they were put down for? He proposed that they should not consider the accounts until they were properly audited.

Mr. WOODWARD seconded.

Mr. GRAY said he had not been aware that the new agreement with the Kaisha had come into force. It was necessary by law to hold a meeting in September and the accounts should certainly have been properly audited and he presumed that they were. He quite agreed with the motion.

Mr. LEFEBVRE said he wished that the auditors should make it their business to find out the exact amount spent or supposed to be spent on the track, etc., because he had reason to suppose that there were things included that should not be.

It was proposed by Mr. Kimura and seconded that the amount of yen 66,000 should be reduced to yen 60,000 and that yen 6,000 be added to the reserve.

Mr. LEFEBVRE proposed that the accounts be referred back to the supervisors for further examination and verification.

Mr. WOODWARD seconded.

The motion was carried.

On the motion of Mr. Catto seconded by Mr. M. J. Dayet, Mr. Mori was elected to take the place on the Committee of the latter gentleman who will be absent from Yokohama for some time.

Mr. WOODWARD thought that with the other supervisors the accounts could be got ready in four days.

It was then proposed that the meeting should be adjourned till Sept. 27th at the same hour (4.30 p.m.).

This was agreed to and the proceedings terminated.

THE LAW COURTS.

ALLEGED INFRINGEMENT OF THE TOBACCO MONOPOLY LAW.

The trial of Mr. C. B. Clausen, manager of the Phoenix Hotel, and an employee named T. Takahashi, who are charged with alleged infringement of the Tobacco Monopoly Law, took place on Sept. 23rd in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagato and Public Prosecutor Yamamoto.

The defendants did not employ counsel in defence.

The Public Prosecutor said that in March this year, M. Clausen purchased eleven boxes of cigars, each box containing a hundred pieces, for yen 4.50, and since that time, he sold fourteen. On Sept. 19th, he also purchased twenty boxes of cigarettes, each box containing a hundred pieces, for yen 44. and five boxes of cigarettes each box containing fifty pieces for yen 5.50 from Takahashi, his employee. Mr. Clausen sold fourteen cigars from the eleven boxes, eighty-six cigarettes of the lot of twenty boxes, and forty-seven cigarettes of the lot of five boxes.

Being examined by the Judge, Mr. Clausen stated that he is an architect and manager of the Phoenix Hotel of which Mrs. Clausen is proprietress. In March this year, he purchased eleven boxes of cigars, each box containing a hundred pieces, from a Chinaman whose name he did not know. He used them for his private purposes or sold a number, but he did not remember the exact number. About March 19th, he also purchased twenty boxes of cigarettes, each box containing a hundred pieces and five boxes of cigarettes, each containing fifty, for yen 2.50 and 1.10 respectively per box from his employee T. Takahashi. Mr. Clausen did not know from whom the Japanese obtained the goods. In both cases, he did not pay attention whether the seal of the Tobacco Monopoly Office had been affixed to the boxes as he was, at that time, quite ignorant of the Tobacco Monopoly Law. He did not sell the tobacco. Referring to the shortage in the boxes, Mr. Clausen said that he had presented some pieces to his friends or used some for his own purposes. He said that the officers of the Tobacco Monopoly Office visited some hotels in Yokohama after the Monopoly Law came into force in 1905. The authorities gave notice to the proprietors of the hotels. If the officials had given notice to the Phoenix Hotel, the accused would not have made such a mistake. He was quite astonished that the Japanese Government did not give strict orders to those who dealt in tobacco as to the stipulations of the Law. If the Government seal was placed on every box of tobacco, all foreigners who were ignorant of the Monopoly Law and were carrying on the tobacco business might be easy.

The Judge said that there were smugglers of tobacco, and tobacco without the government mark was often found. The fact that the accused was ignorant of the Monopoly Law was a ground for extenuating the punishment. The accused, however, could not escape entirely from the charge.

Mr. Clausen said that he had no objection to the declaration of the Judge and would pay a fine in accordance with the law.

T. Takahashi stated that on March 19th this year, a tobacco merchant named Takahashi Shuzo brought two lots of cigarettes to the office of the Phoenix Hotel. His employer, Mr. Clausen, bought the cigarettes from the merchant.

The Judge read some letters put in as evidence after which the Public Prosecutor made a brief speech. He said that both defendants should be dealt with under Art. 57 of the Tobacco Monopoly Law, which provides for a fine between yen 10 and yen 300. Mr. Clausen should be ordered to pay yen 4.26 in addition to a fine, in accordance with Art. 61 of the Tobacco Monopoly Law and Takahashi to pay yen 49.50 under the same article, which amounts are the price of the tobacco which they sold.

The Judge decided to give judgment at 10 a.m. on Sept. 25th.

THE "AGENOR" CASE.

The appeal of A. Lewis and C. A. Hill will be resumed on Oct. 8th in the Tokyo Appeal Court.

INFRINGEMENT OF THE TOBACCO MONOPOLY LAW.

Sentence was given on Sept. 25th in the Yokohama District Court in the case of Mr. C. B. Clausen and an employee of his named T. Takahashi, who were charged with having infringed the Tobacco Monopoly Law.

1.—Mr. Clausen was punished with a fine of eighty-two yen; and ordered to pay yen 4.25, which is the price of what he sold out of the lots of tobacco bearing no seal of the Tobacco Monopoly Office; and the 1,086 cigars, 1,914 cigarettes and 203 cigarettes were confiscated.

2.—Takahashi was punished with a fine of thirty yen and ordered to pay yen 49.50, the price of the two lots of cigarettes bearing no mark of the Tobacco Monopoly office which he sold to Mr. Clausen.

A LAND CASE.

A case instituted by Dr. Edwin Wheeler, No. 97, Bluff, against Mr. L. Stornebrink, No. 184, Bluff, Yokohama, petitioning for the return of a piece of leased land, the removal of two buildings thereon, and the restoration of the land to its original state, or otherwise for the payment of damages, came up on Sept. 25th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Muroaka.

Plaintiff was represented by Dr. Masujima and Mr. Morofuji, and defendant by Mr. Sawada.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that on May 14th 1897, Stornebrink leased from Dr. Wheeler two northern parts of the latter's land, 18 and 21 tsubo respectively, and an eastern corner, 17 tsubo, all contiguous to the land belonging to defendant. The condition of the lease was that the land should be returned after five years, and the rent, five yen per annum. As defendant did not return the land at the due time, plaintiff wrote a letter on Sept. 1st, 1905, to defendant asking for the return of the property. Defendant, however, still retained the ground. Defendant erected two buildings which extended over the land which he had leased from plaintiff. Parts of the houses that extended to the leased land must be removed at the same time as the land is returned. If the buildings are not removed by defendant, the land owner must destroy the parts of the buildings concerned. The cost of the destruction, was estimated at three hundred yen. The land of Dr. Wheeler's lies high and that of Mr. Stornebrink is in a lower position. The parts of the land which defendant leased are all on the hill-side. Defendant cut down the cliff making it level with his land and on this he built the two houses already mentioned. As the result of this alteration, the parts of the land belonging to plaintiff became so seriously situated that stone walls with concrete inside must be constructed to prevent the danger of landslides and other accidents. This would cost about a thousand yen.

Defendant's Counsel contended that Mr. Stornebrink cut down some small parts of the land at the foot of the hill as land slides were repeatedly experienced whenever heavy rains occurred. He lined the hill side with bricks so as to prevent land-slides in the case of rains or frost. The lease was still in force although the term of the contract, which was verbally made, had expired. Defendant was not bound to remove the two buildings some parts of which encroached on the land leased so long as the contract was in force. Counsel further said that indeed plaintiff might be held responsible for a stone-wall at necessary places on the hill side as Mr. Stornebrink's land was located at the foot of Dr. Wheeler's property and was always sustaining damage through the occurrence of landslides and other similar accidents.

Plaintiff's Counsel said that according to the title-deeds the lot covered 259 tsubo. If the land was surveyed it would be very easy to ascertain what extent of the land at the hill side was cut down. Counsel added that the work which Mr. Stornebrink had lined with bricks was imperfect.

Defendant's Counsel replied that the title-deed of perpetual lease given to Mr. Stornebrink by the local government was made a long time ago when the survey was not very strict; consequently the land might be greater than the extent described in the documents.

Plaintiff's counsel produced evidence. Defendant refused to admit it. Thereupon plaintiff's counsel asked the Judge for leave to examine an official from the local Government office, who deals with perpetual leases, as a witness and an expert to investigate the proposed necessity for stone-walls. Counsel further asked the Judge personally to examine to place in dispute.

The Judge decided to summon an official of the local government and to examine the place personally on Oct. 1st. The Judge declared that the examination of the witness would be made on the spot.

PETITION FOR TRANSFER OF PAYMENT.

The hearing of a case instituted by Mr. Martineri Alexandre, the representative of Messrs Martineri Roth, Italy, against Mr. C. Eymard, Yokohama, petitioning for transfer of payment of yen 2,666.42, was resumed on Sept. 26th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nakanishi.

It may be remarked that some years ago, Mr. J. F. Wagen sold property to Mr. C. Eymard for sixty-three thousand yen. As plaintiff in the present case has had a credit, the amount of which he claimed, against Mr. Wagen, the former through the Yokohama Local Court, asked Mr. Eymard to transfer the whole sum for the property purchased. The purchaser of the property, however, had paid the whole amount to Mr. Wagen before a decision was given in the Court.

Referring to the power-of-attorney given by Mr. Martineri Alexandre to his Counsel, Mr. Fujiwara the Judge said that the document seemed to be vague. According to a statement made by Mr. Cephilance Roth in the presence of a notary-public of Italy, a partnership association had been organized by Messrs. Alexandre and Roth. There was no official evidence specifying that Mr. Alexandre was the representative of the firm. The power-of-attorney given to Mr. Fujiwara, plaintiff's counsel, was issued through T. Owariya, Sakaicho, Yokohama. The Judge added that he could not understand the capacity of Mr. Alexandre as the legal representative of his firm, or the relations between Mr. Alexandre and T. Owariya.

Plaintiff's counsel said that at the first hearing, which took place on May 15th this year, an objection was made by defendant's Counsel as to the power-of-attorney in question. Under the order of the Judge, plaintiff's Counsel wrote a letter to his client residing in Italy to send out at once every necessary document. These, however, had not yet been received. Probably they would reach him within a few weeks.

The Judge thereupon adjourned the case till Oct. 31st.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The office of the Japanese Commercial Agent at Vladivostok has been closed. On Sept. 12th, a Japanese Consulate was opened at the port.

We note that in the prospectus of St. Joseph's College of Yokohama there are several new features, specially the "Outline of Studies," which can not fail to interest parents. This school appears to be doing useful and effective work under the efficient control of Mr. L. Stolz.

It is reported by the Dempe that Baron I. Motono, Japanese Minister, will shortly be promoted to the rank of Ambassador, and that a Japanese Ambassador in Europe will resign his position in the near future. The Foreign Office is looking about for his successor.

The yield of various minerals in July throughout Japan is as follows: gold, 54,614 monme; silver, 1,830,408 monme; copper, 4,533,391 kin; iron, 1,512,354 kwanme; coal, 913,070 tons; kerosene oil, 117,704 koku; and sulphur, 1,454,962 kin; (monme, about 3.76 grams; kin, about 1.23 lbs.; kwanme, about 3.76 kilos; and koku, about 40 gallons).

Mr. C. L. Norris-Newman (who will be remembered in Yokohama as "Colonel" Newman, for some time editor of the Japan Gazette) editor and proprietor of the China Critic, has been mulcted in damages to the tune of $2,000 with costs in the British Court at Tientsin for having published libellous paragraphs with regard to an Italian subject named F. H. Borioni. The defendant pleaded justification but the judge advised the jury that the truth of the libel had not been proved.

To the ordinary observer the almost invisible thread spun by a spider is one of the flimsiest materials conceivable, but even those who know otherwise may well be surprised at the result of investigation published in the American Journal of Science. The writer carefully tested for strength and elasticity a spider thread 2.5 metres long, and 0.01 centimetres in diameter, and found that its tensile strength was double that of wood, that it had large hygroscopic properties by which its length varied from day to day (the stretching force being constant), and that before it could be broken it had to be stretched an amount equal to nearly a quarter of its original length. Astronomers are well aware of these exceptional properties, and the transit wires that play so important a part in delicate stellar observations are simply spider threads skilfully cemented in the telescopic field of view.

On Monday evening, at about 6.30, said the Nagasaki Press of the 18th, a lighter with 104 labourers on board was capsized in the harbour. The men were employed by contract at the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard and were returning to their homes at Nagasaki when the accident occurred. It is stated that the wash from two steam launches—the Mitsu Bishi Company's Takashima Maru and Mr. Sawayama's Taka Maru—capsized the lighter. Assistance was speedily rendered by the sampans and lighters in the vicinity and the Water Police also hastened to the scene. Ninety were rescued and twelve bodies have since been picked up.

The well-known law lecturer and "coach," Dr. Thomas Waraker, LL.D., of Trinity Hall, died at Cambridge during August. He had as pupils men who became successful in politics, law, and other walks of life. Among his pupils were Lord Fitzmaurice, Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., Viscount Suyematsu, Count Mutsu, and Mr. Yoshigama, the first law student sent by the Imperial Government to England. Dr. Waraker contributed articles to the legal Press, and published a book dealing with the Treaty of Paris, 1856, judged from a lawyer's standpoint. He also took an active interest in local public life, and was in former times a leader of the Conservative party at Cambridge, where he was highly respected.

The Liverpool Journal of Commerce is officially informed that the rate war which broke out two or three years ago between the British and German companies trading to the East has been officially brought to a settlement. The companies concerned are the Hansa Line, of Germany, and the P. and O., the British India, the Anchor, and City Lines, of Glasgow, and Messrs. Brocklebank and T. and J. Harrison, of Liverpool. The conference which existed between these companies was broken down owing to a dispute between the Hansa and P. and O. Lines. The Germans began to cut weight rates, until on iron and rough goods, for which there has sprung up an enormous demand in the East, the rate was cut to something like 6s. per ton. As the result of frequent interviews, the various companies have now come to an amicable settlement, and have entered into a working arrangement for the fixing of freights from London, Middlesbrough, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Antwerp. These rates, which may vary according to the port, are all to be raised, and in Liverpool shippers have been notified that the weight rate on iron and rough goods had been raised to 10s. per ton.

According to a communication from the Consul at St. Petersburg, quoted by the Bulletin Commercial, during 1906 the Russian railway system increased by 2,355 versts (1,568 miles), making a total of 56,854 versts, or about 40,000 miles; and 923 versts (680 mile) were opened after December 31, bringing the total up to 60,777 versts (about 40,518 miles). The most important of the new lines is that from Vologda to Viatka, 504 versts (about 400 miles). The Northern Railway is now complete, and St. Petersburg is brought into direct communication with the Siberian system. Both passenger and traffic receipts show an increase over the preceding year. The passengers carried numbered 125,446,011, or eight millions more than in 1905; while the goods carried are given as 9,400,705,000 poods, or about 37,000,000 tons, showing the remarkable increase of 1,274,657,000 poods, or about 5,736,000 tons, for the year. The receipts per verst increased by 9.4 per cent., the total—excluding railways in Finland—being 729,007,213 roubles, or about £110,000,000. The largest increase occurred on the Siberian line—43.3 per cent.

CUSTOMS PROTEST.

Mr. Yamazaki, Director of the Yokohama Customs, delivered a decision on Sept. 21st on a protest lodged by Mr. E. Levedag, No. 224, Yamashita-cho. Mr. Levedag imported three cases of "furniture velvet" with a certificate of origin on which the customs appraisers imposed 30 per cent. ad val. duty in accordance with No. 274 of the tariff. The importers contended that the goods consist of wool 45 per cent., cotton 34 per cent. and hemp 12 per cent., and should be dealt with under No. 61 of the Anglo-Japanese conventional tariff. The protest was dismissed on the ground that wool or cotton was predominant.

The director of the Yokohama Customs gave a decision on Sept. 23rd as to a protest filed by Herr R. Schuffner, No. 25, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama. Herr Schuffner imported woollen woven goods, with a certificate of origin, on which the Customs appraisers ordered him to pay duty at the rate of sen 9.3 per square yard in accordance with No. 54-A of the Japanese-German conventional tariff. The importer contended that the goods are not woollen cloth, but "Spanish strips" a kind of flannel seventy-two inches in width, not thirty inches which is the usual measure for flannel. In consequence of the special width, the woollen material is a tissue not to be included among woollen cloths. The duty on the goods in dispute, therefore, should be ad val. 10 per cent. under No. 56 of the tariff. The protest was dismissed.

THE FIRE ON THE "TAFOO MARU."

The fire which took place on the Nissin Kisen Kaisha steamer Tafoo Maru is described at length in Shanghai papers. It appears from the narratives of survivors who have reached Shanghai that the steamer left there at 4.30 a.m. on Tuesday (Sept. 17th) and everything went well until about 1 o'clock on Wednesday morning when sleepers were awakened by Chinese who reported that there was a fire in the box room under the steerage passengers' quarters. This fire originated through a man smoking a cigarette in the baggage hold. Immediately on the alarm being given there was great excitement and the majority of the Chinese passengers ran forward to avoid the flames and smoke. The hubbub was increased by these passengers trying to take their boxes and bedding with them, and had they not been made to put most of these articles in the saloon the crew could not have passed aft. The captain, officers and crew did all they could to stop the progress of the flames, but in vain. Fortunately there was a headwind; otherwise the destruction of the wooden ship would have been a matter of but a few minutes and another holocaust would have been recorded.

Rev. A. E. Rydberg, of the Scandinavian Sailors' Home, Shanghai, and Rev. H. P. Shaw of the Foreign Christian Mission were on board, but were able to escape. Many Chinese lost their lives.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NEW POSTAL CONVENTION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I beg to forward to you herewith enclosed a translation of the principal alterations made in the New Postal Convention, and beg to request that you will kindly publish it in the columns of your paper for the convenience of the public interested.

Yours very truly,

K. KATOW,
For Supr. of Foreign Mails.

(ENCLOSURE.)

NEW POSTAL CONVENTION.

Among the alterations made in the newly revised Postal Convention, the following are the principal items which directly concern the interest of the general public. For convenience' sake, the old and new are contrasted.

OLD.

1. Postage on letters, 25 cims (10 sen) per 15 grammes or fraction thereof.

2. The maximum trade charge to be collected on any one registered article is fixed at 1000 francs (400 yen).

Each Administration is, however, at liberty to lower this maximum to 500 francs (200 yen).

4. Closed navy mails may be exchanged only between Post Offices and ships of war.

5. Current coins are prohibited to send by post.

6. Post cards must bear the heading "Post Card."

7. Post cards may not exceed the following dimensions: length, 14 centimetres, width, 9 centimetres.

8. Postage stamps must be affixed on the face of post cards.

10. Except stamps for prepayment and labels showing the address, it is forbidden to join or attach to post cards any article whatever.

13. On printed visiting cards may be added in manuscript the address of the sender, his title, as well as good wishes, congratulations, etc., expressed in five words at most or by means of conventional initials (p.f. &c.).

14. Notices of the departures of ships, with the dates of those departures indicated in manuscript, are treated as printed papers.

15. Cards bearing the inscription "Post Card" are not allowed at the rate for printed matter.

16. No money orders may exceed the maximum of 1000 francs (400 yen). However, the Administrations have the liberty to fix it at 500 francs (200 yen).

17. The general fee for each sum of money order, 25 cims (10 sen) up to 100 francs (40 yen) and 25 cims per 50 francs for all sums, beyond the first 100 francs.

19. Money orders remain valid until the expiration of the fourth month after the month of issue.

NEW.

1. 25 cims (10 sen) up to 20 grammes and 15 cims (6 sen) for each additional 20 grammes or fraction thereof.

2. No liberty is allowed to lower this maximum. The senders of such mail matter (including letters, boxes, and parcels with value declared) may request the total or partial cancelling of the trade charge.

3. An international return-message-coupon exchangeable for a postage stamp of 25 cims (10 sen) has been innovated.

4. They may be exchanged also between ships of war.

5. Coins of any kind (both current and not current) are prohibited.

6. The heading is not necessary on private post cards.

7. They may not also be smaller than 10 centimetres in length and 7 centimetres in width.

8. They may affixed on the back side.

9. The left half of the face of post cards may be used for the purpose of communication.

10. Vignettes and photographs, on very thin paper, may be affixed on the back side as well as on the left of the face of post cards.

11. Unsealed letters and post cards of old dates which have already attained their first purpose are regarded as commercial papers.

12. Keys, flowers, tubes of straw, and pathological objects, packed in a way to prevent all danger, are regarded as samples of merchandise.

13. They may be added also on New Year and Christmas Cards.

14. Those of the arrivals of ships are also allowed.

15. They are allowed if they fulfil the conditions for printed matter.

16. No liberty is allowed to lower this maximum, except in the case of Bolivia and four other countries.

17. It is reduced to 25 cims (10 sen) per 50 francs (20 yen) with the exception of Bulgaria.

18. The withdrawal and correction of address of telegraphic money orders may be effected by telegraph.

19. The period is extended to five months.

BONDED WAREHOUSES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The following communication from F. E. Crowe, Esq., Commercial Attache of the British Consulate-General at Yokohama, correcting erroneous information which recently appeared in the press, will be of interest to members;—

"The Director of the Yokohama Customs has issued a warning in regard to goods stored at present in the Customs Bonded Warehouses, as follows:—

Customs Duties Law

(not "Tariff" law, as erroneously stated)

Unless application be made to withdraw goods from a bonded warehouse before the end of this Month, the 30th September (not the end of this year as erroneously stated), duties will be levied according to the rate at the time the goods are withdrawn, and not according to the rate at the time application for warehousing was made, as was formerly the case."

RELIGIOUS SURVIVALS.

Mr. D. G. Hogarth, President of the section of Anthropology in the Leicester programme of the British Association, devoted his address to the interesting subject of religious survivals, seeking to distinguish between those persistent elements in cult which are survivals in the pathological sense, and those which are not, and to show that the latter, though existent in earlier religions, reappear in actually existing religions simply because they express vital necessities of the religious sense in the human race. We quote The Times summary:—

In the course of his address, Mr. Hogarth said that belief in the Incarnation of God with all its consequences of expression—the immaculate conception, atoning death, and bodily resurrection—did not make their appearance for the first time in Christianity. They were to be recognized as forms—or necessary categories of creed—under which races of the Nearer East and of other regions of the world also had conceived the relation between the human and the Divine as far back as we knew anything of their history.

THE GREAT NATURE-GODDESS.

The predominance of a great Nature-Goddess among all the races of the East Mediterranean basin in the earliest historic time was well known; and to what had been ascertained of her among the Semites, the Nilotic peoples, the Anatolian races, the historic inhabitants of Greece and the Ægean, and the Celtic tribes, there had been added latterly the discovery that a goddess of character and attributes, readily to be compared with those of the Nature deity in various parts of the surrounding area, was dominant in the religion of that important artistic race which occupied the Ægean in the prehistoric age, and had so much influence on the momentous civilization of its later time—that race which had been rescued from long oblivion by Schliemann in Greece and Troy, and by Evans and others in the Isles. The more we learnt of this great Nature or Mother Goddess, the more primeval and predominant was the position she was seen to hold. All round the Eastern Mediterranean she was before all created things; she became the mother of a son by spontaneous generation or some other process independent of the male. With her son she produced all life—she gave her son to the humanity so created, and humanity killed him that it might live; he revived and returned again to his mother, was again killed, and so the cycle of the seasons revolved. A woman still held the same place in the religious belief of the old races of the same region, wherever they had escaped assimilation by conquering races and faiths from beyond the border. But she was not worshipped now in Ephesus or Cyprus merely because there was once a dominant cult of Artemis or Aphrodite in those places, but because to the peoples of a wide Mediterranean region it was still, as it always was, a religious necessity to embody their idea of divinity in the feminine.

PROCESSES OF TRANSFERENCE.

In her essential identification with the religious sense of these peoples, therefore, the Virgin was no mere survival. But in an accidental or secondary sense her actual personality might, perhaps, be so regarded in the region in question if we were careful to exclude from the word all connotation of superfluity or decaying energy. Her cult might be brought under that body of beliefs, observances, and practices which had demonstrably passed from earlier religious systems to later by processes of transference, usually unconscious, but often half-conscious, and undoubtedly in some cases wholly conscious. Many of the undoubted transferences which took place under the Christian system could not at this time of day be certainly distinguished into the conscious and the unconscious. We knew that saints of the Church had entered often into the honour and the local habitations of pagan deities. We knew that almost all our stated ecclesiastical festivals were continuations of heathen feasts, so far as their dates and the general nature of their commemorative significance were concerned. What had to be changed had been changed, but not more. Christmas had succeeded to the festival of the winter solstice which celebrated the new birth of the sun; Easter to the spring festival at which in many parts of the Mediterranean world the Nature-Goddess, and especially the death and resurrection of her Son, were commemorated. The Assumption of the Virgin replaced the August feast of Artemis and Diana in Greece and Italy. The anniversary of St. George, so great a day in modern Greece, seemed to be the old Parilla; St. John the Baptist had taken on the heathen rites of midsummer, and the folk of Smyrna, Christian and Moslem alike, might be seen jumping through fire to his honour on any St. John's Eve. Very rarely, as in the case of the Feast of All Souls, the late Christian adoption of which in the tenth century happened to be known, could we ascribe these transferences to any definite action of a leader of the Church. Usually we knew no more than that where and when there was once a pagan saint or a pagan feast there were now saints and feasts of Christianity. But no reasonable person felt that the latter were discredited or lost anything of their actual significance by the fact of their having a pre-Christian pedigree. It was possible, even probable, that Mary, the mother of Jesus, also owed her divine, or at least semi-divine, position in the Christian system to a conscious effort by leaders of the Church as those just alluded to. It was a well-known fact that neither the primary nor the secondary authorities for the first two centuries of Christianity supplied any warrant for the position which she was to hold later. They were, in fact, almost silent about her. Nor had Christian archaeology discovered any better evidence of her glorification above other holy women during that time. It seemed established that it was not till the third century that she began to assume semi-divinity. By the fourth her position was sufficiently exalted to cause the schism associated with the name of Nestorius, but it was not till A.D. 431 that she was officially acknowledged by a general council to be divine in virtue of her Theotokia, her motherhood of God. Once established, or, more probably, little by little while she was gaining recognition, the Christian Virgin appropriated the festival dates, the holy places, and even the rites of her predecessors. Here a third class of survivals was approached. The great August feast of Artemis became that of the Assumption of Our Lady; temples, groves, sacred springs, and other holy spots of nature-worship were transferred to the new patroness of all life and fertility. There were hundreds of places in Anatolia, Greece, and Syria which might be called to testify.

YOKOHAMA CHARITY ORGANIZATION.

Report and Financial Statement for the period between 1st September, 1906, and 31st August, 1907, to be presented at the annual meeting to be held on October 2nd:

The Committee beg to lay before Subscribers the following Report and Statement of Finance.

During the twelve months the Society has been able to extend relief to seventy-two (72) destitute persons:—

32 Seamen, 11 Firemen, 5 Clerks, 4 Cooks, 4 Engineers, 2 Farmers, 4 Stewards and 8 unknown. Nationalities were as follows:—British, 16; American, 31; German, 9; Russian, 2; French, 1; Austrian, 3; Norwegian, 4; Unknown, 5.

The relief given consisted of 409 nights' lodging, 473 days' board, numerous passages and assisted passages in China, Straits, Europe, Canada, United States, etc., food and other necessities to local poor, and contributions towards the maintenance of needy residents.

The Committee desire to record their thanks for gifts of clothing; to thank Messrs. North & Rae and Messrs. Brett & Co. for making up prescriptions; the proprietors of the local journals, the Japan Herald, the Japan Gazette, the Japan Mail and the Japan Advertiser for inserting, without charge, advertisements calling attention to the needs of the Society. Their thanks are also due to Messrs. Pearson & Mackie for auditing the accounts free of charge.

The Committee are much indebted to the Salvation Army (represented here by Mr. and Mrs. Harris) for valuable assistance and co-operation.

On the 15th of this month the community was notified by circular from the Salvation Army Head Quarters in Tokyo that it had been decided to close the Home in Yokohama "early in September." Without assistance of this or a similar establishment it would be a much more difficult matter to deal with the relief of the destitute, and the Committee of the Charity Organization are giving the question their prompt and earnest attention.

The Committee repeat the assurance annually given to Subscribers that the funds entrusted to them are carefully and systematically disbursed. From the accompanying figures of Receipts and Expenditure it will be seen that the Society starts its 1907/8 Financial year heavily in debt. To discharge that deficit, and to provide for the requirements of the coming year, the Committee urgently appeal to the generosity of the Community, and they would respectfully call attention to the note with which they preface the attached list of subscribers for 1906/7.

PEARSON & MACKIE, C.A.

A list of subscribers for 1906-7 is preceded by the following appeal:—

Expressing their thanks for the liberal support given in response to their appeal for subscriptions for the year 1906-7, the Committee once more beg that Foreign Residents will generously assist them to deal with the ever increasing demands on the Society.

The Committee trust they will not be thought ungrateful for past support if they express the hope that the list of subscribers for 1907-8 will record a minimum sum of twenty-five yen (yen 25 co) as the "general" donation from each Firm in Yokohama. If to this a subscription of one yen (yen 1.00) were added from each Foreign member of a Firm's staff, the pecuniary requirements of the Society would be met, its future debt averted, and there would be satisfactory evidence that the calls of charity were recognized by all Foreign Residents without exception.

THE TRADE OF KOREA.

The following is extracted from the report for 1906

Mr. Arthur H. Lay, H.B.M. Consul at Chemulpo:—

The total value of the foreign trade of Korea during the year 1906 amounted to 37,642,063 yen (¥3,842,682), of which sum 29,521,779 yen (¥3,013,682) represented imports and 8,120,284 yen (¥828,946) exports. Compared with the figures for 1905 the whole volume of trade decreased by 1,231,820 yen (¥124,727). The average net foreign trade for the five years 1902-1906 was 31,947,968 yen (¥3,261,355), so that a considerable expansion took place during that period, the comparative increase in 1906 being 5,694,095 yen (¥581,273). In spite of the high value of the trade in 1905 its condition that year was in reality unsatisfactory, and large stocks of foreign goods remained unsold. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that a falling-off should be shown in the returns for 1906. At the same time the figures for the total trade of 1906 are the highest yet reached, excepting those for 1905, so that there is every hope for the continued development of the foreign commerce of Korea. By the end of the year business may be said to have resumed its normal state, and prospects for 1907 are fairly bright.

Imports.—Imports in 1906, though falling short of those of 1905, were nevertheless actually double those of 1901, which, till 1903, was the record year. This gives an idea of the remarkable growth in the demand for foreign commodities in Korea during the past few years, a demand with is likely to become more marked as the various parts of the country are brought more in touch with the outside world by the extension of the railway system, and in other ways. The greatest decrease was in the import of cotton goods.

Exports.—The exports increased by 1,215,283 yen (¥124,132) as compared with those of 1905, and were higher by 169,636 yen (¥17,317) than the average for the five years 1902-06. The largest increase took place in beans and peas, amounting to no less than 602,062 yen (¥62,083). The earlier part of the summer of 1906 was very dry, and fears were entertained regarding the rice crop, upon which the whole course of business in Korea may be said to depend. But heavy rains toward the end of August brought about an abundant harvest. The value of rice exported was 1,603,415 yen.

British Trade.—The United Kingdom has shared largely in the notable expansion of the import trade of Korea during the past few years, and there is no reason why, with the moderate tariff in force, British goods should not maintain their position in the Korean market. As pointed out in previous reports, it is only possible to arrive at an approximate idea of the proportion of the trade which is British. Even taking it at the very low estimate of 25 per cent. of the whole, its value amounted to about ¥960,000 in 1906. The branch of trade in which the United Kingdom is chiefly interested is that of cotton goods; of these, roughly speaking, over ¥300,000 worth of imports into Korea were British. A great change has been experienced in the trade, for, whereas, grey shirtings were formerly in greatest demand, they are being replaced by white shirtings, and to supply the market in 1907 more contracts have been made for the latter than the former. It is difficult to say whether this decline in the inquiry for grey shirtings is of a temporary nature or not. In any case, it is certain that the extremely high prices ruling in Manchester are curtailing the orders for British cotton goods, and full advantage is being taken of the fact by Japanese manufacturers. A fair proportion of the woollen goods imported is of British origin. In the case of galvanised, corrugated and flat sheet iron, prices in the United Kingdom are almost prohibitive. As regards candles, in which the United Kingdom is much interested, it is estimated that a year's supply was carried over from 1905 to 1906. Some of the mining supplies in 1906 were from the United Kingdom, but 8 per cent. were American, as was most of the railway plant and material. The trade in paints and oils is still mainly British, but Japanese paints are gradually finding a market. Amongst provisions, in the matter of biscuits British makes control the trade, but some Japanese biscuits are being imported. Very little British underwear finds its way into Korea. Hongkong sugar has entirely lost its hold upon the Korean consumer in favour of the Japanese article. Owing to the close proximity of Japan and Shanghai, when a demand arises, British goods are often supplied from these places in order to save time. As regards openings for British trade, it must be borne in mind that the requirements of Korea are those of an agricultural country, with mining resources in the course of development and a railway system being gradually established.

Railways.—Korea now possesses a railway system of some 600 miles; new lines are being laid down and others are projected. For the next four years it is estimated that the expenditure upon construction and improvement of railways will be about ¥2,250,000. The effect of the decision to nationalise the principal railways in Japan extended to this country, the railroads becoming Japanese Government property, and being placed under the control of a bureau in the Residency-General in Seoul in 1906. This was the first whole year of working of the Seoul-Fusan line, the opening ceremony of which was held in May, 1905. It connects with the railway to Chemulpo at Yong-dong-po, or Yei-to-ho, as the Japanese name the station, and the journey from Chemulpo or Seoul to Tokio can now be accomplished in 53 hours, the time having been shortened by about 10 hours from April, 1907. Up to this time there has only been one train each way in the 24 hours, but a through train from each terminus will in future perform the journey daily as well. Between Seoul and Chemulpo there are shortly to be nine trains, one to be express, doing the distance in about an hour, a vast improvement on the present express time which is an hour and a half.

Chemulpo.—Chemulpo continues to maintain its position as the principal port in Korea, and this is more particularly true as regards its foreign trade. It has in nearly every respect, grown almost out of recognition during the past decade, the volume of trade having more than trebled during the period from 1896. If we compare the trade of 1906 with that of 1903, we find an increase of ¥314,103. Imports in 1906 were valued at ¥3,621,482 yen

(£1,390,527). Exports reached the sum of 1,872,017 yen (£191,100). Many projects for the improvement and enlargement of Chemulpo have of late been under contemplation, and some of them have been carried to completion.

Shipping.—The number and tonnage of the steamers entered at the open ports of Korea reached the highest figures in 1906, namely, 5,549 vessels of 2,661,190 tons, showing an increase as compared with 1905 of 306 vessels and 778,139 tons. The Japanese tonnage is responsible for the increase, as the release of vessels from transport service permitted of their being used once more on trade routes. In spite of the large number of ships, however, passenger accommodation to Chefoo and Taku was very limited, and passengers for North China from Chemulpo frequently had great difficulty in securing berths. As regards sailing vessels, there was an increase of 20 vessels, but a decrease of 11,254 tons. British shipping showed a decrease, consisting of 20 steamers with a tonnage of 40,746 tons, as against 29 steamers of 61,977 tons, and one sailing vessel of 25 tons in 1905.

Agriculture.—The bulk of the population of Korea being engaged in the cultivation of the soil, the agricultural question is one of vital importance. Experiments are being conducted with a view to the development of farming throughout the country. A great future is predicted for the culture of cotton, which is grown in every province excepting Hamgye. An agricultural and industrial experimental model station has been set up at Suwon, some miles south along the railway from Seoul, the aim being the technical education of Koreans under Japanese supervision, and the initial results are pronounced satisfactory.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

SENDING THE CHINESE HOME.

London, Sept. 19.

Two thousand two hundred and eighty-two Chinese sailed from Durban for China on board the Heliopolis yesterday.

ANOTHER SHIPBUILDING DISPUTE.

A serious situation has been created in the shipbuilding industry, the boilermakers repudiating the recent agreement concluded between their executive and the employers regarding sectional strikes. The employers are now notified of a lock-out to take effect on the 5th of October, affecting 50,000 men.

THE UNREST IN NATAL.

Later.

A public meeting held at Eshowe, Natal, has passed a resolution declaring that it is necessary that Imperial troops be stationed in the town owing to the attitude of the natives.

MARRIAGE OF A FAMOUS NOVELIST.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has been married to Miss Jean Leckie at St. Margaret's, Westminster. Mr. Edalji (a young barrister-at-law of Indian descent, who was imprisoned for alleged cattle maiming in the Midlands and afterwards released on a free pardon, greatly through the exertions of Sir Conan Doyle) was a prominent figure at the reception.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

President Roosevelt's return to Washington next week marks the beginning of the presidential campaign. The Times correspondent has visited Roosevelt at Oyster Bay and found him firmly resolved not to stand, but his influence as to the convention's choice will be the determining factor. Mr. Taft is regarded as the President's candidate.

THE FALL IN COPPER.

Owing to the persistent fall in the price of copper an important American group is restricting its output by 50 per cent.

THE "STANDART" REFLOATED.

London, September 20.

The Tsar's yacht Standart has been refloated.

CHINESE AND THE RAND.

Mr. Meyersbach, speaking in the Chamber of Mines, said that a number of Chinese had offered the mine managers eight thousand pounds sterling to be allowed to remain on the Rand.

THE PENNSYLVANIA CAPITOL SCANDAL.

Fifteen prominent Pennsylvanians have been arrested at Harrisburg on charges of corruption, amounting to nine million dollars, in connection with the building and furnishing of the new capitol at Harrisburg. The arrests include the architect, contractor, several congressmen and officials.

[NOTE.—Elsewhere in this issue appears an article from the Literary Digest throwing light on this scandal.—Ed. J.M.]

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

Later.

It is stated in St. Petersburg that the Anglo-Russian convention guarantees Great Britain against Russian extensions in the Persian Gulf; recognises Great Britain's predominant influence in Afghanistan, which she agrees not to use as a place d'armes against Russian possessions in Central Asia. Only Buddhist subjects of Great Britain or Russia desiring to see the Dalai Lama will be allowed to enter Tibet, exception being made in the case of the valley temporarily occupied by Great Britain.

ASIATIC LABOUR IN AMERICA.

The Dominion Trade-Labour Council, sitting at Winnipeg, has resolved to oppose Hindu labour, and advocates a heavy poll-tax on Chinese.

At Vancouver, Mr. Templeman, Minister for Customs and Revenue, and a labour leader named Smith, in the course of their speeches declared that Asiatic immigration must be regulated by negotiations with the Governments of Japan and India.

DISASTROUS RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN MEXICO.

London, September 21.

Forty-one were killed and 34 injured in a collision between an express and a freighter near Encarnacion in Mexico.

Later.
The latest report shows that 63 were killed and 43 injured in the Encarnacion disaster.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN CONVENTION.

The London papers generally discuss cautiously the Russian forecast of the Anglo-Russian convention. They consider that if the forecast be true the convention is a bad bargain, absolutely without benefit to Great Britain. They denounce the failure to protect the integrity of the Persian people, which Liberals declare is tantamount to the destruction of the nation at the moment of its revival.

PLAGUE AT SAN FRANCISCO.

There have been 35 cases of bubonic plague at San Francisco up to the present. Twenty have died, and 20 suspected cases are under observation.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

A Peking edict appoints Prince Pu-lun another of the Presidents of the projected Government Council which is to be formed preliminary to the regular Parliament.

STRIKES THREATEN GREAT BRITAIN.

Numerous strikes threaten Great Britain, including strikes of railway men, flax-workers, patternmakers, shipyard hands in Belfast, weavers in Glasgow, shoemakers in Norwich, etc. It is believed that this signifies general labour unrest.

CASABLANCA.

Later.

At General Drude's request the tribes prolonged the truce and the time limit for definitely answering the peace terms.

FRANCE AND CANADA.

A Franco-Canadian treaty was signed at Paris yesterday providing for numerous mutual tariff concessions.

PERSIA.

Reuter's correspondent at Teheran says that the Government communicated to Parliament a memorandum explaining the Anglo-Russian agreement which Great Britain and Russia had communicated to Persia and which contributes to allay popular suspicion as to the intended division of Persia.

MOORS PREFER FIGHTING.

London, September 22.

Negotiations have been broken off with the tribesmen at Casablanca and General Drude resumes hostilities.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

Later.

At The Hague a plenary conference has adopted the proposal regarding the establishment of prize courts, also a motion recommending a third conference eight years hence.

RACING.

The result of the Prince Edward handicap is as follows:—Leschana, first; All Black, second; Tirara, third.

SIR W. LAURIER AND THE TRADE UNIONISTS.

London, September 23.

Reuter's correspondent at Ottawa learns that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada, replying to a resolution of the Canadian Trades and Labour Congress asking for the abrogation of the treaty with Japan, says that the treaty was of great advantage to Canada whose trade with Japan had considerably increased. He did not believe that the regrettable incidents at Vancouver were due to an influx of Japanese. The disturbances were directed against Asiatics generally and to precipitate action might be regrettable. The Government would carefully enquire into the causes of the recent influx of Orientals.

VICE-ADMIRAL IJUIN.

The Japanese cruiser Tsukuba has arrived at Port Said.

MORE COALS TO NEWCASTLE.

London, September 23.

The Emperor of Japan has bestowed 192 war rewards, including in the list Marquises Ito, Yamagata and Oyama, who are created Princes, Admiral Togo, Baron Kuroki, Baron Oku, and Baron Nogi created Counts.

CASABLANCA.

The French made a night reconnaissance and attacked and shelled the camp at Sibbrahin driving off the Moroccans. The former had one lieutenant killed and five men wounded.

ILLEGAL AMERICAN TRUSTS.

The Mississippi Gulf Compress Company has been declared by the Chancellor of Mississippi an illegal trust, and its directors have been given a year to wind up its business and withdraw from the State. The company was also fined $1,800,000. It controls 31 companies, mostly in Mississippi.

THE EXPULSION OF JAPANESE FROM ATLIN.

London, September 24.

Seventy-seven Japanese miners were arrested at Atlin, in the Yukon district, by three hundred white miners who forcibly put them upon ship for conveyance to American territory.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

Ratifications of the Anglo-Russian convention were exchanged in St. Petersburg to-day.

ADMIRAL DEWEY ON THE RETENTION OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Admiral Dewey strongly condemns the agitation for the sale or disposal of the Philippines to another Power. He says that if the Philippines passed to Japan the latter would command every gateway to the Orient and completely shut out America both commercially and strategically. The abandonment of the Philippines would mean that the United States would cease to have a diplomatic voice in Far Eastern affairs.

IRISH FACTION FIGHT.

Later.

Differences between the Nationalists and the Sinn Finnh lead to a free fight in the Roscommon County Council. Several were badly hurt. The police restored order.

RIVAL SULTANS OF MOROCCO.

Sultan Abdul Aziz has arrived at Rabat. Sultan Muley Hafiz left Marrakesh on the 19th with 6,000 men and guns, in the direction of Casablanca. It is uncertain whether his objective is Rabat or Abdul Aziz.

TRIBESMEN SUBMITTING.

Later.

Admiral Philibert at Casablanca reports that three of the tribes have signified their submission and have given hostages. They agree to surrender their arms as well as the assailants of the Europeans of the 1st of August and to pay an indemnity.

RUSSIAN GENERAL ELECTIONS.

London, September 25.

The first phase of the elections to the Duma was marked by unprecedented obstruction and apathy.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

Marconi has arrived at Glass Bay in Nova Scotia. He announces that all obstacles have been finally overcome and that the trans Atlantic service of wireless telegraphy will be opened to regular business in three weeks.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN CONVENTION.

London, September 24.

The text of the Anglo-Russian Convention confirms the forecast already published in these columns on Sept. 23rd. The English papers generally approve of the Convention.

THE ANTWERP STRIKE.

It is reported from Antwerp that the dock workers have decided to resume work on Thursday on the condition that wages are increased within a fortnight.

GERMANY AND MOROCCO.

Later.

German semi-official writers point out that Germany has neither renounced her interests in North Africa in favour of France nor will she adopt an active policy of intervention. She will continue to observe the happy mean between those two extremes and has merely expressed her readiness to tolerate the Franco-Spanish police arrangements in Morocco, though France has not been authorized to carry out any scheme.

(By Special Arrangement with the "Tokyo Asahi Shimbun.")

THE VANCOUVER AFFAIR.

San Francisco, September 18.

According to an Ottawa telegram, Sir

Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of the Canadian Government, has had a long conference with Mr. K. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, and Mr. Nossé, consul-general, with regard to the Japanese immigration affair. Sir Wilfrid gave an explanation as to the conditions of labour in Canada, and contended that Japanese from Hawaii without passports should not be admitted to Canada. M. Ishii said that the removal of Japanese from an American Island might be against the principle of passport regulations, but that Japan was unable to alter the steps which had been hitherto taken. The Premier said that the Canadian Government was willing to revise the treaty so as to enable the British authorities to control the Japanese immigrants in the same way as Japan has disposed of the matter with the United States Government. Mr. Ishii replied that at present it was difficult to revise the treaty. Sir Wilfrid admitted this. Finally the parties arrived at an understanding outside the treaty. Mr. Ishii at once telegraphed to his Government the result of the conference.

STANDARD OIL CO.

In the proceedings of the examination of the Standard Oil Company on a charge of unjust dealing the fact was disclosed that the net profits of the concern for eight years past were four hundred and ninety-four million dollars. Astonishment is generally expressed at this enormous figure.

THE RUSSIAN ELECTIONS.

Later.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that the workmen and the peasants, according to the election returns, are abstaining on a wholesale scale from voting in consequence of loss of confidence in the Duma.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Conference Committee has failed to arrive at any solution of the problem of the nomination of judges in the proposed Arbitration Court. It is agreed that the various Governments should recommend that the Court be constituted whenever an agreement can be reached. The First Committee has resolved that it is desirable that the vessels of a belligerent in an enemy's port at the outbreak of hostilities should be allowed to depart immediately, or after a sufficient period of grace. Great Britain has obtained the insertion of a provision that the period of grace shall not be applicable to merchantmen destined for conversion into warships.

INTERVIEW WITH THE PRESIDENT.

London, September 19.

The Times correspondent has had an interview with President Roosevelt at Oyster Bay. The President remarked on the Japanese persecution in Canada, and said he desired that the difficulties attending the British Government in its treatment of the Vancouver affair should not be intensified. He could not believe that they would increase if the influx of Asiatics increased. He also said that the American Labour party should not be permitted to instigate others to riot, but it could not be denied that eighty or ninety per cent. of the citizens on the Pacific coast are averse to the influx of Asiatics. He referred to the dispatch to the Pacific of the battleship squadron, and said the Pacific was no less important than the Atlantic from a naval standpoint. It was, therefore, unavoidable for the United States to demonstrate its naval strength in that direction by showing what its Navy was capable of accomplishing.

MORE JAPANESE AT VICTORIA.

An Ottawa dispatch reports that 449 more Japanese have arrived at Victoria.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, September 19.

Representatives of labourers throughout Canada have held a meeting at Winnipeg. They asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of the Canadian Government, for the cancellation of the Canada-Japanese Treaty within six months and also decided to elect a committee representing the various provinces to submit a strong protest to the Government with a view to settling the Japanese question.

Senator Cherryman, representing South Carolina, on the evening of Sept. 18th, made a speech at San Francisco on the racial question. Referring to the matter of Japanese expulsion, the speaker said that America is a country owned by Americans, and Japanese should be expelled from America. The Japanese must be sent back to Asia. Mr. Cherryman added that should coloured people be admitted in the American schools the Mongolians could not be excluded from America as the Japanese are superior to the negroes in ability, knowledge and morals.

Mr. Bryan will issue his political views within the next few weeks and at the same time he will declare that he is about to appear as a candidate at the forthcoming presidential election, if the Democrats require him to do so. It is generally believed that he is rather unwilling to stand but that the Democrats are ready to welcome him as their candidate.

GERMAN SOCIALISTS.

London, September 20.

The Berlin Socialists are showing renewed confidence in their leader, Herr Bebel, who, in a powerful speech at the Essen congress, exposed the Government's manoeuvres to create an anti-socialistic coalition. He pointed out that clerks and shop-assistants were groaning under the heavy burden of taxation, and he declared that the future belonged to social democracy.

NEW BRITISH BATTLESHIP.

A new battleship of the Dreadnought class, but of 700 tons more displacement than the Bellerophon, will be commenced at Portsmouth in November.

MR. ISHII ON THE CANADIAN SITUATION.

Later.

Mr. Ishii has left Ottawa and gone to Chicago, his business with the Canadian Government being completed. Mr. Ishii declares that the friendship and commercial relations between Japan and Canada are too strong and important to be weakened by the actions of riff-raff. He has discussed the Pacific coast situation perfectly frankly with the Government. Mr. Ishii later on visits England.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

At the Hague the third committee has resolved to propose that the convention regulating the employment of submarine mines be further revised and again presented. It is difficult to believe that revision will produce an acceptable scheme.

A corrected report of Mr. Tsudzuki's speech on Tuesday shows that he said that even if the laying of mines generally were submitted to much more stringent restrictions, there would still remain sufficient means to satisfy the requirements of national defence.

RUSSIA AND PANAMA.

London, September 21.

It is reported in St. Petersburg that Russia is searching for a coaling station near the entrance to the Panama canal.

THE "STANDART" ACCIDENT.

The rocks whereon the Imperial yacht Standart grounded are marked upon the new Government chart, which, however, had not been supplied to the yacht.

FRANCE AND MOROCCO.

M. Clemenceau, the Premier, speaking in Paris, declared that if the Moorish peace negotiations are unsuccessful the French will immediately resume operations with extreme vigour and more troops will be sent out.

"THE TIMES" ON RACIAL HATRED.

Later.
The Times special correspondent, who has lately been in Canada, in a dispassionate review of the Asiatic immigration question, says the three principal causes of hostility are race hatred; alleged unfair competition with white wage-earners, and the use by certain politicians of racial prejudice with a view to influencing votes. The opposition mainly proceeds from the working population supported by the labour unions.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, September 21.

Mr. Clark, confidential secretary to Mr. Metcalf, American Secretary of State for the Navy, has tendered his resignation in spite of his long and special relations with the Secretary. It is generally said that this precludes the resignation of Mr. Metcalf.

Mr. K. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Affairs, left Ottawa on Sept. 20th, for Washington. Previous to his departure, Mr. Ishii informed Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Premier, that he was willing to transmit by telegraph the wishes of the Canadian Government with regard to the immigration affair. It is said that the citizens of Vancouver are disappointed because no special arrangement was made between Mr. Ishii and the Canadian Premier as to limiting the number of Japanese coming into the city.

Mr. T. Nosse, Japanese Consul-General at Ottawa, has declared that no restriction is to be imposed on Japanese entering the British dominions (Canada) in accordance with the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. This declaration shows that the Japanese Government has no intention of altering its emigration policy till 1911.

On Sept. 20th, two hundred and fifty Japanese arrived at Vancouver from Hawaii. They landed without obstruction.

Mr. Scott, Canadian Inspector-General of Immigration affairs, who was appointed by the central government to investigate the recent trouble in Vancouver, arrived in the city on Sept. 20th.

The Asiatic Expulsion Society held a meeting on Sept. 21st in Vancouver with a view to selecting candidates for Parliament who oppose the admission of Asiatics.

The San Francisco police commissioners held a meeting on Sept. 21st and considered the subject of Japanese employment agents. It was thought necessary to ask certain questions of the Federal Government and Mr. Devlin, the city-attorney, and the meeting was therefore adjourned for a week.

A quarter of the shares of the Standard Oil Company are owned by Mr. J. D. Rockefeller, and the dividends which he realized during the last eight years amounted to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

THE FRENCH IN MOROCCO.

London, September 23.

From Casablanca comes news that in consequence of the non-arrival of the tribesmen to sue for peace the French advanced during the night and after sharp fighting burned the Arab camp and the village of Sididrahim. The French losses were trifling.

THE CANADIAN QUESTION.

The Times declares that the empire will require the Canadian Government to secure prompt and effective justice by way of reparation to the Japanese and the speedy punishment of their assailants. The Imperial Government cannot permit the treaty rights of our Allies to be trampled on by mob violence.

THE HAGUE.

At a plenary sitting of the Peace Conference, the members expressed recognition of the Tsar's services to humanity.

Mr. Tsuzuki said that Japan desired to endorse every word that had been said and to express in warmest terms their appreciation of the Tsar's contribution to the peace of the world.

The proposed international prize court was adopted by a vote of 30 to 2. Japan, Russia and Turkey abstained.

JAPANESE EXPELLED FROM THE KLONDYKE.

New York telegraphs that a number of Japanese miners have been expelled from the Yukon district by white miners. They were taken by steamer to the White Horse rapids and thence will be sent to Skagway, in the U.S., where they will be turned loose. The Japanese are reported to be almost destitute.

MORE WAR-TALK IN AMERICA.

The American newspapers have restarted the discussion of the question of serious trouble with Japan. Mr. Hearst, in the Evening Journal says that it is probable that Japan wants war. The New York Times publishes a suggestion that Admiral Evans' fleet should go to Tokyo Bay and invite Count Okuma to inspect it.

The Times correspondent ridicules the childishness of the ideas put forward or that Japan is ignorant of American resources.

ASIATIC LABOUR IN AMERICA.

San Francisco, September 22.

Having been menaced by three hundred white workmen at a mine in British Columbia, fifty-seven Japanese employed there were compelled to leave their work.

A large number of workmen have held a meeting at Winnipeg and asked, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Canadian Premier, to abrogate the Japanese-Canadian Treaty. The Premier gave no reply and the workmen then passed a resolution that the admission of low class labourers into the country originated in the treacherous schemes of the capitalists who wished to have cheap labour, and the coming of such labourers from any country must be stopped.

The workmen of Oregon are appointing a committee to make preparations for an anti Japanese meeting in the near future.

According to a report by Mr. Sargent, the American Inspector General for Immigration Affairs, the number of Japanese coming into America has considerably decreased. Through the efforts of guards on the frontiers, also, the number of Japanese entering America from the two neighbouring countries has also been reduced.

Later.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has replied to the mass meeting of labourers who asked him to abrogate the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. The Premier refers to the fact that the treaty was concluded mutually by the two nations. The meeting had contended that the recent trouble was created through the gradual increase of the Japanese in British Columbia. Yet there was doubt whether the disturbances were caused in consequence of the Japanese only, although the trouble was of a serious nature. According to a report by the Mayor of Vancouver, the demonstration was made against Asiatics in general and not only the Japanese. Under the circumstances any extreme measure must be avoided. The Premier concluded that before the occurrence of the recent tumult, the Government had found it necessary to investigate the reason for Japanese entering Canada at present.

The Globe, an organ of the Canadian Government, says that the Government will not abrogate the Japanese-Canadian treaty and will admit Japanese on the ground that any step against them will be detrimental to the trade between Japan and Canada, which is commencing to develop. In future, if numerous Japanese continue to enter Canada, and if the Government finds it necessary to abrogate the treaty as the result of an enormous increase in their number, the Government will take definite steps in the matter.

RUSSIA AND COALING STATIONS.

With regard to a rumour that Russia intends to establish a coaling station in the neighbourhood of the Panama Isthmus, the American Government has no definite report.

The authorities are reported to have said that all the European Powers seem to be desirous of securing coaling stations in the neighbourhood of Panama and this wish seems to be reasonable. America has no objection to the establishment of coaling stations: she has one herself at Nagasaki.

RUSSIAN ELECTIONS.

St. Petersburg, September 24.

The electors continue to show extraordinary apathy, which is in consequence of their distrust of the new electoral law and the repeated dissolutions of the Duma.

GENERAL LINEVITCH ON JAPANESE-AMERICAN RELATIONS.

San Francisco, September 24.

In an interview, at St. Petersburg, with an American journalist, General Linevitch, who was commander-in-chief of the Manchurian Army at the close of the Russo-Japanese war, said that America has made two errors in her policy. In the first place during the war she rendered assistance to Japan, and, secondly, she exerted herself to restore peace earlier than was expected. Russia was endeavouring to extend her influence in the Orient; but the steps taken by her were not injurious to America, who merely desired the development of her commerce. Russia was not a rival of America in trade. If Russia had been successful in the war, she would have weakened Japanese commerce and crippled a powerful rival of America on the Pacific. Yet America gave every possible assistance to Japan, thus contributing to the latter's success. Japan realized excellent results from the war and she now classifies herself among the great Powers. But in spite of the benevolent attitude adopted by America during the war, Japan is now threatening the prestige of America on the Pacific. If the admission of Japanese to America is permitted, they will enter the country in unlimited numbers and will occupy every place to the exclusion of the whites. Of course the American Government is able to effect the expulsion of the Japanese. That policy, however, would create a serious result in international politics. If any danger to the interests of Japanese in America is caused by the Federal Government or provincial authorities, or private citizens, war will be unavoidable between the two countries. In the event of war, the loss to America will be heavy. The abandonment of the Philippines may be unavoidable. Many Japanese statesmen and politicians are of the opinion that the Japanese people are not suited to found colonies in a hot climate. This is merely to conceal their ambition. In case of the rupture of friendly relations between the two countries, Japan will attack the Pacific coasts and not merely the Philippines. America is not to be regarded as a match for Japan, and perhaps the former will be sorry over its results. America seems to be relying too much on her naval strength. She has a sufficient number of splendid modern warships and her bluejackets are as patriotic as the Japanese. But she is not yet a match for Japan. Training and practical experience are needed. The Japanese navy may stand up against that of any Power in the world. The Japanese are expert torpedoists and will employ submarines largely in the future. Nothing need be said about the American Army, as the training of the American soldier is inferior. America could supply a sufficient number of patriotic soldiers should war be found necessary, but more than that was needed to carry on war.

RUSSIAN FISHERIES.

London, September 26.

The Novoye Vremya points out that the Russo-Japanese Fisheries Convention does not affect the situation greatly as the Japanese were formerly able, with the connivance of the Russians, to exert full sway in the fisheries. The convention, however, is favourable to Russia, by excluding the Japanese from all estuaries and from 38 bays.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

The tenor of the Anglo-Russian agreement has been communicated to the Persian parliament.

The Times says that if the Convention is loyally carried out it should remove past antagonism.

WU TING-FANG.

The reappointment of Wu Ting-fang, the popular Chinese Minister to Washington, is everywhere welcomed. The New York Herald declares that Americans have no spite against him for organising the recent boycott of American goods.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE)

KING EDWARD'S COMPLIMENTS.

The King of England, through the Japanese Embassy in London, has sent congratulations to Count Hayashi on the latter's elevation to the rank of Count.

MUKDEN AFFAIRS.

With regard to the injuries inflicted on Japanese subjects in Mukden by the Chinese police and soldiers, the Viceroy has inflicted punishment on the responsible parties and is inquiring into the amount of compensation to be paid. His Excellency has also given assurances that nothing of the kind shall occur again. Moreover, a conspicuous reform has been effected by employing Japanese gendarmes at the Police Station for the purpose of training the Chinese constables. The Viceroy has further issued to the police a memorandum of 11 articles, impressing upon them the necessity of treating foreigners properly. The memorandum enjoins that even if a person is detected in flagrante delicto he must not be roughly apprehended. Finally, until after 10 p.m. the police are to carry staves only and not side-arms.

A RISING.

There is no news of the disturbance at Fangcheng. One report has it that an epidemic prevails among the Government's troops and that they are not sufficiently united to make head against the insurgents. The latter are said to have established communications with the rebels on the French frontier of Tongking. Another report speaks of a great victory won by the Government troops and of the rebels being much weakened. It is finally alleged that Liu (former chief of the Black Flags in Formosa) has offered to raise a force for subduing the insurgents.

TRADE OF YOKOHAMA.

Mr. Acting Consul-General Hobart Hampden reports that the value of Yokohama's foreign trade for the year 1906 according to the customs returns was £35,720,771, a total surpassing the record figures of the previous year by £1,594,139. Imports, no longer feeling the stimulus of the war, declined to £15,217,598, but, on the other hand, exports reached the unprecedented figures of £20,503,173, an excess over imports of £5,285,575. The year 1906 was also remarkable for the total trade of Japan, showing for the first time since 1895 an excess of exports amounting to £507,434. The customs figures do not, however, include direct Government purchases abroad.

RELATIVE IMPORTANCE OF PORTS.—The three leading ports of the Empire are Yokohama, Kobe and Osaka. Yokohama occupies the premier position, more particularly in the matter of exports, and the volume of its trade, outward and inward combined, exceeded that of Kobe in 1906 by over £4,800,000. As a result of the political and other events of the past decade, Japan's commercial interests are largely extending southward through China, westward through Korea and Manchuria, and northward to Siberia and Saghalien. Her commercial centre of gravity has not, however, so far shifted. The three great ports above-mentioned, though not geographically in closest proximity to these regions, in 1906 dealt with seven-eighths of the country's exports, as they did in 1903 and in 1896. That the course of events is infusing new life and activity into the extremities of the Empire is indicated by the rise in the value of exports from all other ports of Japan combined. The value in 1896 was about £1,500,000, in 1903 it had risen to nearly £3,500,000 and in 1906 to the considerable sum of £5,348,346.

IMPORTS.

The value of the Yokohama import trade in 1906 was £4,047,202 less than in 1905, but surpassed previous returns. The decrease is partly accounted for by large stocks carried forward, as of rice and raw cotton, which fell off £1,145,212 and £528,223 respectively.

COTTON IMPORTS.—The accumulation of stocks caused the import of raw cotton to decline from 27,894 tons, with a value of £1,463,655 in 1905, to 18,097 tons, valued at £935,432 in 1906. More than half the quantity taken by all Japan came from British India.

WOOLLEN IMPORTS.—The import of raw wool (7,967,541 lbs., value £649,867), though higher in value, shows a falling-off in quantity, which is probably due to the lessened demand for Government purposes, as, from information received, it appears that there is an increasing consumption by the factories manufacturing goods for the general trade. Imports of "tops" show an increase, most probably due to the increased production of Japan-woven mouselines.

MACHINERY.—The import of machinery in 1905, value £951,354, was phenomenal, and was specially remarkable for the increases in electric motors and machine tools. In the latter item the high figures were fairly maintained, but electric motors declined, and the total for machinery during 1906 fell to £818,509, which figures are nevertheless far above those of years prior to 1905. Spinning machines advanced from £38,293 to £67,840.

EXPORTS.

The year 1906 was one of exceptional prosperity for Japan's outward trade. Practically every heading of exports from Yokohama, except tea (£113,374), drugs (£51,108) and chipboard (£59,710) contributed its quota large or small to the year's increase of £5,641,341, but the sum of the increases of £3,839,935 in raw and waste silk, £574,906 in silk manufactures, £459,031 in metals, and £346,508 in refined sugar accounts for 93 per cent. of this total. The advance for all Japan exports to Asiatic countries was over 21 per cent.; to America, 34 per cent., Asia absorbing 46.7 per cent. of the total exportation.

SILK EXPORTS.—Raw and waste silk was exported to a value of £11,792,763, manufactured silks of £4,070,172, together £15,862,935. Silk exports thus represented 77 per cent. of Yokohama's total exports for 1906 and exceeded that total for 1905 by just over £1,000,000—a fact which illustrates the paramount importance of this branch of Japan's export trade. The ratio of silk to total exports has been fairly constant during the last 10 years, viz., 78, 75, 80, 74, 80, 81, 76, 80, 76, and 77 per cent.

TEA EXPORTS.—Speaking generally, the quality of Japan teas shows signs of deteriorating rather than of improving, and more attention is being paid to the production of ordinary, as distinct from choice, grades. During 1906 prices were slightly higher than in the previous year, but not materially so. Home consumption has increased considerably, and the export from Yokohama was 19,182,425 lbs., valued at £569,864—a decrease of 3,084,608 lbs. and £113,374. However, the balance was redressed by the direct export from Shimidzu, the port of Shidzuoka, and there was a moderate increase in the export from Japan as a whole. The native fring is rapidly growing, and it is certain that the tendency is to fire more teas up country. It even looks as if the centre of the trade might be eventually shifted to Shidzuoka—this, of course, would be much to the disadvantage of foreign firms who have their plant in Yokohama. New markets are being sought, and the Central Tea Guild is said to be trying to introduce black tea into Russia; but it will no doubt be some time before there is any appreciable result.

COTTON EXPORTS.—Japanese cotton exports have probably a future before them. They already represent a respectable sum—in 1906, £159,324—and each year showed a steady advance. The market for yarns is practically far Eastern, especially Chinese, but issues are exported in small quantities to Europe, America, and Australia.

SUGAR EXPORTS.—The total value of sugar exports was £412,266, against £60,886 for 1905, the principal markets being China, Manchuria and Korea. Every encouragement is being given to native refineries. The revised law in force for two years from April 1, 1907, allows to licensed refiners a rebate varying from 25. 11½ d. to 35. 11½ d. per picul (133½ lbs.) on the amount of raw sugar imported to be refined in Japan for domestic consumption, less such amount as fails to reach Dutch Standard No. 15, and a rebate varying from 35. 4½ d. to 45. 7d. per picul on similar sugar re-exported.

DISTRIBUTION OF TRADE.

As was to be expected in a year of restricted importation, few countries show an increased import. France and Italy are to be credited with a slight gain; the Dutch Indies with a large one of £337,976, for which sugar and raw cotton are responsible. Canada is the only British possession to show an advance, for which flour partly accounts. Imports from the British Empire receded by £1,928,668, the most considerable decrease from particular countries being £1,065,615 from India, £703,609 from the United Kingdom, £333,182 from Germany, and £1,890,010 from the United States. The largest increase in exportation amounted to £571,005 to the United Kingdom, £468,819 to China, £1,186,022 to France, £565,187 to Italy, and £2,718,917, to the United States. On the other hand, the only falling-off in exports from Yokohama stands against Hongkong, but from the whole of Japan Hongkong took over £700,000 worth more than in 1905.

The imagination is somewhat startled by the observation that Yokohama's export to the United States exceeds that port's total trade with the British Empire by £2,153,974; but this is merely a striking instance of the danger of generalising from the figures of a particular district. In point of fact, the trade of Japan as a whole with the British Empire in 1906 exceeded her exports to the United States by no less than £11,854,330, while the imports from the United Kingdom alone fell short of the exports to the United States by little over £2,500,000.

TRADE OPENINGS.

There do not appear to be any trade openings of an encouraging nature to report. Japan is at present averse from widening openings for foreign imports. Aided by a high statutory tariff, once more raised from October 1, 1906, designed primarily for revenue purposes, but also designedly protective, she aims on the one hand at cutting down her bill for imports, which, in the year under review, were, according to the customs figures, exceeded by exports; and, on the other hand, at becoming not only her own supplier of manufactures, but also in an increasing degree the supplies of the markets of the Far East. Her efforts in this direction are being attended with success. In 1896 her exports to China were worth £1,470,236, to Korea, £332,078, to Siam £1,045; in 1905, to China £10,075,789, to Korea £2,717,343, to Siam £10,549; in 1907, to China £12,023,327, to Korea £2,573,500, and to Siam £24,027. If, however, there has been a desire to restrict foreign purchases, there has during 1906 been a liberal tendency on the part of Japanese to invite the co-operation of foreign capitalists in large enterprises for the exploitation of the natural resources of Japan and the development of her industries. At the present period of post-bellum restlessness, excessive speculation and company promoting, prudence is necessary; but if there is a disposition to narrow the avenues of approach for imports there may perhaps, in a few directions and in individual instances, be some room for a cautious participation of British energy in the growing industrial activities of the country. Still at best profitable occasions can only be rare, and the present attitude of welcome may prove to be only a passing phase.

SHIPPING AND NAVIGATION.

Of Yokohama's exports during 1906, 38.5 per cent. were carried in British, 25.5 per cent. in native bottoms; and of imports 53.6 per cent. in British, and 15 per cent. in native bottoms. The total number, 1,107, and tonnage, 3,262,442 tons, of vessels entered in 1906 show a net decrease on the previous years of 276 vessels and 295,994 tons. British shipping, with 458 vessels and 1,299,841 tons, shows a falling-off of 375 vessels and 800,125 tons. These figures indicate a reversion to normal conditions after the war, for, omitting from consideration vessels under Japanese charter, the decrease as compared with 1905 was 113 vessels and 303,364 tons, but there was an increase as compared with 1903, the year preceding the war, of 2 vessels and 42,450 tons.

The decrease under the Norwegian and German flags is mainly attributable to the discontinuance of native charters, the latter indeed showing a marked advance of 59 vessels and 150,723 tons on the figure of 1903. Japanese tonnage engaged in foreign trade showed a recovery of 467,944 tons and 226 vessels from the low figures of 1205. The war with Russia, like that with China, has been directly responsible for a considerable expansion of the Japanese mercantile marine.

GENERAL REMARKS.

Direct trade continues to increase, but it is still generally the safer policy to act through a British agent on the spot. Personal relations are especially important as a preliminary to dealings with Government departments, dockyards, &c. Foreign merchants are becoming more and more general merchants, dealing in a wider variety of goods than formerly. Most of the big British firms, whose names may be ascertained at the Commercial Intelligence Branch of the Board of Trade, have a London office, where first inquiries might often be addressed with advantage. It is satisfactory to note the more numerous visit of commercial travellers.

A hint or two may be hazarded for the consideration of local firms. Would not exporters of silk, tea, &c., do well to show a somewhat readier disposition to carry their operations away from the ports into the interior, and establish branches in the producing districts thus getting into directer and cheaper relations with the producer? Again, might not juniors be encouraged to take up the language seriously? Without any intention to depreciate the often loyal services of the banto (native clerk), it may be suggested that he is sometimes rather an expensive middleman than an employé, and that he would be better for the effective control of an assistant of the firm who speaks the language. Good material is to be found in the persons of those born and bred in Japan, and, to a certain extent, knowledge of the colloquial language is already recognised by employers as a qualification for employment.

"ISRAEL IN EUROPE."

What is to be the ultimate fate of the alien Hebrew race, colonised or scattered among the peoples of Europe? The latest historian of the Jews, Mr. G. F. Abbott, regards the question as one in comparison with which "the Eastern, the Irish, and all other vexed questions are but things of yesterday." How would the Jew himself choose to answer it, if in clearly-defined terms he should proclaim his ideal? The Gentile knows that he has the Hebrew always with him, never of him; that he remains among the nations "in many respects as Oriental" as in Patriarchal days.

The race was venerable even when it appeared on the platform of Europe. The Jews were "too old for assimilation, too strong for extermination, too hardened in their peculiar cult for propagandism." Already they had shown that, in contact with other races, they were as oil with water—enjoying the oil-like quality of keeping on the surface and defying the power of mere bulk. Favoured in their own land by the wisdom of Alexander, they had prospered under his successors, the Ptolemies, in Palestine and Egypt, and had rejected the Hellenic cult of their later oppressors, the Seleucids. For while Greeks and Latins accepted each other's pagan philosophies, the Jews stood aloof, jealously guarding their Jehovah as the God of a nation, not of mankind; an attitude they were to maintain through the succeeding centuries, even in view of the proselytising magnetism of Christianity and Islam.

Mr. Abbott surveys the general condition of the Jews in the Roman Empire, when persecution drove them to the retaliatory outbreaks culminating in the Fall of Jerusalem, and continued rebellion led to their destruction as a nation, their survival as a sect, and their dispersal among the peoples of the earth. Obsolete in their self-centred aloofness, they rapidly established their colonies, always more or less segregated, from Eastern to Western Europe, and by the practice of thrift, industry, and rare talent, commanded success as traders, artificers, and even as agriculturists, wherever they were suffered to remain. During the Middle Ages, periods of respite alternated with periods of persecution and massacre; while the Christian Church held it a godly thing to oppress "the Lord's people" when they did not make use of their arts and medical skill or their resources in usury. As determined to rebuff conciliation as their Christian neighbours were slow to offer it, the Hebrew aliens of Europe settled in communities apart, the victims of outrageous laws and rancorous hostility for the greater part, though sometimes, as in Mahometan Spain, treated with consideration and allowed to prosper. Their literature possessed a rare quality; they produced great artists, great musicians, great teachers and philosophers. At the close of the eighteenth century, when the Encyclopædists proclaimed the reign of Reason and a doctrine of universal equality based on purely worldly considerations, the sentiment of Western Europe had reached the point of toleration; and in its countries the Jew, politically, if not actually, entered into his own as sharer in the rights of citizenship and of religious liberty.

"Israel wasted no time in turning to excellent account the bitterly-learned lessons of experience. The persecution of ages had weeded the race of weaklings. None survived but the fittest."

The Western Jews, after training of eighteen hundred years in the best of schools—the school of adversity—came forth fully equipped with endowments which enabled them, as soon as the chance offered, to conquer a foremost place among the peoples of the world.

In Eastern Europe their case has been different; and Mr. Abbott's chapters on the treatment of Hebrew aliens in Russia and Roumania bring the blood-stained chronicle up to date. Its most recent horrors are fresh in our minds, and may be examined in the light of unbiased testimony. Whether Mr. Abbott's own chronicle is at all points entirely devoid of partisanship, his readers will decide according to their acceptance or rejection of his point of view. No part of his book, which is everywhere workmanlike in its manner of marshalling and elucidating facts, is more full of interest than his review of the history of the Jews in England. The position among our overcrowded population of the "Ghetto" dwellers is even now a subject of controversy; and has led to the favourable attitude of some official and other critics towards the East African project alluded to in Mr. Abbott's excellent account of "Zionism." But no Englishman refuses respect and admiration to those foremost intellects among the race-despised race who have achieved eminence in art, letters, and science; and, so doing, have added to the dignity of the nation which has offered to the homeless people a safe and free abiding-place.

Regarded politically, the race can advance the profound claim on our sympathy expressed years ago by Mr. Chamberlain. The Jews, he declared, "while preserving with extraordinary tenacity their national characteristics and the tenets of their religion, have been among the most loyal subjects of the States in which they have found a home, and the impolicy of persecution in such a case is almost greater than its cruelty."

Mr. Abbott has a good equipment for the work of a popular historian. He writes a clear and often picturesque style, well under control; he can be eloquent, and he can be tersely and effectively descriptive. He does not offer his book as an original study; but it is not merely a compilation; its handling of material is both able and judicious. The book, if read with the sympathy it deserves to arouse, will certainly help forward the Hebrew cause, as a factor in national political and social economy; and we would draw our readers' attention to the author's careful examination of the charges brought against the Jew by his detractors. Messrs. Macmillan and Co. are the publishers of the volume.—The Globe.

BABY RAW WITH AWFUL ECZEMA

Running Humour from Birth—Face a Sickening Slight—Worn to a Shadow—People Said, "How Can You Wish Him to Live?"

USE OF CUTICURA HAS A MARVELOUS RESULT

"My husband and I thought you would like to know what the Cuticura Remedies have done for our baby boy. He had running eczema from birth. It developed itself after the first month. The poor little fellow's head was quite raw, his face was a sickening sight, and the dreadful humour would soak his pillow through in a single night. It wore him to a shadow. People who saw him said, 'How can you wish him to live?' Two doctors saw him; one recommended Cuticura Remedies, but could do little else for him, for it was so obstinate. We tried several remedies, in fact everything we could think of and were told off. At last we got Cuticura Ointment, and together with the Cuticura Soap the result was marvelous, for I have not finished one box and the skin is now perfectly clear. It has all dried up and his hair is growing wonderfully, and instead of sleepless nights he has the proper sound sleep. Mrs. O. Baker, 28, Victoria Road, Mlandford, Dorset, March 12, 1906."

KOREA.

Friday, September 27.

Mr. Matsui, Chief of the Bureau of Police in Korea, is quoted as very strongly urging the necessity of a thorough reform in the organisation of the police of Korea. The constables are at present so poorly paid and such ignorant men that they fail altogether to win any respect from the people. There are further four different kinds of police in the present organisation, and as they do not fully co-operate, their incompetence becomes more marked. Mr. Matsui declines to recognise the Korean constables as being of any real use in preserving peace and good order. There are 2,500 of them in the Peninsula, but he omits them altogether from the account and takes note of the Japanese only, who number 572. Assuming the population to be 9,280,000, it follows that there is one Japanese constable to every 17,000 people, whereas in Japan the ratio is one to every 1,300. As to the remedy for this state of affairs, Mr. Matsui refrains from making any clear statement, but we gather that his idea is to remodel the force completely and to place it entirely under Japanese control.

Reports continue to arrive of disturbances in the provinces. The insurgents have achieved the feat of murdering a Japanese postman and stealing his mails. One interesting incident is reported from Ansong. There on the 24th inst. a fight took place between two bodies of the insurgents themselves. One body consisting of some 50 men, arrived at the place first, and were apparently planning some attack upon Japanese tradesmen, when another body, said to have consisted of 150 men, made their appearance, and peremptorily informed the first body that there must be nothing in the shape of killing peaceful Japanese traders or settlers inasmuch as such conduct was unworthy of the name they bore (Wypyong, which means loyal army.) They called upon the first body to place themselves under their command, but this order was not obeyed and finally a conflict ensued in which the smaller party was completely routed with heavy loss.

We read in the Mainichi Dempo's telegraphic correspondence from Seoul that the headquarters of the insurgents are now at two places in the north of the province of Kyongsan-do, namely Munkyoung and Andong. The force assembled there is said to number from 1500 to 2,000 men. They are fully organised, call themselves Wypyong, and perform reconnaissances and other military duties, including the requisitioning of food stuffs, in a most orderly manner. Their positions are well chosen as menacing the Seoul-Fusan Railway, and being thoroughly acquainted with the topography of the region they are very difficult to get at. One party of them, consisting of 200 men, was attacked by a Japanese detachment under Captain Nakahara on the 21st inst. and was dispersed with a loss of 20 men. But that blow has not sensibly weakened them, and we gather from this correspondence that an expedition of some magnitude will have to be directed against them.

Saturday, September 28.

It is stated that the Il Chinghoi proposed to organise a body of men for the purpose of co-operating with the Japanese troops, but the latter, judging that their movements would rather be impeded than promoted by such assistance, declined the offer.

News comes from Gensan that the Imperial rescript ordering the abolition of the top-knot is greatly resented in that region and threatens to cause disturbance. We are still perplexed as to the reason for issuing such an order and we are confident that the Japanese had nothing to do with it. They are not likely to have forgotten in Korea's case the wise impulses that guided them at the time of the Restoration in their own country. A similar order, issued in the days of the Tai-won-kun, proved similarly mischievous, and it was on that occasion explicitly denied that the Japanese had in any way suggested the veto. People may well be left to dress their hair in any way that pleases them. It is fatuous to regard such things as at all essentials of civilization.

Sunday, September 29.

There is absolutely no news from Korea this morning, a very novel fact, and one which we presume may be interpreted in a favourable light.

Monday, September 30.

The Korean Cabinet is said to have unanimously decided that the Court must be asked to limit the visits paid to each other by the ex-Emperor and the reigning Sovereign to one a week. As things stand at present, the ex-Emperor is the real centre of authority, and the reforms contemplated in the Court are rendered abortive. It must be confessed that this feature of the situation in Korea is extremely delicate. Many people will sympathise with the ex-Emperor on the ground that it is unnatural and inhuman to forbid perfect freedom of intercourse between a father and his son. In such matters there ought to be no outside pressure of any kind, and one can not help thinking that if any hard and fast rule be laid down for separating the palaces, a seemingly valid pretext will be supplied to the critics. One imagines that there ought to be some way of checkmating the interference of the ex-Emperor in administrative affairs without setting bounds to the liberty of his intercourse with his own family.

Great preparations are being made in Seoul for the reception of the Japanese Prince Imperial who is expected to arrive there on the 16th inst. According to the original idea, one of the Korean Palaces was to have been placed at the disposal of the Prince, but it has now been decided that he will stay at the Residency General. We observe that by those who can not possibly detect anything but evil in every act of Japan's, this visit of the Prince Imperial is denounced in unmeasured terms as not only unnecessary but also concealing some sinister design. Such comments are too obviously prejudiced to be refuted.

Tuesday, October 1.

There was a bad railway accident on the Seoul-Fusan line on the afternoon of the 29th ultimo. Four carriages were upset and among its occupants 30 Japanese soldiers, 3 Japanese civilians and 9 Koreans were injured, five of the Koreans fatally. The train had 186 inmates and among them happily was a doctor so that medical assistance was at once available. This happened between two places called Cheungyak and Thaichon in the province of Chhungchihong-do. The misfortune is believed not to have been a mere accident but to have been caused by some obstruction purposely placed upon the line, though whether this was done by insurgents or by the people out of pure mischief there is as yet no evidence.

The Hochi Shimbun's Seoul correspondent quotes a military officer as declaring that the back of the rebellion has been broken. There are still some unruly elements in the districts about Chholwon, Hungju and Seoul, but it may be said that the fire has been reduced to very small dimensions. The whole of the operations have been carried out by two regiments of Japanese on a peace footing. From the beginning of the trouble the insurgents have had 800 killed and probably several thousands wounded, while on the Japanese side the casualties have been 15 killed and 40 wounded.

On the 27th ultimo the Japanese troops got into touch with two bodies of insurgents and routed them with very heavy loss. The first engagement was at Chholwon, mentioned above. Here the insurgents numbered 250 and lost 80 of that total. The second fight was at a place called Yaju, and out of 200 insurgents 50 were shot down. Such drastic lessons must soon produce a sensible effect.

Thursday, October 3.

There is not a word from Korea this morning about the insurgents. We infer either that they have been completely quelled or that some measure is in process for their final discomfiture. Public attention seems to be engrossed with preparations for the visit of the Japanese Prince Imperial, and Prince Ito was to enter Seoul on the forenoon of the 3rd inst.

MANCHURIA.

The Chinese troops have renewed their violent proceedings, this time at Kwangchentsz. On the afternoon of the 22nd inst. several soldiers made their way into a Japanese restaurant, and set to work practically to wreck the place. Thereupon some Japanese police hastened to the scene, arrested two of the soldiers and took them to the Consulate. When this news reached the barracks a number of soldiers conducted by officers, repaired to the Consulate and attempted to rescue their comrades. A collision is said to have occurred between them and the Japanese police, but it can not have been of a very serious nature for no casualties are reported. The soldiers failed to effect their object, and subsequently turned their wrath against the Chinese police, whom they accused of supineness in suffering the arrest of two Chinese military men by the Japanese police. They treated the police so roughly that the latter went on strike en masse and Kwangchentsz is now without any constables on duty.

The Governor-General of Kwantung and Baron Goto have arrived at Shimonoeki en route for Tokyo. They appear to have timed their visit so as to be able to meet Prince Ito as he passes Bakan. Baron Goto explains that the adoption of a uniform gold currency throughout Manchuria will greatly facilitate commercial operations, there being at present several kinds of Japanese banknotes in circulation. Of course this step refers to the railway only, no other part of the country being within Japanese financial control. Baron Goto recognises that the Chinese will not be pleased with the proposed change, but he considers that if the proper discount be allowed, no serious objection will arise. Speaking of the railway, Baron Goto says that the work of reconstruction is going on rapidly. As to the railway traffic he observes that the effect of the new arrangements as to duties has been to increase the quantity of goods coming to Manchuria through Russian territory and there is a corresponding augmentation of transport on the railway.

Baron Goto is represented as saying that Viceroy Hsu is expected to resign the Viceroyalty of Manchuria on his arrival in Peking. The Baron speaks of him personally in terms of high praise, and rejects the theory that he is anti-Japanese. But the fact is that in the present temper of China every high official must wear an anti-Japanese mask, whether it fits him or not, and Viceroy Hsu has merely fallen in with the fashion.

The military and civil authorities at Kwanchengtsz have offered due apologies for the disorderly conduct of the Chinese soldiers, have given an engagement that nothing of the sort shall occur again and have agreed to indemnify the Japanese sufferers. This affair is therefore settled.

Mr. Consul-General Hagiwara is said to have suggested to Mr. Tang Shaoh, Governor of Mukden, who is probably exercising vice-regal functions in the absence of his Excellency Mr. Hsu, that the despatch of any considerable body of Chinese soldiers to Chientao might possibly provoke collisions between them and the Japanese gendarmes, and that it would therefore be advisable to refrain from taking such a step. Mr. Tang is said to have endorsed the wisdom of this protest.

Baron Goto has just arrived in Tokyo and has been speaking about the Manchuria Railway. It appears that the railway authorities recently reduced by $4\frac{1}{4}$ yen per ton the freight rate on goods from Mukden to Newchwang. This step had given rise to rumours that the rails leading to Tairen were rusting for want of traffic and that the Company was in a manner compelled to make the above large concession in the Newchwang direction. Baron Goto denies the truth of that version. He explains that the Japanese railway has a powerful competitor in the Chinese line running from Mukden to Newchwang via Hsinmuntun. Thus even when the above reduction is made the rate on the Chinese line remains 1.80 yen cheaper than that on the Japanese line, and it has to be seen whether the latter will not have to make a further concession. Another point discussed by the Baron had reference to the rumours now circulating that the comparatively small earnings of the line at present are due to defective exploitation. That is not the case. It is, according to the Baron, entirely a question of season. It is true that a railway which must yield a daily return of 20,000 yen in order to pay, is now yielding only 14 or 15 thousand. But that is entirely because this is not the time for any large movement of merchandise or produce. The Baron expects that very soon the line will show a return of 30,000 yen daily. With regard to the political wisdom of having sold the Mukden-Hsinmuntun Railway to China, Baron Goto declined to speak, but he admitted very freely that this was responsible for the competition now going on. Competition, however, is the mother of progress, and the Baron welcomed it in Manchuria. The Chinese railway, inter-mural and extra-mural, is under the management of thoroughly competent and experienced English engineers, and the management of the Japanese road could not fail to improve in the presence of such a competitor. Speaking of the Changchun-Kilin Railway, the Baron said that the work of survey would be commenced immediately after the reaping of the millet crop. By this month next year the building of the Changchun station would be completed, and by that time doubtless everything would be ready for commencing work on the Changchun-Kilin line. The Baron added that the reconstruction works on the main line had been somewhat interrupted by floods, but that on the whole they would be finished at about the time originally indicated. One specially interesting fact stated by the Baron was that it will take six years to bring the Fushun coal mine into full working order. The output of coal will then be 3,000 tons daily. At present it is only 600 tons, one half of which is needed for the locomotives and the remainder is sold at 6 yen a ton.

The Mainichi Dempo's Peking correspondent wires what professes to be a statement of the representations made to the Throne by Viceroy Hsu on the occasion of his recent audience. The Viceroy is said to have pleaded four things; the first was that he was insufficiently supplied with funds; the second, that the questions under discussion present many difficulties; the third, that he has no military strength at his disposal; and the fourth, that the local administration is beset with obstacles. His Excellency is further said to have alleged that whereas the Japanese can and do make a parade of force in conducting negotiations, the Chinese have only peaceful arguments to offer. This last point was particularly emphasised by the Viceroy as the most embarrassing of all, and he concluded by declaring himself unable to discharge his duties at Mukden satisfactorily.

In connexion with the above it is rumoured that Viceroy Hsu will be appointed Minister of Home Affairs and that the former Governor General Chao will be again sent to Mukden as Viceroy. Other telegrams, however, allege that so soon as Viceroy Hsu's business in Peking is completed, he will return to Manchuria to resume his vice-regal duties there. But the balance of opinion seems to be in favour of his remaining in Peking. To us it does not appear that a high official is likely to return to a post concerning which he has made such representations as those attributed to Hsu. Possibly, however, the story describing what passed at the audience is apocryphal.

With reference to these negotiations between China and Japan, it must always be remembered that China is the complainant in most cases. It is indeed from Japan that the protest comes about the fishery outrage, but with that one exception what is happening is that China seeks to deprive Japan of rights which the latter claims to have acquired plainly by treaty. At present there is no apparent prospect of a settlement. Viceroy Hsu went so far as to agree to an arrangement in the case of two of the questions in dispute, namely, the fishery complication and the problem of ownership in the case of the mines along the Mukden-Antung Railway. But he failed to obtain Peking's endorsement in these matters, and if he be replaced at Mukden by his predecessor, Chao, a satisfactory settlement will probably be further off than ever. However, Japan is not in any pressing hurry.

Mr. Hayashi, Japanese Representative in Peking, left Osaka for his post on the 3rd inst. Before his departure he made some very pertinent remarks to the business men of that place. He is reported to have dwelt with much insistence on the vital necessity of developing trade between Japan and China, and to have pointed out that Osaka constitutes the centre of such trade. He complained, however, in very strong terms that, so far as he could see, the Japanese merchants were not taking steps to equip themselves for the part they had to act in developing this commerce. His residence in China had shown him that scarcely any of the Japanese who had settled in that country are qualified for intercourse with the upper classes. Want of familiarity with the language of the country and ignorance of its conditions handicapped them fatally. He therefore urged the Osaka merchants to take timely steps so that the opportunities offering to them almost at their very doors should not be lost by want of education and research.

MEDICAL DIPLOMAS.

A curious question is under discussion in Tokyo. It is of course essential that foreign medical men who desire to obtain permission to practise their profession in Japan, should satisfy the Japanese authorities of their competence. This is effected by means of an examination. Any foreigner who wishes to engage in medical work in Japan has to present himself on a fixed day at the Department of Home Affairs and there write answers to a number of questions propounded by a Japanese medical board. In what language should these answers be written? That is the subject of discussion at present. It appears that a certain citizen of the United States, who recently went up for his examination, wrote his answers in English and duly obtained permission to practise. When this fact became known in medical circles, it gave rise to much comment, the contention being that such an examination should properly be conducted in the language of the country where it is held and where the license to practise has validity. This view can not be denied. It is not conceivable that a medical man undergoing a similar test in France, for example, would be allowed to write his papers in German, English, Russian, or any foreign tongue that pleased him. On the other hand, there is the fact that if the Japanese language were made compulsory in such cases, the rule would be practically prohibitory, since to obtain in the Japanese language proficiency sufficient for this purpose would be about as difficult as to master three or four of the least used languages of Europe. Mr. Tadokoro, of the Department of Education, speaking through the columns of the Fiji and the Asahi, explains the position taken by the Board of Examination. The gist of his statement is that Japan ought to be proud of being competent to allow this freedom of choice to candidates for examination. There was a time when she could not have done so; a time when her own knowledge of foreign languages was too immature to permit anything of the sort. But happily she can now furnish examiners well enough equipped in English, German and French, at all events, to compose and read examination papers in any of those languages. If it came to Russian or Spanish, for example, Mr. Tadokoro does not undertake to say what the examiners would do, and that is just the weak point of his apologia. For a Russian, a Spaniard or a Greek might fairly protest that there is no valid reason for discriminating against him in the application of such a privilege. We greatly admire the broad and liberal view taken by the Board of Examiners in this matter, but we can not fail to see that they may find themselves landed in a dilemma one of these days.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN "ENTENTE."

The telegrams indicate that British public opinion is much gratified by the contents of the Anglo-Russian Entente. Some regret is expressed that Ispahan and other parts of northern Persia are definitely recognised as falling within Russia's sphere of influence, but, on the other hand, there is an ample set off in the fact that Afghanistan and Beloochistan are strictly reserved. It used to be the fashion in England to talk of Russian mala fides, and to say that treaties with such a Power were not worth the paper they were written on. Something of this extravagant mood seems to remain, for we read that in certain quarters hopes of the Entente being loyally observed are based upon the bitter experiences that Russia recently garnered in East Asia. Russia is also credited with attaching considerable importance to the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and to have been largely induced by its existence in the matter of this Entente. But we may say for our own part that we have never met an educated Russian who hesitated to express the frank wish for a thoroughly amicable understanding between his country and Great Britain. Besides, in analysing the factors which have contributed to this happy result, note must certainly be taken of the Franco-Japanese and Anglo-French Ententes. These had certainly considerable influence with Russia. It is to be hoped now that an effective check will be imposed on the insulting talk so long prevalent about Russia's ruthlessly aggressive tendencies. She has to-day given the strongest possible evidence of a desire for peace and a willingness to exercise mutual forbearance.

The only two leading Japanese newspapers which have thus far commented on the Anglo-Russian Entente are the Nichi Nichi Shimbun and the Fiji Shimpō. They warmly welcome the agreement, not only because it makes for the peace of the world but also because it directly concerns Japan's ally, England, and her neighbour, China. They also agree in regarding this Entente as practically a pledge that the status quo shall be preserved in Central Asia. Some people contend that Russia has made excessive concessions in Afghanistan, and that England has effaced herself over-much in northern Persia. But, as a matter of fact, England's last treaty with Afghanistan creates for the former precisely the position which now receives public recognition from Russia, and equally as a matter of fact England's activities in northern Persia are virtually of the nature assigned to them by the new covenant. Of course if limitless ambitions are to be considered in drawing up international documents, the matter assumes a new complexion, but it has to be remembered that the main purpose of this Entente is precisely to check the exercise of such ambitions. The Fiji Shimpō observes that, inasmuch as the Entente may be described as a suddenly contrived composition of hostilities which have menaced the world's peace during the past century, there was reason to apprehend that a very doubtful reception would be given to the document by the peoples of the high contracting parties. Happily that forecast has not been fulfilled. The British and Russian press alike express the satisfaction of their respective nations, and that is a matter for special congratulation. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun makes a point which all students of the time must endorse, namely, that Japan's success in the recent war and her alliance with England must be regarded as contributory causes of this Entente, and under that aspect the agreement is a special source of satisfaction to this country. The preservation of the status quo may now be said to be the declared policy of all the great powers of the world.

We (Japan Mail) suggest that to maintain the status quo strictly is out of the power of any nation. To wax or to wane is the law of nature, a law which imposes itself upon States just as imperatively as upon every living organism. Therefore every covenant and every entente destined to keep things stationary in their present grooves can have no validity except in so far as activities and energies can be temporarily confined to certain limits.

We have not included in the above category of newspapers the Chuo Shimbun, because it does not write specially on this subject. But in an article headed "World Peace" that journal discusses the new Entente from the point of view of its influence upon the tranquillity of all nations. Recalling the series of international agreements prelude by the Anglo-Japanese Understanding, the Chuo notes that the convention just concluded worthily caps the list, because it removes the factor most dangerous to universal peace, namely, the East Asian struggle between Russia and England. Our contemporary makes also a remark which may possibly become the keynote of Japanese domestic politics, namely, that since the state of armed truce, which, according to Russian high officials themselves followed the conclusion of the Portsmouth Treaty, has been converted by the Russo-Japanese Entente into secure friendship, and since the great and long existing danger of a collision between England and Russia in Central Asia has been averted, with the collateral fact that this Empire's military responsibilities have been sensibly diminished, it may now be possible to devote less energy and less money to warlike preparations. There are certainly sounds in the political air which suggest that this idea may become the plank of some platform.

MR TAFT ON JAPANESE AND AMERICAN RELATIONS.

A banquet was given at the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo on the evening of the 30th ultimo in honour of His Excellency Mr. Taft by the Tokyo Municipality and Business Men. The hosts were represented by the Mayor of the City, Baron Shibusawa, Mr. Okura and other leading citizens, and among the guests were Prince Oyama, Marquises Matsukata and Inouye, Count Tanaka and many other distinguished personages. Baron Shibusawa proposed the health of the President of the United States and Mr. Taft proposed that of the Emperor of Japan. Baron Shibusawa on behalf of the hosts then proposed Mr. Taft's health. He briefly epitomised the story of Japan's recourse to an exclusive policy in the face of what she believed to be dangerous foreign intrigues, and her emergence from that policy at the instance of Commodore Perry on behalf of the United States. The Baron admitted that he himself had been one of the exclusionists at the time of the downfall of the Tokugawa Shogunate, and he alluded in terms of the warmest appreciation and gratitude to the friendly and sympathetic attitude that the United States and their representatives had always maintained towards Japan. As a business man he made special allusion to the extraordinary growth of Japan's trade with America, which, from the small sum of 5 million yen in 1873, had now swelled to 200 millions. He concluded by calling upon those present to drink the health of Mr. Taft who was not only a great man in his own country but also great in the eyes of the whole world.

Mr. Soyeda translated the above speech admirably into English.

Mr. Taft, whose reply was eloquently rendered into Japanese by Count Terajima, alluded with appreciation and gratitude to the kindly reception given to him and his numerous companions on the occasion of their recent visit to Japan. The light of peace was just then emerging from the war clouds that had hung for so long over Eastern Asia and he felt proud to think that his country had contributed something to that happy result. He said that Japan had showed herself great not only in war but also in peace, and she now occupied a well deserved place among the leading Powers of the world. The most interesting part in his speech was where he alluded to the slight trouble that had disturbed relations between his country and Japan, relations which had successfully withstood the test of many previous incidents. What was the cause of this conjuncture? Primarily it was Nature, since the thing began with the great earthquake at San Francisco. The resulting disturbance was a veritable trifle yet its results were responsible for the whole trouble. The Governments of the two countries consisted of men illustrious, strong and honest, and he ventured to affirm that they would never fail to solve any diplomatic problem in a pacific manner. There might be bellicose elements among the population of each country, but there was one word which never would be suffered to find its way into official relations; and that word was "war." He did not pretend to say that war could be completely dispensed with in the world, but he did assert that it was an alternative to be resorted to only in the case of questions wholly incapable of being solved by any other method. It would be a crime against modern civilization if Japan and America went to war, and it would be at once hateful and insane. The people of both countries were alike repugnant to the idea, and the governments of both countries might be trusted to be faithful in this matter to the people's wishes. What could Japan gain by war? What could America gain? Japan was now engaged in endeavouring to win in peaceful commerce a victory such as she had already won in the field of war. This great and worthy object would be completely frustrated by a disturbance. He alluded in warm terms to the work of civilization and reform that Japan was doing in Korea and to the splendid services rendered by Prince Ito, and he declared that whatever criticisms and whatever objections that work might be subjected to, the world would never believe that the policy pursued by the Japanese Government and Prince Ito towards Korea was guided by any principles except those of enlightenment and sincerity. It was the duty of a great Power, a duty in strict conformity with the ideals of the modern world, that peoples who lagged notably behind the march of progress should be brought into line with it. Japan was discharging that duty unflinchingly in Korea, whereas war would be an effectual means of interrupting her work. As for America, what possible reason was there why she should engage in war? One or two years' fighting would convert her into a military nation and would interrupt all the grand material progress which lay at the root of her present prosperity and happiness. War had the inevitable effect of educating all the worse passions of human nature, and why should America have any wish for such a monster, especially at a moment when she is engaged in purging her material growth of elements which tend to debilitate it. Alluding to the Philippines, he described as a ridiculous mistake the idea that the United States was disposed to sell these islands to Japan or to any other country. America was discharging in the Philippines a duty similar to that which Japan had undertaken in Korea. She would not shrink from completing the duty, and when it was completed, when the Philippines had been educated to such a point that they could govern themselves in accordance with the principles of civilized administration, it was to them that the islands would be handed over not to any foreign Power. From the point of view of the discharge of that duty, nothing could be more hateful or more injurious than war at this juncture. It might be asked why, if such were the case, so much talk was heard about war. The answer must be that the fault lay with the newspapers. No terms of reprobation were too strong to be applied to journalists who sacrificed great international interests on the altar of a momentary sensation, forgetting that modern civilization had equipped the world so fully with means of communication that every word publicly spoken in one country quickly found its way into the ears of all. He was glad to be able to assure the Japanese people most confidently that American public opinion remained unaltered in its friendship for Japan, and that nothing would be allowed to alter it if human ability could avert such a misfortune. He concluded by expressing warmest gratitude and profoundest appreciation of the welcome given to himself and his friends by the Sovereign and the people of Japan.

The able speech delivered by Mr. Taft at the banquet given in his honour by the Tokyo Municipality and the Business Men seems to have produced a signal impression in Japan. Nearly all the leading journals comment on it in a similar strain. They say that his Excellency's utterances have completely dispersed the little cloud that hung on the horizon of the two nations' friendship and that happily all apprehension of trouble has now disappeared. They are particularly pleased also by the allusions that the Secretary of War made to Korea and the Philippines, and by his open recognition of the fact that the United States and Japan are discharging a similar duty in those places. In short nothing could be better than the effect produced by this speech, which is justly described by Japanese journals as a masterpiece of statesmanlike utterance, and which they receive as a trustworthy exponent of the views and sentiments of the American Government and the American nation.

THE FAR EASTERN SOCIETY.

On the 27th inst. the Far Eastern Society entertained at dinner Mr. Soyeda, President of the Industrial Bank, and Baron Ozawa, who has just returned from attending the Red Cross meeting in Europe. On this occasion Mr. Soyeda did not speak of finance. He discussed general subjects and particularly the attitude of the West towards the East. Basing his conclusions apparently on the experiences actually garnered by himself, he said that formerly to be looked down on in the Occident with the greatest disdain and contempt. Not only the individual Oriental but also Oriental nations had been treated as though they belonged to a wholly inferior order of beings. A change, however, had come over this state of affairs. It was attributable to two causes. The first was that owing to the great expansion of manufacture and industry in Europe and America during recent years, the necessity of obtaining access to good markets had become more imperative than ever. It had been discovered by experience that China was such a market, and this conviction, now strongly entertained in the West, had invested the Middle Kingdom with new interest in Occidental eyes. The other factor was Japan's success in war. She had proved that she could stand in the lists even against one of the greatest military States of the West, and the result had been a sudden and signal revulsion of feeling in her favour. When the speaker received his education at Cambridge some years ago, he recalled that at the meetings of the Debating Society not even the right to speak had been accorded to him, whereas, on revisiting that University on the occasion of his recent trip, he observed a wholly new demeanour on the part of the students and professors. In short the difference between Europe's mood to-day towards Japan and her mood twenty years ago was as the difference between clouds and mud. He mentioned that, while passing through Siberia on his way back, he had been astounded by the stupendous character of the programme evidently contemplated formerly by Russia in Eastern Asia. Such was the nature of that programme that, had the great Northern Power conquered in the recent struggle, not alone Japan but also all the States of the West must have suffered seriously in their material interests. Japan by her exertions and sacrifices had averted that danger; yet the Occident, instead of gratefully recognizing her services, seemed to regard her with envy and apprehension. In the case of China this ungrateful attitude was particularly noticeable. It might safely be said that the preservation of the Middle Kingdom's integrity had been achieved by Japan, but instead of feeling thankful, the guiding idea of Chinese officials and Chinese subjects was apparently to make things as unpleasant as possible for the Japanese. It was most important that the Japanese should pay due attention to these sentiments of the West and of China. He considered that Japan's victories were largely responsible for the present unrest in India and for the anti-foreign feeling in China. The latter Power, without any due preparations or any competence, was seeking to assert herself in a manner which, if persisted in, must lead to serious trouble. At the close of this speech Mr. Soyeda alluded to the racial antipathies now unfortunately prevalent in the West. In education lay, he thought, the only hope of correcting this miserable state of affairs, for by means of education the world's civilization might be unified, and the nations might learn not to discriminate injuriously against one another.

THE EDUCATION SOCIETY.

The members of the Education Society of Japan gave a banquet on the 27th inst. by way of welcoming Baron Kikuchi and Professor Shigeno, who have just returned from the West, and of bidding good-bye to Professor Ladd. In replying to the toast of his health Professor Ladd spoke of the arms and armour of old Japan, several specimens of which had been presented to him by various people in Japan since his arrival here. He described these weapons as very primitive but he recalled with admiration the fact that the men who wielded them were inspired by the same spirit of Bushido which animates the present generation of Japanese and has attained for them such signal successes. This spirit was one of the most valuable assets of the Japanese nation and every effort ought to be made to nourish and preserve it. The Professor spoke also of the opportunities he had enjoyed during his tour in the interior of Japan. He had been particularly interested in the schools and the system of education, and he had come to the conclusion that Japan was very fortunate in the possession of such earnest, zealous and order-loving lads as those now attending her schools and colleges.

Baron Kikuchi made as usual a very interesting speech, but a large part of it consisted of matter with which our readers are already familiar. He mentioned among other things that the national spirit which had inspired the Japanese in the recent war attracted much attention in Europe and many questions about it were propounded to him. Among these questions one particularly frank was whether he thought that this spirit could be preserved, and, if not what result was to be anticipated for Japan. To this he had replied by pointing to Japan's history during the past 2,000 years. He insisted that throughout the whole of that long period Japan had never allowed herself to be metamorphosed by any alien creed or system. When Buddhism came to these islands, its doctrines were found to embody principles contrary to Japanese instincts, and until those principles were corrected, until in fact Buddhism had been assimilated to its Japanese surroundings, the Indian creed had not taken root in Japanese soil. The same was true of Confucianism. In fact Japan had a national polity which had persisted from the most ancient times and might be expected to survive all shocks in the future as it had already done in the past.

Professor Shigeno, who is in his eighty-first year and who enjoys the reputation of being one of the best Chinese scholars in Japan, spoke of the ease with which his trip had been accomplished, and said that in spite of his ignorance of foreign languages, he had derived no little benefit and instruction from his tour. He mentioned that the speech delivered by him in Austria before the International Society of Students had been translated into English and Chinese, and would soon be in the hands of his audience.

THE LATE MR. LEE KAHN TUNG.

The funeral took place on Monday of Lee Kahn Tung, known to his many friends as Ah See, who died on Saturday night at the age of 61. Deceased was a native of Canton and had been the Comproadore of the China and Japan Trading Co., Ltd., for over 35 years, by whom he was highly appreciated as an honest and faithful servant. He occupied a prominent position among his fellow countrymen in Yokohama, being principally interested in the Chinese School, of which he was a founder, and was also well known and a popular figure among the merchants of Tokyo and Yokohama. His remains were conveyed to the Chinese Cemetery, being followed by the staff of the China and Japan Trading Co. the whole of the Chinese School and numerous Chinese and Japanese friends.

CHINA.

A very important step has been taken by the Chinese Government. They have decided to abolish the celebrated Eight Banner Corps, which have been the emblem of Manchu supremacy ever since the establishment of the present dynasty. These corps are scattered all over the Chinese Empire and may be said to constitute its garrisons. For hundreds of years they have been pensioners of the Government, much as were the Samurai in old-time Japan, and although they have frequently shown themselves capable of the bravest military deeds, their organised presence throughout the Empire has always been a sign of the foreign yoke imposed on China, while on the other hand, the functions performed by them have been wholly inadequate to the expense of their maintenance. The Japanese when confronted by a somewhat similar problem forty years ago, solved it by taking back the estates of the feudatories and giving them instead pension-bonds. The Chinese appear to be taking exactly the opposite course: they are stopping the pensions and making grants of land in lieu of them. In a word, the Manchu braves are to be converted into farmers, making agriculture and industry their means of livelihood instead of existing as mere pensioners of the country. They will be converted into producers instead of being as hitherto consumers. The large sum allotted by the Central Government for the support of these corps will not, however, become an immediately available State asset. It will still be appropriated for the benefit of these Manchus, the plan being to devote these monies to the formation of a fund which will be used for supplying the disbanded soldiers with farm instruments or industrial machines essential to their new avocations. This sweeping measure is believed to be preliminary to the enactment of a conscription system applicable to the whole Empire of China, as strongly recommended by ex-Viceroy Yuan. In a word, China is following the same course as that taken by Japan at the time of the Restoration.

A very striking memorial is said to have been addressed to the Throne by Viceroy Chang. He urges sweeping educational reforms which seem to contemplate a system of national compulsory education such as that pursued in Japan; he urges that the princes and high personages of State should be sent to travel and make observations in foreign countries; he would have China get back into her own hands and operate on her own account all the railways throughout the land; he insists that immediate steps must be taken to organise a really efficient army and navy; and he recommends the establishment of two great factories where weapons of war, steamships, and locomotives may be built, so that China may no longer be dependent on foreign countries for the essentials of progress. Finally he insists that all possible celerity should be observed in establishing constitutional Government.

Telegrams from Peking confirm the rumours that the visit of the Viceroy of Manchuria to the capital had its origin in accusations of weakness preferred against him, notably by the Minister of War. This Viceroy is a protégé of Yuan Shih-kai, and the story told is that Yuan has met the above complaints by saying, "Very well, recall Hsu and let Manchuria be administered by a Manchu." This suggestion is said to have caused much perturbation in the opposite camp.

The cost of repurchasing the Lu-Hau

Railway is said to be estimated at 50 million dollars (Mexican), but nothing is yet said as to the course to be adopted for procuring this sum.

News comes from the province of Kiangsi that there has been an anti-Christian riot at Kungchow. The disturbance broke out on the 25th inst. and was continued until the 26th, the local troops being apparently unable to cope with it. The rioters directed their fury mainly against the Church of the Lazarists, and they are said to have murdered the Italian father who ministered there. The other members of the mission escaped to the Yamen and were subsequently sent under escort to Kian.

The latest news from Kungchow in Kiangsi, which on the 25th ultimo was the scene of an anti-Christian riot, is that all the foreigners escaped safely except two, one of whom was an Italian priest and the other seems to have been a merchant, but with the meagre intelligence available it is not possible to identify either.

There has been a large conflagration at Wuchou in the province of Kwangtung. The number of houses destroyed is not telegraphed, but it is said that numerous bridges, ships, and boats were consumed, that the insurance offices will suffer heavily and that foreign property was not injured.

It is stated that a sum of 8 million taels will have to be spent on the abolition of the Eight Banner Corps, and that the Chinese Government is debating how to raise the money. This fund will be applied, we presume, mainly to the purchase of the lands which are to be allotted to the disbanded men.

Lieut. General Samejima, on his usual yearly tour of inspection of the Japanese cavalry in Manchuria, called recently at Harbin, where he was treated with the utmost possible courtesy by the Russian officials. It is said, indeed, that the doings on this occasion will contribute materially to the growth of friendship between the Russian and Japanese troops.

It is said to be thought in Peking that Viceroy Hsu's resignation will be accepted and that his successor will be the present Minister of War, Tieh Liang. Viceroy Yuan, at a recent Cabinet meeting, is reported to have urged the necessity of speedily settling the outstanding questions with Japan.

The Chinese Throne on the 30th ultimo promulgated an edict declaring that the new Governmental system in China shall be a constitutional monarchy. It is stated (Mainichi Dempo's Peking correspondent) that this edict was prompted by the fact that many of the agitators throughout the provinces seem to anticipate the organisation of a republican form of government and have been preaching that doctrine. The Empress Dowager questioned their Excellencies Chang and Yuan as to the best way of meeting the situation thus created, and the two statesmen recommended that an edict in the above sense should be issued. Another edict appeared on the same day with reference to education. It declared that the basis of education must be the inculcation of loyalty and patriotism and the refutation of false doctrines—evidently reference is here made to republicanism and other theories of popular government. Thus far this education edict is not particularly remarkable but it presents one very interesting feature, namely, it declares that the grant of the people's admission to governmental functions must be preceded by such a use of education as shall equip them with the necessary qualifications. This evidently relegates to an indefinite future the enfranchising of the people and the institution of a national assembly.

There is no special news about the disturbance in Kiangsi, but we gather that its dimensions were exaggerated in the first instance.

A very important and interesting edict was published in Peking on the 1st inst. It embodies a distinct declaration from the Throne that religious discriminations must cease in China, and that the followers of any and every faith must have an absolutely equal status in the eyes of the law. Local officials are reminded that there devolves upon the Government by treaty the plain duty of protecting the lives and properties of converts to foreign faiths just as fully and effectually as the lives and properties of men adhering to the ancient religions of China. All Chinese subjects, whatever their creed, are pronounced to be the children of the Emperor, and to be entitled to the same protection from the laws of the land. The edict further orders that the provisions of the treaties bearing upon this question shall be printed and distributed to all local authorities throughout the Empire, so that there may be a universal understanding of the duties devolving upon these officials and of the obligations which the Throne has pledged itself to discharge.

Nothing is said as to the proximate cause of this memorable edict's promulgation, but we shall probably not be far wrong if we assume that it was prompted by the riots in Kiangsi, which cost the life of an Italian padre. With reference to this Kiangsi trouble, the latest intelligence thus far available is somewhat meagre. It speaks of the rioters as "Boxers" and says that on the 28th ultimo a party of them attacked Kungchow but were repulsed by the troops stationed at that place, and that subsequently a reinforcement of soldiers was dispatched to the scene from Nanchang. Nothing is said in this report about the death of a foreign missionary. We are told only that several stores belonging to Christian converts were sacked by the rioters.

CHIENTAO.

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun's quotes an anonymous member of the Residency General's Staff with reference to the order recently issued by Prince Ito for establishing a Japanese post-office at Lungcheng in the Chientao region. This order was given because the Residency General is absolutely convinced that Chientao is Korean territory and is irrevocably determined not to entertain any protest in the opposite sense. In fact, according to the Japanese contention, the problem to be solved is not the ownership of Chientao but the delimitation of the boundaries between it and China. About these boundaries there is certainly some confusion, but about the broad fact that Chientao is Korean territory there can be no second opinion. Meanwhile the Japanese are constructing a line of telegraph from Huiyong to Lungcheng, the site of the new post-office. The latter place lies 50 miles north of the former, and the Tumen River runs between them. These proceedings as to a post-office and a line of telegraph must be construed as the plainest possible intimations that no question about the sovereignty in Chientao will be entertained by the Japanese.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The customs returns for August must be pleasant reading to the Japanese. That old bugbear by which all gold monometallic countries are doomed to suffer, namely, an unfavourable balance of trade, is conspicuously absent. The exports for the month totalled 45,309,896 yen against imports aggregating 36,539,179 yen, so that the excess of exports amounted to no less than 8,770,657 yen. Thus for the eight months ended August 31st the imports exceeded the exports by only 59,683,463 yen, which, though it is somewhat larger than the corresponding figure (41,336,180 yen) for 1906, is very much smaller than the figure (161,714,644 yen) for 1905. The bulk of the trade, too, shows vigorous growth. For the total amount of exports and imports combined during this eight-monthly period was 624,959,165 yen against an aggregate of 536,441,280 yen for the corresponding period of 1906 and 551,907,662 yen for 1905. Thus we see that the development for this year represents the very substantial sum of 87½ million yen. It is striking to look at the returns for the past four decades, that is to say, since Japan's foreign commerce began to be regularly embodied in statistics:—

TRADE TOTALS.
1868.	1878.	1888.
Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
26,246,544	56,863,974	131,160,744
1898.	1907.
Yen.	Yen.
443,255,909	831,278,885 (approximate)

It is seen from these figures that in the space of 40 years the bulk of the commerce has increased thirty-two fold.

As for the movements of specie during the month of August, gold coin and bullion left the country to the amount of 4,591,025 yen, whereas only 460,397 yen worth flowed in, the excess of exports being thus 4,130,628 yen. If silver be added, the export of the two metals is found to have exceeded their import by 4,127,320 yen. It would appear that the movements of specie between January and August were not influenced, as they had been in immediately preceding years, by special official transactions, for the excess of exports in that ten-monthly period was 10 million yen, in round numbers, whereas in the corresponding period of 1906 the excess of imports was 28 millions and in 1905 it was 15½ millions, though, so far as the movements of merchandise were concerned, specie should have left the country to about the same extent in 1906, and to a very much greater extent in 1905.

The collection of customs dues shows steady increase, namely, 31,291,208 yen in the current year up to August 31st, against 27,452,618 yen for the same period of 1906 and 22,659,371 yen for 1905.

It is interesting to note that in spite of Kobe's signal growth during recent years, Yokohama remains queen as a commercial port so far as exports are concerned, though Kobe has shot ahead in imports. The figures are these:—

EXPORTS
	1907	1906	1905

MR. TAFT'S WELCOME IN JAPAN.

Saturday, September 28.

Tokyo papers on Saturday morning spoke in an almost unanimous tone of the visit of Mr. Taft to this country. They welcomed him most heartily as a powerful factor in dispelling the delusions under which several of his countrymen seem to labour with regard to Japan's attitude. As Admiral Count Yamamoto had contributed largely to reassure the American nation on the occasion of his recent visit to the States, and had truly affirmed that the warmth of Japan's friendship for America remained as strong as ever, so Mr. Taft from his third visit to Japan would be able to obtain new justification of the peace making role that he had followed in his own country. Several of the Tokyo journals published photographs of the distinguished visitor, and altogether nothing could be more cordial than the attitude of the Japanese press in general.

Sunday, September 29.

Japanese newspapers continue to devote extraordinary space to the visit of Mr. Taft. They speak at great length of the purpose of his journey to the Philippines and they publish numerous pictures in all of which the portly figure of the great American statesman is prominent. We must say frankly that in all our long experience of the Japanese press we can not recall a single previous instance where the newspapers "spread themselves" so notably to hail the coming of a foreign friend however exalted his position. There is no mistaking the fact that this is a spontaneous and wholesale demonstration on the part of the Japanese people against the notion, to them intolerably repugnant, that there can ever be anything like an armed conflict between the United States and this Empire. The Jiji Shimpō goes so far as to affirm that neither in the present nor in the future can there be anything to disturb the relations of the two friends which have so long joined hands across the Pacific, and that whatever may be mischievously wrought by giddy or interested sensationalists among the great mass of the American people, Japan will look on with placid eyes, assured that the strength of her amity with America is proof against all shocks.

BARON KIKUCHI ON THE POSITION OF WOMEN.

In a speech delivered by him at the Bankers' Club banquet on the 25th inst. Baron Kikuchi made some interesting remarks about the two great questions now occupying such a prominent place in the attention of the British public, namely, the question of women's role in life and the question of labour. Thirty years ago, when the Baron himself was a student in England, it was scarcely possible to find a single girl attending the courses at a university or a college, and indeed their attendance was in some cases forbidden. But now a large percentage of the graduates are women, and the consequences have been two; namely, a wide extension of the field of female enterprise and a marked reduction in the number of marriages. This means the imposition of a sensible check on the growth of the British population, and it means also a displacement of male workers from spheres which they hitherto monopolised. It is evident that this problem has an important bearing upon a nation's welfare and its interest for a country like Japan is undeniable. In Japan women have hitherto been practically confined to household functions and the whole extra-domestic business has been in the hands of men. Baron Kikuchi does not deny that this state of affairs may be carried to some excess in Japan, but he evidently believes the Japanese system to be the best, for he expresses marked apprehension in view of the change which appears to be gradually occurring in this country. He speaks with plain disapproval of the gradual emergence of girls and women from the household sphere and their intrusion into an arena to which male labour is better suited. Referring to the zeal shown by the British nation in promoting education, he mentions that the sum allotted every year in the city of London alone from the public funds for educational purposes amounts to 50 million yen annually, which is equal to the aggregate spent throughout the length and breadth of Japan. The Baron spoke also of the labour problem which now confronts England, and alluded to the drastic steps which the present Cabinet contemplates in order to obtain funds for old-age pensions. He warns his country that it is the part of wise statesmen to avert the acute occurrence of these problems, and that Japan can not too soon apply herself to find a solution.

MR. R. W. BORTHWICK.

The news is now confirmed of the death of Mr. Robert Waddell Borthwick, who, in addition to being an old and popular resident of Yokohama, became latterly, by reason of his business connections, known all over the Far East. The deceased gentleman, who was born in Bathgate, Scotland, in 1862 came to Yokohama in the eighties to join the firm of Messrs. North and Rae, chemists, and when the present company was formed and Mr. North retired he was appointed manager. He held that position for some years till he was led by way of remedy for a pulmonary affection to seek the beneficent climate of Los Angeles. Apparently quite recuperated in health he was able some time later to accept the post of attorney in the Far East of the well known firm of Scott, Bowne and Co., and in the interests of their famous Emulsion he travelled extensively, his range of journeys including the Philippines, Siam, Burma, India, China, Korea and Japan. A renewal of his complaint sent him home to England last year and he spent the summer of 1906 at a sanatorium in Constable's country near the river Stour and on the borders of Essex and Suffolk. Returning, much improved, he went on a tour in China, proceeding up the Yangtse and from Hankow by rail to Peking, and when seen later, in Yokohama, appeared to be in excellent health. The deceased gentleman was married in August, 1892, to the eldest daughter of Mr. E. J. Moss, of Yokohama, who with a daughter survives him and to whom the community will extend its respectful sympathy. Mr. Borthwick was a patriotic Scot, and had been on the committees of the Yokohama and Hongkong St. Andrew's Societies. His death took place very suddenly on Aug. 22nd in Glasgow, from hæmorrhage of the lungs, and the funeral took place at Bathgate, his native town, the following Saturday.

Lieutenant Nakayama of the Navy, a passenger on the steamer Chikusen Maru, which arrived at Nagasaki on Sept. 30th from Shanghai, is suffering from cholera.

BUSINESS NOTES.

Friday, September 27.

The Sugar Company which has its quarters at Yensui in Formosa, is on the point of receiving from England machinery which will enable it to turn out 1,000 tons of sugar daily. The machinery has been ordered from a Glasgow firm at a cost of 900,000 yen, and it is stated that Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co. have provided funds, one half at the rate of 6 per cent interest and the other half at 7.

Mr. Shiraishi, Chief Manager of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, confirms the report recently circulated that the Company is about to abandon its line of steamers to South America. He states that at the time when this service was established, excellent prospects offered, inasmuch as Mexico, Chili and Peru promised to be a fine field for Japanese settlers. The carriage of these settlers and the transport of the goods which would ultimately be required by them from Japan constituted the sole prospective source of the Company's earnings. But all that has now been put to stop to, and the steamers are consequently run at a dead loss. He thinks the whole situation extremely regrettable and hopes that in the interests of the nation there may soon be valid cause for reopening the line.

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun says that the sum of 4 million sterling recently borrowed by the South Manchuria Railway Company in London will suffice only to pay expenses of reconstruction and equipment up to August or September of next year. The remaining 4 millions will therefore have to be borrowed at no distant date, and Mr. Soyeda is said to be already in treaty with British financiers on the subject.

Our readers are aware that there has been of late much talk about the necessity and expediency of losing no time in dissolving companies which were formed during the boom of last winter and this spring. There are many sound enterprises which everybody wishes to see prosecuted, but there are numerous others of a bubble character, and the effect of keeping them in embryonic existence is merely to tie up large sums of money representing the first instalments, and to give unproductive work to a number of employees. The speedy dissolution of such companies and the freeing of their capital would evidently tend to raise the country out of its present depressed condition. But the Hochi Shinbun says that there are many difficulties in the way. There is the ambition of certain promoters who look to find lucrative billets on the staffs of the companies; there is the self-interest of directors who have ordered or expect to order goods from abroad on which they would receive a substantial commission; and there are the holders of share-rights who are resorting to various shady manoeuvres in order to get benefit out of dissolution. The provisions of law will soon become available, for in Japan unless a company holds a general meeting of organisation within one year of the date of its registration, the shareholders become entitled to demand repayment of the calls put up by them.

The Fiji Shimpō quotes the experts of the Nishigahara Agricultural Experiment Station as ridiculing recently formed apprehensions about the rice crops. As a matter of fact the inundations of August did not affect more than 5 per cent. of the land under cultivation throughout the Empire, and with regard to fears based upon the low temperature recently recorded, these experts say that there are no grounds for such apprehensions. The truth is that owing to exceptionally favourable climatic conditions during the doyo season, the graining of the rice took place this year much earlier than usual, and the crop thus became comparatively indifferent to the temperature prevailing in the closing days of September. All things considered, the prospect is said to be a crop of 50 million koku, or some 10 per cent. above the average.

Saturday, September 28.

The troubles of the emigration companies seem to be even more severe than we stated in a recent issue. The Foreign Office is now said to have called upon the companies, great and small alike, to put up security money amounting to 50,000 yen each. The Emigration Law requires only 10,000 yen, but the authorities, by arranging that the greater the sum put up by a company the larger the number of emigrants it was permitted to handle, rendered the 10,000-yen provision abortive and brought about a state of affairs such that some of the large companies found themselves lodging as much as 120,000 yen. This was not intolerable in the days when emigration to Hawaii was permitted to the extent of 4,000 per month, and when Mexico, Canada and other places were open to Japanese seeking employment. But last year the Hawaiian limit was reduced to 200, and this figure was again cut down by one half in May of this year, while as for Canada, Mexico and so forth permits are altogether withheld. There are 28 emigration companies—not 29 as recently stated by us—and if 1,000 emigrants monthly have to be divided equally amongst these companies, it is plain that each company is reduced to some 35 emigrants. In the face of such facts, to put up 50,000 yen security money is obviously impossible, and the Government, well understanding the impossibility, had evidently legislated with the intention of ruling out of existence all the small companies and placing the enterprise of emigration in the hands of solid and responsible associations.

It is stated that an appropriation of 10 million yen will appear in the next budget, the money to be expended in the course of five or six years. The object of this fund is to carry out in the Shimonoseki Straits extensive operations of dredging and rock-removing. With regard to these Straits, a very large programme would be involved were the work conducted on a thoroughly comprehensive scale and in accordance with the ideas of the military and naval authorities. The outlay in that case would aggregate about 100 million yen, but of course such an appropriation is out of the question, for the present at all events. It has therefore been decided to confine the operations to the dredging of the Straits and to the removal of certain rocks.

It is stated that the question of combining into one the five flour manufacturing companies of Japan has again entered the field of practical discussion. This project was entertained some time ago, but was then thought to be premature. Now, however, it has been brought again on the tapis and is said to be receiving serious consideration.

With regard to the depression on the Stock Exchange, Mr. Matsuoka, a prominent director of the Exchange, is quoted as saying that a main cause of the low prices hitherto ruling has been that a number of compulsory sales were always on the tapis and that consequently advantage was taken of every favourable opportunity to dispose of these stocks. That state of affairs has now come to an end, however, and will no longer oppress prices. Of course the rice crop is a weighty factor in this matter, and there seems to be much uneasiness about it among operators on the Stock Exchange. But as a matter of fact both official and private investigations go to show that there is no reason for these fears and that the crop will be a fine one. As for the high quotations in the rice market, they apparently belong to the general category of appreciation of prices which must be attributed to post bellum conditions. Many experts believe that the upward movement will commence from about the middle of October, and Mr. Matsuoka is disposed to agree with them. But he thinks that prices will not recover their normal level until a thorough cleansing of the Augean stable has been effected; in other words, until all the weak companies started during the boom of last fall and this spring are dissolved and the money lying in their hands is restored to the shareholders.

Sunday, September 29.

Active measures are said to be in progress for negotiating the transfer of several lines of telegraph from the Great Northern Telegraph Company to Japan. The lines in question are that from Kyushu via Tsushima to Fusan in Korea (forty-two nautical miles), that from Nagasaki to Vladivostok (740 nautical miles), and that from Nagasaki to Shanghai (417 nautical miles). Two representatives of the Great Northern Company are now staying at the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo for the purposes of these negotiations, and much progress is said to have been made. If the lines come into Japanese possession, it is predicted that the scale of charges will be largely reduced.

On the 11th of September, as our readers are aware, it became possible to send correspondence from Japan to Europe via Siberia without resorting to any such expedient as re-posting in Vladivostok. The route taken by this correspondence is by rail to Tsuruga on the north-west coast of Japan and thence to Vladivostok. On the 1st of October a similar arrangement will come into force on the Tairen-Harbin route. Letters will be sent by steamer from Muji to Tairen; thence they will be carried by the Japanese railway to Kwanchengtsz for transfer to the Russian line, and finally at Harbin they will be joined with the mails from Vladivostok. There is no statement as to which of the two routes will be the quicker or as to the days for posting letters via Tairen. These details will be soon published, doubtless.

Baron Sakatani was entertained by the members of the Japan Economic Society in the Fujimi-kan on the 28th inst. There had been an impression that his Excellency would speak about Japan's national finances, but he did not do so; he limited his remarks to a statement of the impressions left on his mind by his recent journey. He spoke with very marked enthusiasm of the wonderful progress made by Kobe and Nagoya in the past few years. Their commercial and industrial development astonished him. He seems to have been specially struck by the harbour works at Atsuta, the port of Nagoya. These works he described as being modelled on the experiences gained elsewhere and as being admirably fitted to the requirements of the place. The Kobe harbour works also came in for his unqualified praise, and he predicted that before many years had passed Kobe and Nagoya would each be cities with 500,000 inhabitants. Referring to Maidzuru, the Minister said that he doubted whether even foreign countries could boast of a naval port constructed on lines more faithful to the most modern teachings, and he also insisted that the place has great tradal capabilities. He spoke favourably of Tsuruga's prospects, too, and by way of illustrating its proximity to Vladivostok he quoted the fact that the two places mutually supply each other with vegetables, and that Vladivostok sends a part of its linen to be washed at Tsuruga. At both Tsuruga and Nagoya enterprising men are busily carrying out plans for the construction of large hotels capable of comfortably accommodating foreign guests.

Settling day on the Stock Exchange passed quietly. There had been some nervousness with respect to the number of shares that would have to be disposed of. People spoke of as many as 170 or 180 thousand, but when it came to actualities the total was only 84,650, representing a value of 4,910,590 yen, which makes an average of a little over 58 yen a share. The above totals were made up as follows:—Railway shares 19,500, price 1,137.500 yen, and average 58.334 yen; miscellaneous shares 65,150, price 3,773,070 yen and average 57.914. Rarely since the Stock Exchange was established has such a small volume of transactions been recorded at the end of any month, and onlookers are more puzzled than ever to say when the inevitable re-action will commence.

Monday, September 30.

We read in the Asahi Shimbun that the competition between the steamers of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and those of Messrs. Butterfield & Swire on the Yokohama-Shanghai line has now come to an end and that the two companies will work in unison from to-day (1st of October). It will be remembered that this competition had its origin immediately after the late war. During the war the Nippon Yusen Kaisha chartered three of Messrs. Butterfield & Swire's steamers to take the place of the former Company's vessels which had been withdrawn from the Shanghai line in order to do duty as military transports. On the conclusion of the war the charter arrangement came to an end, but the English firm continued to work the line and competition has gone on ever since to the great disadvantage of both companies. Of late, however, the movement of merchandise on this line has proved quite inadequate to give employment to so many vessels, and the shrewd men in London came to the conclusion that concord was better than competition. The Japanese are always ready for a compromise in such matters and therefore the Nippon Yusen Kaisha did not make any difficulties.

From the same source we learn that consultations are now in progress with a view to effecting a similar abandonment of competition in the Yangtze River and on the Hongkong-Bangkok line. Formerly the carrying trade on the Yangtze used to be exploited by three companies, which worked in concord and pooled their earnings, namely, the China Merchants, Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co., and Messrs. Butterfield & Swire. There then appeared upon the scene the Nisshin Steamship Company, which also was a combination, being formed by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's protégé—the Konan Kaisha—and the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, and keen competition sprang up. The situation was not improved by the appearance of French and German rivals in the field, but now at length there is said to be a good prospect of agreement. As for the Hongkong-Bangkok line, the competitors there are the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and a German firm whose agents are Messrs. Butterfield & Swire. A great deal has been heard of this struggle from time to time, and it did not seem likely that the competitors would come to an understanding.

It is stated that the Otaru Municipality has just arranged a loan of 1 million yen for the purpose of constructing waterworks. The lenders are three insurance companies of the capital, namely the Tokyo, the Meiji and the Jinju. The rate of interest is stated to be 7½ per cent. and the Municipality is to receive 96 yen for each 100 yen bond. These are very fine terms for the insurance companies. The debt is to be redeemed for three years and will thereafter be paid off in twenty-eight. It will probably strike our readers, however, that if these Tokyo insurance companies are in a position to lend money, the recent talk about their difficulties in connexion with the Hakodate fire must have been considerably exaggerated.

There is a serious difficulty with reference to the construction of the Tokyo Tetsudo's extension from Hongo to Oji. The people of the district are most anxious to have the extension made, and due application was presented to the authorities as far back as 1893, but the faculty of the Imperial University represented by Professor Tanakadate, strongly oppose the scheme on the ground that an electric railway running along the road outside the University would seriously interfere with the normal working of the seismographical instruments. The Company had endeavoured to find an alternative route, and has even examined a scheme for placing special cars on this part of their roads or for insulating the line, but as yet no thoroughly satisfactory device has been discovered.

The Niroku Shimpō has an article which is evidently inspired by a desire to discredit the Tokyo Tetsudo Company and to bring about a further depreciation of its shares. But the article is so obviously written in the interest of the bears and is further so exaggerated in tone that we refrain from any detailed notice of it. Anyone resident in Tokyo can see that the electric trams attract a constantly increasing volume of traffic, and that their earnings must be augmenting proportionately.

Tuesday, October 1.

The great bulk of the losses entailed by the Hakodate fire have been fully dealt with by the big insurance offices, but the petty companies have failed thus far to discharge their liabilities, and it is apprehended that their creditors will create some disturbance.

A general meeting of the Ina Electric Railway Company was held on the 30th ultimo in Tokyo. The projected line, as already explained in these columns, is to extend from Ida to Tatsuno in Shinshu. Among the shareholders two parties recently developed themselves, one favouring the abandonment of the enterprise, the other advocating its continuance. This was the question that had to be discussed at the general meeting, and, after several speeches, a vote was taken, the result being that those in favour of continuing the project won the day by 17,956 to 7,607.

The Mankan Sake Brewing Company, which was to have taken Manchuria and Korea as its field of operations, has decided upon abandoning the enterprise. It is said that the prospects of the Company were good enough, but the projectors felt that to attempt to obtain subscriptions for 2 million yen worth of shares in the present depressed condition of the money market would be hopeless.

The latest official estimate of the rice crop is that it will be fully 10 per cent. above the average and that the total production will be about 50 million koku.

It had been expected that the 30th ultimo would see some recovery of prices on the Stock Exchange, all anxiety about the rice crop having been removed and there being no discouraging factor in sight. But precisely the opposite result has to be recorded. The bears succeeded in gaining credence for rumours that the Tokyo Railway Company will not be able to pay a dividend of more than 6 per cent. for this half year and that the large volume of shares which are lying in certain banks at high prices on account of men who purchased some months ago, will all have to be thrown soon upon the market. These statements, coming immediately on the heels of several tolerably large sales, produced a panic, which began with the quotations for the Tokyo Railway's stock and extended to all shares, though in a minor degree. The Tokyo Railway's shares showed quite a debacle. Closing at 68 on the day immediately preceding September's settling, they made their appearance on the market at 67 on the 30th ultimo and tumbled down to less than 64 in the afternoon session. There was a slight recovery in the forenoon of the 1st instant but not enough to indicate any real restoration of strength. Meanwhile capitalists all hold aloof.

Wednesday, October 2.

On the 1st inst. the transfer of the private railways to the State was completed. The total length of the lines thus taken over is 4,370 miles, and the number of private companies concerned is 17. There are still an equal number of small companies which, between them, own an aggregate of 430 miles, but these were not included in the original programme of State purchase. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, commenting on the completion of the transfer, observes that an important question will now immediately arise, namely, the provision of funds for extending these lines.

Baron Shibusawa, speaking through the columns of the Niroku Shimbun, says that the state of affairs in economic circles after the recent war closely resembled that which followed the war with China in 1895, and in each case there had been a similar re-action following a similar display of excessive enterprise. Speaking broadly, the object kept in view by Japan formerly was to diminish her imports, but her business now is to increase her exports, and for that purpose she must develop her industries with the utmost vigour. From this point of view the spirit of enterprise which displayed itself so strongly at the close of last year and the beginning of this, was to be welcomed in the interests of the country, but it had been carried to excess and the pendulum had swung in the opposite direction, as was natural. The resulting depression had, however, lasted for a long time, and people were perplexed to account for the absence of any signal symptoms of revival. Perhaps one reason was to be found in the Government's financial policy which interfered with the development of private industry. It was to be hoped that the next budget would show an improvement in this respect. Then there was the question of companies which had been started during the boom and which found themselves unable to carry their plans to completion. Of the enterprises with which his own name was associated there were two or three of that nature, but their affairs would soon be wound up, and he thought that all projects of this doubtful kind would be ruled out of the field in the course of the next month or two. From other points of view everything favoured the revival of the spirit of enterprise, and that event might be expected when the Government's policy became known and when the doubtful companies were all disposed of.

The Customs returns show that during the first ten days of September, exports exceeded imports by 2,521,000 yen. For the period of the year ended on that day the total excess of imports still stood at 55 million yen, but before the end of the year that sum will doubtless be considerably reduced.

The sharp fall which the shares of the Tanko Steamship Company underwent on the 1st inst. is attributed to the fact that uncertainty exists as to the methods which will be followed by the directors in distributing the money paid by the Government for the Company's railways. No other cause is apparent, but in our opinion this reason seems insufficient to account for such a sudden drop. The experts, however, professed themselves unable to discover any other cause.

Dealers on the Rice Exchange seem to be growing a little reassured about the prospects of the crop for on the 1st inst. the quotations showed a slight fall.

All sorts of opinions are expressed about the prospects of the share market but there does not appear to be anything like a settled view. In the case of the Tokyo Railway, which suffered such a sudden debacle on the 30th ultimo, the explanation appears to be simple, namely, that in May last the Company received into its coffers a sum of over 8 million yen, being the first instalment on its new shares. This money is lying comparatively idle, as there has not yet been time to utilize it profitably, whereas, on the other hand, the Company has to pay a dividend on it. It is probable therefore that the December dividend will not exceed 8 per cent, and this comparatively unimportant outlook has been exploited by the bears for much more than it is worth. An expert, speaking through the columns of the Kokumin Shinbun, observes that the shares of this Company are as safe an asset as landed property and that any attempt on the part of the directors to pay a dividend not fully justified by the circumstances ought rather to have the effect of reducing the price of the shares.

Thursday, October 3.

The Niroku Shinpa, having published the opinion expressed by Baron Shibusawa with regard to the present depression in the business world of Japan and especially on the Stock Exchange, now publishes the views of Count Okuma on the same subject. The Count is as usual very severe against the financial policy of the Government. That policy he believes to be at the root of the trouble. Briefly summarised, his contention is that capitalists do not care to start important undertakings since they are confronted by the ever present possibility that so soon as an enterprise has developed large and prosperous proportions, the Government will make a State monopoly of it. The Count utterly condemns the nationalization of railways, and contends that the unfitness of the Government for such an undertaking is proved by the fact that none of the reforms which constituted the chief plea for nationalization has yet been carried out. His Excellency claims that the road for the coming of foreign capital has been closed by the Government's policy; first, because foreign capitalists have become quite uncertain about the boundaries between State enterprise and private enterprise in Japan; and secondly, because official manoeuvres have rendered it virtually impossible for foreign capital to enter through any door except that of the Industrial Bank. The result is that agents who came here prepared to offer money on comparatively easy terms, have all been driven away disappointed, and have thus been converted into so many hostile critics of Japanese finance. The Count further condemns the weight of taxation, regarding it as a fatal obstacle to the enterprise of domestic capitalists, who are driven to think more about their own annual expenditures than about engaging in new ventures. His Excellency reaches the conclusion that the people themselves are ultimately to blame, since they refrain from exercising the power given to them by the franchise, and thus leave the Government free to follow its own vagaries.

The above views of the Count, so far as they relate to official interference in business concerns, appear to be shared by Japanese men of affairs, for it is stated that at the general meeting of Chambers of Commerce, which is to take place on the 7th inst., this question will be discussed and will probably lead to some representation to the Government.

Referring to the now urgent problem of dissolving companies formed during the recent boom and obviously having no prospect of success in existing circumstances, the Nippon instances the case of the Senshu Domei Kisen Kaisha. This big enterprise, which was formed with the idea of absorbing into its ranks practically all the principal steamships owned by private Japanese, apart from those belonging to companies with established lines, is now in the throes of perplexity. Its original capital was fixed at 20 million yen and subsequently increased to 30 millions. But after the business depression had set in, the latter figure was restored to its original dimensions, and then there was talk of still further reducing it to 15 millions, whereof 10 millions would represent the assessed value of the steamers and 5 would serve for floating capital. But now an idea begins to prevail that the total abandonment of the scheme is the only rational course. One difficulty in the way of dissolution is that whereas the establishment expenses were originally put at 40,000 yen, the actual expenses have been 50,000, and the question is whence to obtain the difference. It is expected, however, that things will culminate about the middle of this month when another general meeting will have to be held.

The difficulties of the petty insurance companies in connexion with the Hakodate fire are attracting increased attention. The five big companies, as we stated in a previous issue, have all discharged their liabilities to the full, but the minor companies have not paid a cent. Principal among the latter is the Nisshu Kaisha (Nichiren Sect Company), which is said to be in such a state of confusion that it does not defray even the salaries of its employees. Count Yanagisawa and Messrs. Hiranuma and Mudaguchi have been appointed to act as a committee for investigating this Company's concerns, and it is expected that in the event of much more delay the Government will step in and take peremptory measures.

It is stated that some of the insurance companies have resolved not to invest their reserves in shares as they have hitherto done, inasmuch as the fluctuations in the market value of such securities render them an inconvenient asset. It was for this reason that three of the principal companies, namely, the Meiji, the Tokyo and the Jinju, recently clubbed together to take up the whole of the loan of a million yen issued on account of the Otaru Municipality.

The Yomiuri Shinbun says that great reforms are on the point of being undertaken by the Tokyo Railway Company. These measures were fully understood to be necessary at the time of the amalgamation of the three companies, but owing to the larger problems then pressing for solution, such, for example, as the question of municipal ownership, arrangements connected with the amalgamation and so forth, the operations of reform had to be deferred. They are now about to be carried out, however, and it is expected that a large reduction of expenditures will result. A sum of 200,000 yen is spoken of as likely to be saved in one direction only.

It is stated that under the auspices of Marquis Katsura a large company is to be formed with a capital of 10 million yen. It will be called the Chosen Takushoka Kaisha, and its prime object will be to supply funds for enterprises of agriculture and fishery in Korea. The projectors expect to obtain from the Government a charter conferring powers similar to those enjoyed by the Manchuria Railway Company.

The company which has been talked of for some time as likely to be formed for the purpose of supplying gas to the inhabitants of Seoul, is now said to be on the point of coming into existence. It is called the Nikkan Gas Jointstock Company, and its capital is 3 million yen, one quarter of which will be called up at first. Baron Shibusawa is amongst the chief promoters, and the Tokyo Gas Company, of which he is President, will have close connexions with the new concern. Viscount Sone's son is also among the projectors. The Company looks for a twenty-five years' charter granting to it a monopoly for supplying gas to the Korean capital for that period.

There is said to be a marked revival of trade in the line of woven stuffs. Large orders have come in from Osaka, Kyushu and other localities, owing partly to the fact that weaving work had been nearly suspended during the past half year of depression, and mainly to the prospects of the rice crop which are now said to be assured.

On the 2nd inst. there was something like a debacle in the rice market. Prices had been kept up unduly by the unsettled state of the weather, but all danger on that score having now disappeared, there was a sudden fall, which reached as much as 26 sen per koku for December delivery. Such a fall is very unusual in the rice market. Towards the close of the afternoon session things became a little easier, but it is evident that operators on 'Change are now convinced as to the nature of rice crop.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN TOKYO.

Between the hours of 7 and 8 on the evening of the 30th ultimo fire broke out in the western corner of the upper story of the Goni Kai. The big building, being constructed of painted clapboards, was ideal material for a fire, and in a very short time the whole place was totally consumed. The flames spread also to the next-door building in which the office of the Progressists was situated, and, crossing the road, they demolished the block of buildings belonging to Dr. Masujima as well as the offices of the Glass Company and others. Mr. Brindley's offices escaped almost miraculously for the flames destroyed the next door building. The origin of the fire remains obscure but it is not thought to have been a case of incendiarism. Nothing is as yet stated about the amount in which these various buildings were insured.

We learn that there are very severe comments on the procedure of the Tokyo fire-men in connexion with Monday night's conflagration. It is alleged that there was a marked lack of organization and unity of effort, and that the pumps had not power to reach the roof of the comparatively lofty buildings which were attacked or threatened. Moreover, as was the case recently in Kobe when the offices of Messrs. Carlowitz and Company were burned, the firemen made the mistake of breaking down all the windows and doors of a threatened building, the obvious consequence being that a draught was created to help the advent of sparks. It is possible, of course, that the firemen devoted their main attention to the task of saving the Kwangyo Bank which stood in the vicinity of the outbreak, and that they were thus prevented from extending competent help to the buildings on the opposite side of the street. But that explanation involves the hypothesis that their numbers were not nearly sufficient, for it is plain that they should be in ample force to guard all the avenues along which the flames might invade other structures. And what is to be said about the fact that the fire-engines had not sufficient power to drive the water roof-high? We venture to invite the attention of the Municipality to these facts, and the attention of the insurance companies still more, for it is obviously in the latter's interests to see that the fire-men and their implements are competent. The conflagration took place in one of the most central parts of the capital; the night was comparatively calm, and yet the flames were suffered to leap across a road some 20 yards wide. It is not a good record.

The fire at the Goni-kan on the night of the 30th ultimo destroyed six buildings in all and was responsible for one death and seventeen injured men. The total loss incurred is said to have been 300,000 yen, of which 170,000 was covered by insurance. Four insurance offices, one of them foreign, had written policies for 22,500 yen each on the Goni-kan building, and a fifth, a Japanese office, is responsible for another 10,000, so that the company which owns the building will recover 110,000 yen. Mr. Masujima's buildings were insured for 40,000 yen in two Japanese companies, and the office of the Progressists was covered to the extent of 25,000 yen. Unfortunately the exhibits in the Goni-kan seem to have been virtually uninsured, the total policies written on their account not exceeding 2,000 yen. It would follow therefore, if the above estimate be correct, that the loss to the exhibitors must be about 170,000 yen. This failure to insure is singular, for the nature of the building ought to have imperatively suggested that caution. The eminent architect, Mr. J. Conder, whose experience in Japan is unique, commented strongly on the inflammable character of the building when it was first erected, and even went so far as to warn his family and friends against frequenting it much.

THE "KOKKA."

No. 208 of the Kokka, just issued, does not contain any special essays as has been generally the case with its predecessors. The letterpress is devoted, for the most part, to descriptions of the illustrations, which descriptions, however, contain a great deal of general information. Only one of these descriptive essays is signed, namely, that by Mr. K. Hanada on the Ye-makimono of the latter part of the Fujiwara period. During that era of Japanese history, the men may be said to have degenerated into effeminacy and the women to have risen above their usual sphere, so that nearly all the memorable literature of the time was from female hands. Hence it fell out that the makimono which have been transmitted from the Fujiwara time were mostly intended to illustrate such works as the Genji Monogatari, the Murasaki Shikibu Nikki and the Nezame Monogatari. They lose nothing in interest from that fact, and the reproductions of them in the Kokka are very attractive, especially when we recall the fact that these paintings date from an era nearly 800 years ago. We are also here treated to some valuable remarks, presumably by the editor, on the Gaki Zoshi (stories of famished demons) which curious work was elaborately illustrated by Tosa Mitsunaga. Then follow reproductions of pine-trees by Kano Eitoku, a splendid specimen of fine art applied to decorative purposes, and then the great keramist, Nomura Ninsei, is introduced to us as a painter, a role in which he can scarcely be said to have shone. The volume concludes with a copy of a beautiful picture by Sesson, and with a short but pithy review of the Kogwa-bikô (Notes on ancient pictures).

FURTHER WAR HONOURS.

We take the following from the Japan Times:-

The staff of the Kokumin Koenkai (Association for giving national support to sailors and soldiers) has been rewarded for its services during the war.

Mr. I. Tokutomi, editor of the Kokumin, Mr. T. Kanamori and Mr. Shiroku Kuroiwa, editor of the Yorodzu Choho, are given a golden cup each.

Messrs. Jue Harada, Tsuneichiro Muramatsu, Tetsujiro Miyazawa, Sei Onjôji, Shujiro Shigeno, Yasujiro Ishikawa, Chokyu Uyejima, and Seifu Otani, are given 300 yen each. They are mostly journalists.

BUSINESSMEN DECORATED.

In recognition of services rendered to the State during the war, business men were decorated as follows:-

Grand Cordon of Rising Sun (1st Order), Baron Matsuo, Governor of the Bank of Japan.

First Class Order of the Sacred Treasure, Baron Takahashi, Vice-Governor of the Bank of Japan.

Rising Sun of Double Rays (2nd Order): Baron Y. Iwasaki, Baron K. Iwasaki, Baron Shibusawa, Baron Mitsui, Mr. Kondo, President of the N.Y.K., and Mr. Denzaburo Fujita.

Second Class Order of the Sacred Treasure:- Messrs. Okura, Soyeda, Sonoda, Sumitomo, and Yasuda.

Middle Cordon of Rising Sun (3rd Order):- Messrs. Nakahashi, Masuda, Hayakawa, Soma and Takata.

Third Class Order of Sacred Treasure:- Messrs. Kyn Shimamura and Kahei Otani.

Minor Cordon of Rising Sun (4th Order):- Messrs. Shoda, Ichibel Tanaka, Zen-e-mon Konoike, and Kyohei Makoshi.

Fourth Class Order of Sacred Treasure:- Messrs. G. Shimura, Kenzo Koyama, T. Mitsui, Gunnosuke Sasaki, T. Toyokawa, C. Machida, K. Ikeda, G. Nomoto, S. Iwashita, T. Shidachi, S. Toyama, S. Okaya, Mr. Sekito, J. Ito, Tomitaro Hara, K. Saida, and E. Asabuki.

Fifth Class Order of Rising Sun:- Messrs. F. Hara, Senzo Hiranuma, S. Asano, Y. Mogi, Jiroemon Watanabe, Taizo Abe, Chokuon Katataka, T. Tanabe, J. Nishimura, D. Suyenobu, and Y. Fukuhara.

Fifth Order of Sacred Treasure:- Messrs. M. Doi, R. Nakano, K. Kawasaki, S. Nakai, G. Kobayashi, T. Mayegawa, J. Satsuma, K. Horiguchi, J. Sugimura, S. Nakamura, K. Haniaguchi, I. Wakao, K. Hirooka, K. Ukida, J. Takeda, Hikotaro Abe, Ichitaro Abe, J. Okahashi, Gon-emon Ukon, U. Shibakawa and the late Mr. Junkichi Furukawa.

Some further grants of patents of nobility have been made in the sequel of the war. They are published in the Official Gazette of the 3rd inst. They comprise one Count, namely Kodama, one Viscount, namely Tatsumi, and eight Barons, namely, Mayeda, Arai, Kodama, Tsunoda, Togo, Matsumura, Yamamoto and Saso.

All the above are the eldest sons of officers who distinguished themselves in the war but died before the time came for receiving their guerdon. From the fact of the publication of the above list, we infer that some more titles of nobility will be granted. In some quarters it had been supposed that the list was closed, and much surprise had therefore been expressed at the emission of the names of any business-men with the exception of those directly connected with the Government. This complaint will doubtless prove to have been mistaken.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE "ENIENTE."

On Thursday afternoon was the time appointed for the festivities organised by the Tokyo Municipality and the Business Men of the capital at the Kilin-Kan in Ueno, Park to celebrate the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese Entente. The programme was that the speeches and amusements should take place from 5 to 6 p.m., after which there was to be a great banquet. The weather, which during the whole of the previous week had been ideal, was wet and chilly on the forenoon of this particular day but the afternoon proved bright and beautiful. The Japanese seem to welcome these festivities with great empressement. They evidently think that although the Governments and military men of Russia and Japan had already shaken hands, the peoples of the two countries had still to perform that ceremony, and that the Ueno celebration marked its performance. The Yomiuri Shimbun justly remarks that history does not contain any other instance of such a rapid rapprochement between two countries after a fierce war. The evident inference to be drawn, in our contemporary's opinion, is that no solid partition divided the two peoples and that their falling out was due mainly to a misunderstanding.

THE HOUSE OF PEERS.

Owing to the recent creations of new peers in the sequel of the war a difference will be found in the composition of the Upper Chamber. The Japanese system provides that Princes and Marquises sit by right of title, and that Counts, Viscounts and Barons each return by election a fixed proportion of their total numbers within a certain limit. Under this rule the Viscounts have hitherto been the most powerful body numerically in the Chamber, the Barons being in a marked minority. But when the next election for the Upper Chamber takes place in 1911 that order will be changed, inasmuch as the recent creations have greatly augmented the number of the Barons, and it will probably be still further augmented, as some additional creations are confidently expected. Apart from these future creations, however, actual numbers in the various Orders of nobility now stand thus:—Princes 15; Marquises 39; Counts 102; Viscounts 384, and Barons 386. At the next election for the Upper Chamber, the three last Orders will be entitled to return 16 Counts, 62 Viscounts and 63 Barons. This will mean that the number of Counts now having seats in the Chamber will be reduced by 1, and the number of Viscounts by 8, whereas the Barons will receive an augmentation of 7. Thus there will be a nett difference of 15 in the strength of the Barons for the purpose of a division, and the lowest Order of the nobility will become a powerful political factor. Doubtless this change will make for increased conservatism in the Chamber, as the Barons, whether new creations or old, will more or less consist of men who owe their patents to service in the ranks of officialdom.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Colonel Matsuishi, who has just returned from a visit to St. Petersburg, had an opportunity while in that city of conversing with General Linevitch. He describes the General as a man of great activity in spite of his 72 years of age, and as being entirely without concealments or reservations. The General, while claiming to be a friend of Kuropatkin, condemned the latter's history of the war as exceedingly partial and declared his intention of controverting many of the statements contained in it. Speaking of the Battle of Mukden, he said that had the plans suggested by him found favour in Kuropatkin's eyes, Nogi's turning movement would have been frustrated, but that unfortunately Kuropatkin took a different course. He further affirmed that had the war continued a little longer, it would have ended in the defeat of the Japanese. (That is to say, had the war continued after General Linevitch himself had been appointed commander-in-chief.) Colonel Matsuishi, comparing Linevitch and Kuropatkin, says that the characteristic of the latter's strategy was extreme caution. Before every engagement he laid his plans minutely and carefully, choosing the first, the second and the third positions for his armies, and generally making every possible provision for all eventualities including retreat. Linevitch, on the contrary, is essentially a man of daring and action. He stakes great results on a single coup, and does not hesitate to incur risks if any gain be in sight. Of course the latter method may achieve much but is also liable to crushing disaster.

The autumn manoeuvres this year are to be on an exceptionally large scale. It is said that they will commence on the 15th of November, and that the locality will be between Mayebashii and Mito, a distance of 75 miles. The troops engaged will be the Guards, the First, the Third and the Fifteenth Divisions; a total force of some 40,000 men. The manoeuvres are to be devised mainly with the object of testing the various special corps which have been created by the Army Department since the war; namely, the railway corps, the bridge corps, the heavy-gun corps, the machine-gun corps, the telegraph and telephone corps, the balloon corps and the cavalry. The manoeuvres will thus be of exceptional interest, and it is stated that numerous applications for permission to attend them have been received from foreign officers.

The Department of Education is said to have finally decided on adopting the suggestions put forth by the High Schools for improving the method of teaching foreign languages in Japan. Our readers will remember that this question lately attracted much attention and was greatly discussed. The two measures which are now to be sanctioned are very simple. One is that the number of students in one class taught by one teacher shall be reduced to convenient dimensions, the other, that the system of one student one language shall henceforth be put into operation—in other words, whereas it is now optional for a student to take up two or even three languages, he will henceforth be required to study one only. These changes will certainly be useful, but we adhere to our often expressed opinion that until better salaries are paid and a higher class of teachers employed, there can be no radical improvement.

The Minister of State for Foreign Affairs entertained at luncheon on the 30th ultimo his Excellency Mr. Taft. There were also present his Excellency the United States Ambassador and Major-General Edwards, and the Japanese guests were Count Yamamoto, Viscount Terauchi, Viscount Kagawa, Mr. Nagasaki (of the Imperial Household), Mr. Chinda and Mr. Yamaza.

The operation was performed on Baron Iwasaki on the 1st inst. in the University Hospital. It appears to have been quite successful so far as the immediate results are concerned, but of course in the case of such a heavy operation—the complete removal of the bone of the cheek and jaw—no assurance can be felt until another week has passed. Thus far, however, there is no fever nor any other unfavourable symptom. The pulse is normal, and although the patient was under chloroform for two hours, no nausea resulted. Many anxious eyes will be turned in the direction of Hongo during the next few days.

The elections for the members of the prefectural and city assemblies have now been almost concluded. Returns are published for 33 prefectures and 3 cities. As usual, the arithmetic of the Tokyo newspapers is defective, but we gather that out of 1,108 members, the Seiyun-kai has succeeded in returning 691, the Progressists 329 and the Daigo Club 38.

Some interesting figures have been published with reference to the comparative wealth of the nations of the world. There is always an uncertain element in these calculations, and the uncertainty is marked in Japan's case, because the science of statistics has not been developed in this country so fully as in the case of Western States where all matters of finance have been subjected to minute scrutiny for a much longer period. However, we may take the calculation for Japan to be a tolerably close approximation. With that proviso the figures are as follow:—

	Total Wealth. Yen.	Wealth per unit of population. Yen.
Japan	25,140,389,576	503
England	112,800,000,000	2,964
France	102,176,020,000	2,688
Germany	77,244,000,000	1,928
Italy	35,532,000,000	1,300
Russia	61,044,000,000	660
United States ..	153,888,000,000	2,520

Japan thus stands at the bottom of the list. But her industrial career is still in its infancy, and to make anything like a just comparison with Occidental countries, it would be necessary to go back a very long time in their financial story, which is of course impossible.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

On the morning of Sept. 29th, the Sasuga Shokai's steamer Tsukai Maru (502 tons), collided with the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's steamer Hiroshima Maru (3,282 tons) off Wada Point near Kobe. The Tsukai sustained damage aft. She entered Kobe harbour for repairs. The Hiroshima is uninjured.

Fire broke out on board the steamer No. 14th Nagata Maru (497 tons) at Cheshoo at 8 a.m. on Sept. 30th. The flames, which originated in the engine room, spread throughout the ship causing heavy damage. The vessel belongs to Mr. S. Nagata of Osaka. She was not insured.

The Mitsui Bussan Kaisha's sailing vessel Mifuku Maru, with coal, collided on the morning of Sept. 30th with the steamer Taro Maru. The former was from Wakamatsu to Moji. The Mifuku was sunk, but the crew were saved.

The paragraph which appeared in Japanese papers and was translated into these columns stating that the steamer Habsburg is missing, appears to have been a distortion of the news referring to the steamer Suberg, which has gone amissing on a voyage from Haiphong to Hongkong. As a matter of fact we learn from the agents, Messrs. C. Illies & Co., who have telegraphic information of the Habsburg's movements, that that vessel left Colombo homeward on Sunday, Sept. 22nd.

THE VALUE OF "TOFU" FOR DIABETIC PATIENTS.

The Kobe Herald has received the following communication from a local medical correspondent:—As a physician who has had occasion to be interested in a dietary for diabetic patients, and knowing that there are a large number of such in Kobe, among foreigners as well as Japanese, for their benefit I would like to give one result of my study of foods for such cases. A substitute for bread is the most difficult problem. Gluten flour is recommended but what is sold under that name is mostly only a by-product in the manufacture of starch. It contains less starch than ordinary wheat flour, but the percentage is still high; and as the carbohydrates—starch as well as sugar—cannot be assimilated in diabetes, bread of all kinds must be discarded. As a substitute, the Japanese tofu, or bean curd, has proved very satisfactory. This is made from beans, the starch being precipitated in the process so that the curd, while having a high percentage of protein, or nourishing substance, contains but a little over one and one half per cent. of carbohydrates (Tahara) while bread contains over fifty-three per cent. If tofu be dipped in egg and fried in butter or beef-fat, or if it be boiled, it will prove very nourishing and suitable. It is also very palatable to most persons, the taste being hardly distinguishable from that of the egg. Tofu is therefore a satisfactory substitute for potato and bread in the dietary of diabetics.

YOKOHAMA AND ITS CHARITIES.

THE charitable instincts of the foreign community of Yokohama are proverbial. We doubt, indeed, whether any other seaport town of its size in any part of the world is more open-handed or more ready to listen to appeals for help and, what is more, having listened, is so keen to extend practicable assistance to the poor and needy, the waifs and strays, the flotsam and jetsam of humanity which the tides of life drop at its doors. For many years this charity was exercised in a very indiscriminate fashion and there is no doubt that it was greatly abused. At length when the burden was growing altogether too much for individuals to bear, certain leaders in the community met together and the outcome of their deliberations was the formation of the Yokohama Charity Organization Society which took up the business in a systematic way, producing order out of chaos, and, by the exercise of a wise discrimination, saw to it that the contributions it received in trust from the community were applied to the best advantage, while the beachcomber, heretofore a great encumbrance, was practically eliminated from our daily life. The work involved no slight labour, but that labour was ungrudgingly given, and the community were relieved to no small extent of what had grown to be a great and intolerable nuisance. For many years the Charity Organization were able to work in conjunction with the officers of the Salvation Army Seamen's Home, but now that the latter institution is closed, other means have had to be adopted to satisfactorily deal with the class of people who come within the scope of the Society's work. Another and equally serious aspect of the problem which confronted the meeting held on Tuesday was the big deficiency which the Committee had to report this year—yen 1,156.84. This of course will soon be cleared off when the new subscription list goes round the town, but it gives some idea of the difficulties under which the Committee have laboured during the past twelve months and the calls it has had upon its funds. They relieved 72 destitute persons during that period, the nationalities being:—

British..... 16	Russian ... 2	Norwegian .. 4
American... 31	French ... 1	Unknown ... 5
German ... 9	Austrian ... 3

Of course the greater number of these were seamen and men following the profession of the sea, and the question has been asked by many, whether the foreign Consulates could not do more in the way of assisting the destitute seamen of their respective nationalities. But the amount of money placed at the disposal of the British Consulate, for instance, for the relief of shipwrecked mariners who swear allegiance to King EDWARD VII. is ridiculously small, and we presume that it is the same with the other Consulates. Distressed and destitute seamen—many, it is true, destitute through their own thoughtless actions—we shall always have with us, and due provision must be made for them.

The meeting held in Yokohama on Tuesday to consider the new scheme for dealing with the organised charity of the foreign community was highly successful in its results. Seldom has a public gathering of its kind been better attended and seldom have the Yokohama public had laid before them a more lucid explanation of the immediate problem before the meeting than that contained in the well-reasoned and clearly delivered speech of Mr. C. V. SAIR, the chairman. All aspects of the case were explained and then a well-considered scheme was unfolded for rejection or approval. Naturally the meeting approved. The new scheme under which the Yokohama Charity Organization will work in harmony with the Salvation Army is this:—

The Salvation Army will take new premises, away from the temptations which surrounded the former place in the Honmura Road—[the notorious "Blood Town" of Kipling's poem]—and will cater for the Naval and Mercantile men requiring meals or beds while ashore. In a separate division of the premises work will be provided for destitute men, who will receive board and lodging in return, until such time as means can be found to send them away. The dietary will be sufficient for health, but will be simple, unattractive and cheap. It would be open to each man to supplement this subsistence diet by means of good work and good conduct. If any applicant for charity should refuse to work, complaint will be made to the police by the officer in charge of the Home. Mr. Yuasa, the chief of police in the Ken, has promised to co-operate in the scheme by acting on such complaints, and by arresting and detaining for one week any man found wandering about the streets without visible means of subsistence.

This problem of dealing with the wastage and wreckage of humanity, the unemployable as the Chairman termed them, is engaging the attention of many thoughtful men and women in all quarters of the world, and perhaps the Salvation Army's idea of a Labour Yard is about the best solution that can be devised. In England it has been demonstrated over and over again that the professional tramp studiously avoids troubling the Unions and Workhouses where he is required to do a little work in return for a night's lodging and breakfast, patronising only those places where conditions are "dead easy." Perhaps when it becomes known that Yokohama also demands a slight expenditure of labour in return for bed and board, the tribes of the ne'er-do wells will take the hint and go elsewhere. That of course, remains to be seen. Meanwhile all genuine cases of distress will be relieved in Yokohama as readily and as speedily as they were in days of yore. Mr. BEART and his committee can depend, we are sure, on receiving the hearty support and financial backing of the whole community in the charitable and usually thankless work they have voluntarily undertaken.

THE LIMITS OF ADOPTION.

THE Japanese claim that they have not blindly imitated Western civilization, but have merely adopted the best elements of it, retaining, meanwhile, whatever was really good in their own refined and in many respects unique civilization. There can not be any sincere denial of the claim in its broad aspect. But; in our opinion, the process of selection is still incomplete. There are still some matters in which Japan seems to be exercising her imitative faculties rather than her discriminatory. Such a matter is her treatment of the press. No day now passes without furnishing some proof, more or less flagrant, that the almost absolute liberty of pen which Occidental custom endorses is among the unequivocal abuses of the age. There has been a gradual elimination of all cool judgment in this business. High-sounding sentiments about the rights of free speech and free thought born into the world with every free man, have created an emotional atmosphere which effectually blurs the true outlines of right and wrong, and have betrayed legislators into granting to the press a degree of licence not conceded to any other section of society. Why should Japan adopt that particular phase of our civilization? Take, for example, the case of a periodical like the Tokyo Puck. In No. 26 of its Vol. 3 and in No. 6 of its last Monthly Supplement, that periodical publishes pictures which, with their letter-press, constitute the grossest possible violation of the sanctity of private life, and are, moreover, plainly calculated to impair morality. Many of our readers know exactly what our reference means, and will endorse our assertion that more scandalous matter has seldom, if ever, been published in a newspaper with impunity. It is true that in the same line of business there are even worse sinners to be found in the Occident. But precisely because that is the case we think that Japan's adoption of foreign customs might well stop short of extravagant tolerance. It is a universally accepted principle that the rights enjoyed by one member of Society must be kept within the limit of not encroaching upon the sphere of another member's rights. That principle is plainly ignored when a newspaper, under plea of the right of free speech, invades the privacy of the household and brings unhappiness into family circles and unjust contumely upon men who have deserved well of their country. Some will urge that the remedy lies with the individual, that the courts of law are open to him. Yes, but in seeking that remedy two obstacles stand in the way; one is the insufficiency of the law itself—a defect very palpable in the Japanese law of libel—; the other, that the tribunals of justice have been infected by this same wanton spirit of liberty, and there is thus conceded to barristers a degree of licence which converts an appeal to the law courts into an ordeal often more painful and injurious than the original offence. It is of course much easier to discourse about these evils than to remedy them, but that they are very flagrant evils and that society is sharply suffering from them, no thoughtful person will deny. In the field of politics it might be difficult to impose limits. Yet the indisputable fact is that illustrated newspapers contribute a larger share to fostering racial prejudices and fomenting international animosities than any other discernible factor. Thus the very periodical which directly elicits these remarks, the Tokyo Puck, published, with reference to the San Francisco affair, pictures such as could not fail to anger any American citizen under whose eyes they came, and we shall not be speaking unjustly or extravagantly when we say that the admirable moderation and self-restraint shown by the Japanese press during the recent labour-question complications, were notably marred by the excesses of the Tokyo Puck. One positive vice goes further to destroy a reputation than a dozen negative virtues go to build it up, and the editors of the Tokyo Puck may be assured that they have succeeded in standing between their country and the whole-hearted tribute which the world would otherwise have accorded to her demeanour in the late troubles with America. And now the immodest and scandalous illustrations appearing in that periodical are raising in the minds of foreigners the question whether any Occidental lady can hope to find a secure and happy home in a Japanese household, unless her husband be too obscure to offer a target inviting the shafts of these scurrilous libellers. No one can pretend to think that things are properly ordered where such abuses flourish unchecked. Japan claims for herself an eclectic role, and in this matter she might most advantageously stop short of endowing speech and pen with freedom which has proved itself so mischievous in its exercise.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

In writing these Summaries it has always been our earnest endeavour to supply a faithful record of as many phases of Japanese thought as find expression in books, magazines and newspapers. The attitude of the Japanese mind to religion varies much according to education, tastes, prejudices and interests. But it is certainly true to say that as a whole the educated world in Japan is opposed to all forms of alleged supernaturalism, whether Buddhist or Christian. It follows that the leaders of thought in this country see grave objections to the acceptance of the creed preached by the missionaries of our home churches, and in their writings boldly assert that belief in the doctrines of orthodox Christianity could not only do no good here, but would work much harm. In a little book published in England (Constable) called "The Japanese Spirit" Professor Okakura says:—"We do not see any convincing reason why morals should be based upon the teaching of a special denomination, in face of the fact that we can be upright and brave without the help of a creed with a God or deities at its other end." Dr. L. Gulick in his work on "The Evolution of the Japanese" quotes Prince Itô's remarks on the same subject. "I regard religion itself as quite unnecessary for a nation's life," says the Prince; "Science is far above superstition; and what is religion, Buddhism or Christianity, but superstition, and therefore a possible source of weakness to a nation? I do not regret the tendency to free thought and atheism, which is almost universal in Japan, because I do not regard it as a source of danger to the community." The occasion which calls for the above remarks is the publication by Dr. Katô Hiroyuki of a very strongly worded and pronounced anti-Christian essay entitled Waga Kokutai to Kirisutokyo, a copy of which has been kindly forwarded to us by the learned author. The material now given to the public in the shape of a pamphlet formed part of a paper prepared for the Gakushikai in last June. The essay covers 99 pages of matter, most of which is printed in large type. There is little doubt that the work will have a large circulation and that it will become the subject of much controversy. As far as our space allows we give an epitome of its contents. The treatise is divided into five chapters. The headings are as follows:—Chap. I. Faith and Knowledge—Religion and Science. Chap. II. Race Religions and World Religions. Chap. III. Buddhism and the Japanese State. Chap. IV. Christianity and the Japanese State. Chap. V. Scientific Proofs. In Chap. I. Dr. Katô tells us that he is opposed to religion, both Christian and Buddhist, on the ground that it encourages superstition, which is the greatest of all obstacles to the progress of knowledge. The immaculate conception of Christ, his alleged resurrection and the miracles attributed to him are of course all the inventions of superstitious minds, says Dr. Katô. The many stories relating to the birth and after-life of Shaka Muni, which attribute to him supernatural powers, are equally false and silly. The circulation of, and subsequent belief in, these Christian and Buddhist stories in an unscientific age was unavoidable, but in these enlightened days it is the duty of all earnest-minded, educated men to unequivocally oppose the propagation of falsehood under the guise of truth. It is a public calamity that not only ignorant peasants and artisans should in Europe and America believe in the stories circulated by Christian teachers but that even educated men should in a good many cases have neglected to test their trustworthiness. The plea that what is taught transcends human knowledge Dr. Katô says, can deceive no thinking man; for it is plain that what transcends human knowledge can not be known to Christian teachers, who have no special sources of knowledge not accessible to laymen. Dr. Katô is of opinion that Christian and Buddhist teaching has in past ages done more harm than good, since this teaching has proved a constant hindrance to the spread of scientific knowledge. In Chap. II. Dr. Katô argues that the cosmopolitan character of Christianity and Buddhism render them dangerous to the State. In each country the State must be supreme. To allow the existence of authority that on occasions may override that of the State, as actually took place in Europe when the Papal power was at its height, is to expose a State to serious peril.* To Dr. Katô it appears that a national religion like Judaism or Brahmanism is far less dangerous to a State than a religion that claims allegiance on account of its possessing authority which is assumed to be superior to that of all civil Governments. In modern times Christian authority over States is denied in practice. It is quite plain that the interests of each State are different, and that no State can afford to forego any of its interests in obedience to the doctrines of what are known as cosmopolitan religions. In Chap. III. Dr. Katô, while admitting that Buddhism has conferred not a few benefits on Japan, contends that it always encouraged the superstition among the lower orders it found in the country when first it was preached here, and has spread a number of new silly beliefs respecting spirits, demons, and what not. Fortunately the propagation of Confucianism saved the middle and upper classes from the bad influence of Buddhist teaching during the Tokugawa era, and, moreover, Buddhism by a series of compromises and adaptations to surroundings gratified national sentiment and kept up the worship of Shintô gods under Buddhist names, thus avoiding a conflict with the State; yet there were times when it gave the State trouble and the plentiful crop of superstitions which in successive ages it sowed cannot easily be rooted up in these enlightened days. Buddhism, like Christianity, being a cosmopolitan religion, takes no cognizance of any particular State. All States and all countries are on an equality according to its teaching. In

* This consideration had much to do with the rise and subsequent success of Protestantism in Europe.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

Chap. IV. Dr. Katô argues that the Christian assumption of superiority to other creeds and the refusal of Christians to modify their teaching out of deference to national belief and sentiment constitute a real danger to States. According to Christianity there is only one true God. All men have sinned against him, and can only be saved by believing that Christ has atoned for their sins. There is no salvation for anybody who rejects the unproved allegations of Christian ministers. Nobody is allowed to pick and choose. The whole creed of Christendom must be accepted by those who wish to be called Christians. No compromise of any kind is permitted. Therefore it follows that Christianity can never be assimilated by the Japanese State. To attempt to assimilate it would be to destroy it. (Kirisutokyo no honshi (本質) ga kayô de aru kara, kono honshi (main purpose or essential meaning) ni kisu wo tsukeru koto mo dekinu hazu no mono de aru. Moshi kono honshi ni itten demo kisu wo tsukereba, Kirisutokyo wa sude ni mattaku horobiru no de aru. Shite mireba, Kirisutokyo ga Nihon no kokutai ni dootoku suru nado to in koto wa tôdai dekinu koto de aru.) One of Dr. Katô's objections to Christianity is the fact that it places God on a higher throne than the Emperor and his ancestors. "We Japanese," says he, "know of no being who is higher than the Emperor."* In Chap. V. Dr. Katô maintains that the conception of the personal God to whom Christians give the name of the "True God" is illogical and unscientific and that for educated Japanese to get to believe in such a God would be a step backwards. There is nothing in the teaching of Christian theologians concerning God that is supported by the kind of evidence which satisfies thoroughly enlightened scholars to-day. The spread of Christianity in Japan is the spread of superstition, and what educated men is there who can look on with complacency while this goes on?†

The Kirisutokyo Sekai (Congregational) refers to a speech bearing on Christianity in Japan made by Dr. Inoue Tetsujirô at a large meeting of Directors of Provincial Middle Schools held in Tôkyô a few months ago. Dr. Inoue is reported to have made the following remark on that occasion: "Formerly Christianity in this country was not in agreement with the State, but such is no longer the case." This admission caused great surprise at the time it was made and has since been the subject of much comment. The Kirisutokyo Sekai asks what difference there is between the new and the old form of Christianity, and comes to the conclusion that the Christianity to which in former years Dr. Inoue so strongly objected was the Occidental Christianity which had been propagated here unchanged, whereas the Christianity of which the learned Doctor approves to-day is Japonicized Christianity. Into the doctrinal changes which have taken place the organ we are quoting does not go, but simply lays stress on the significance of Dr. Inoue's change of attitude towards Christianity in Government schools. It seems now to be generally held, says the Kirisutokyo Sekai, that Christianity in schools can do no harm whatever to the Japanese State. This opens the way for Christian work in Government schools.

We stated in a former Summary that the Missionaries of the German General Evangelical Protestant Missionary Society, the Rev. H. Haas, the Rev. M. Ostwald and the Rev. E. Schiller,

* In an invitation to attend a celebration of the 20th Anniversary of a Charity Association sent to Dr. Katô the words Tempu no go meijo to Ryô Heika no go jinkoku ni yotte. (By the Heavenly Father's help and the virtues of their Imperial Majesties) occurred. Dr. Katô takes offence at these words, and writes thus:—Tempu naru mono wa dai ichi-i (位) ni shite Ryô Heika wa dai ni-i ni oita, kore wa madosomo waga kokutai wa hegashiru dai fukei no koto de aru to omoi.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

† Some persons assert that Dr. Katô knows nothing of Christianity. That, however, is incorrect. We ourselves have often conversed with him on the subject and we have found that every important Christian doctrine is quite familiar to him. Dr. Katô is too scholarly to write on any subject he has not studied.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

have agreed to unite with the Kumiai Kyōkai in training theological students and other branches of Christian work. This movement has evidently been misunderstood by certain people. An article on the subject penned by Mr. Makino Toraji, published in the Kirisutokyo Sekai on July 11th, stated that the German Missionaries had given up mission work in Tōkyō, and insinuated that their Christians had been handed over to the Congregationalists. This and other remarks made by Mr. Makino formed the subject of two letters addressed to the Kirisutokyo Sekai and published on August 1st, one written by Mr. Schiller, from Nikkō, and the other by Mr. T. Aoki. According to these communications there has been no retiring from mission work on the part of the foreign and Japanese members of the Japanese Church founded by the German Evangelical Society in Tōkyō. The object of the union which has been effected with the Kumiai churches is an increase of strength and efficiency. The benefits obtained are mutual. Mr. Schiller tells us that the Church founded by German missionaries belonging to his Society has never been a German Church. It is wholly Japanese, though it has received pecuniary assistance from foreign sympathizers from time to time.

The Kirisutokyo Sekai announces that the Kumiai Kyōkai will hold its 23rd General Synod at Ōsaka in October. The meetings will begin on the 19th and last till the 22nd. Among questions which are likely to come up for discussion and settlement, according to the Kirisutokyo Sekai, are:—(1) The further strengthening of the independent basis of certain churches, and (2) the opening up of new work in Korea. In reference to the first of these subjects, it will be remembered that some little time ago 30 churches which had previously been partly or wholly supported by the American Board of Foreign Missions were placed under the sole management of the Kumiai Kyōkai. Five of these churches have already undertaken to support themselves; 18 others hope to be in a condition to dispense with outside help next year. The other 7 will have to be assisted by the Central Congregational Body. Next year the grant-in-aid made by the American Board will all have been spent and the Kumiai Kyōkai will then be thrown altogether on its own resources. Regarding Korea, the policy to be adopted by the Church is still unsettled, says the organ we are quoting. It might be best to send somebody over to the Peninsula to report on the openings for mission work there. At any rate it is hoped that some definite action will be taken at the meeting of the Synod this year. Other matters that need attention are stated to be the re-arrangement of districts and pastorates in some parts of the country; the abolition of some stations and the establishment of others.

The Shūkyōkai (The Religious World) publishes the views of Mr. Shimada Bankon, the well-known aged Buddhist priest, on "The Future of Buddhism," the gist of which is as follows:—It is hard to find anybody nowadays who believes in Buddhism sufficiently to make it a power in the country. In all parts of Japan our adherents are leaving us to join the Christians. Among the upper classes there seems to be scarcely anybody who believes in Buddhism to-day—Jōryū shakai de wa Bukkyō wa shinjiteru to iu mono wa zenzen nai yō ja. This is not at all surprising, for how many priests are there in the whole country who really believe in the religion? It is a case of "like priests like people." Some of the priests are agitating for Government protection. What good could protection do them even if they had it? No Government can put life into a dying creed. In times past I did my very best to arouse men from their slumbers, but in recent years I have come to think that the case is hopeless. With such priests as we see to-day, there is no future for Buddhism. Is it not a fact that some of them in order to save themselves from utter extinction are proposing to unite with the Christians?

In a very long article on "Universities" written by Mr. Fukumoto Sei and published in the August Taiyō, which contains much interesting information on higher education in the West and in Japan, the necessity of establishing a religious University is urged in the following terms:—"The minds of people are principally controlled by two influences, the influence of religion and the influence of learning or science. Learning develops man's intellect and quickens his wits. Religion governs his spirit and imparts a certain sanctity to his life. It has been said that "religion is the learning of the many" and that "learning is the religion of a select few." However this may be, certain it is that religion cannot get on without learning. Religion without free thought, without learning, without philosophy, without the stimulus of science, sinks to the level of superstition. German history shows that learning and religion have ever gone hand in hand in Germany. The reformation movement which did so much for Germany was greatly aided by the revival of letters. The drawing up of the Augsburg Confession of Faith (A.D. 1530) and the founding of the Göttingen University (1734) were powerful factors in moulding the after-history of the German people. With slight variations the relation of learning to religion in France has been the same, and at the English Universities the connection of the two has always been very close. What is the present state of things in the world of religion and thought in this country? Surely no discerning man can be satisfied with things as they are. The number of Japanese who have been materially affected by the new learning and by any of the numerous forms of Christianity propagated in this country is comparatively very small. The mass of the people think just as they did in Tokugawa times. Their religious ideas may all be traced to Shintoism, Buddhism, Confucianism, or the Bushidō. Japanese civilisation had much the same origin as that of Europe. European civilisation may be traced to two sources, Hellenism and Christianity. From the Greeks Europe received its love of art, its freedom of thought and desire for knowledge. From Christianity it received the spirit of self-denial and charity in its widest sense. From Shinto teaching we learnt how to appreciate the beauties of nature and art and how to love our country and be ready to die for it. From Buddhism we learnt self-denial and self-sacrifice and that all men are brethren. Mr. Fukumoto goes on to speak in praise of Shintō, which he considers has the merit of teaching both the polytheism of the Greeks and the Monotheism of Christianity at the same time. Mr. Fukumoto holds that in Shintō teaching there is a recognition of one God, who ranks higher than the "gods many and lords many" whom the devout Shintoist habitually worships. Mr. Fukumoto is of opinion that Shintoism and Buddhism only need an institution where their priests can receive the highest education in order to recover the ground they have lost. What would Christianity be to-day, asks Mr. Fukumoto, had she not called to her aid secular learning of various sorts? Learning in Japan has long been divorced from religion. The higher education as it is carried on here to-day leaves the moral faculties undeveloped. One of the greatest needs of the age is a University where religion as well as other subjects shall be taught by first-class scholars.

In the pages of the Nichiyō Sōshi (Protestant Episcopal) a discussion has been going on respecting the establishment of a Japanese Bishopric. In No. 206 of the Magazine, basing his argument chiefly on statistics, Mr. Saeki contended that it is as yet too early to expect such a step as the consecration of a Japanese Bishop to be taken. In No. 208 Mr. Iwasa replied to Mr. Saeki, endeavouring to show that his interpretation of statistics was wrong. In the September number of the magazine we find a carefully written article on the whole subject from the pen of Mr. Iida Eihiro, which gives a short history of the founding and the development of the Protestant Episcopal Church in as far as that history has a bearing on the question under discussion. From Mr. Iida's epitome of the course of events we extract the following remarks:—"The Episcopal Mission in Tōkyō was founded by two S.P.G. Missionaries, the late Archdeacon Shaw and the Rev. J. Wright in 1873. Prior to that date there was not a single Episcopalian convert in existence.* Shortly after this Bishop Williams, with several American clergymen, arrived and opened up work in Tsukiji. This step subsequently led to the division of Tōkyō into two dioceses and the creation of two bishoprics, that of Northern and Southern Tōkyō. After this missions were founded at Ōsaka, Nagasaki, Hakodate and Kyōto. In the early years of the history of the Episcopal Mission, the Churches knew little of each other and there was no united work carried on. The Episcopal Churches became one body in 1887, when the present Church Constitution and rules were drawn up. From that time till now annual Provincial Synods have been held and various measures have been adopted with a view to keeping the widely scattered Churches in touch with each other. It is perhaps unavoidable, but one cannot help regretting that there should be so many small bodies connected with our church which are not in a position to support themselves. The following figures convey some idea of the present position of our church. In the 6 Districts in which we have stations there are 102 churches; 146 preaching places (Kōgi-shō); 10 Assembly Halls (Kwaikwan 會館); 6 Meeting Places (Shukaisho) and 3 Out-Stations (Shutcho-sho).† The Churches that have over 200 members are 8 in number, those with over 100, 21; those with over 50 members, 41. The remaining 32 churches are "the weakest of the weak." As a result of 34 years' work there are only 8 churches with a membership exceeding 200. Six of these churches are situated in the provinces, and are under the control of foreign Bishops. The converts belonging to these Churches are mostly people connected with Mission Schools, hospitals and the like. There are few business men among them. As a consequence of this, the capacity for self-support is poorly developed. In ceremony and worship our Church can furnish models for the imitation of other Churches; but in ability to maintain ourselves and become independent we stand low (Jikyū, dokuritu ni yō suru jitsuryoku no gotoki wa, tōtei hyōjun to nasu atawasu). But while we say this, it is only right to mention that of the 8 Churches referred to above there are 2 which have reached the stage of being half self-supporting. There is no immediate prospect of their becoming wholly independent. Comparing our Church to-day with what it was 7 years ago in respect of numbers, amount of money subscribed and the actual condition of individual churches and their capacity for self-support, it is true to say that they have not improved (Otoru tomo, nasara koto arasan.) But judging from the action taken at the Seventh General Synod held in Kyōto it would seem that there are people among us who think that it is possible to force the situation by passing bold resolutions requiring churches to raise fixed sums of money within given periods. The gentlemen who passed those resolutions seemed to have depended on the telescope alone and to have failed to bring the microscope to bear on the actual condition of the weak Churches connected with us. How many members are there in these churches who are in a position to put up large sums of money? As a rule in this country it is only the heads of houses who have it in their power to give away money. Neither women, minors, nor dependents are able to do so. To lay down a law that any Church shall be required to raise a certain sum within a given time is a mistake and is certainly quite contrary to the teaching of St. Paul, who said "Let every man do according as he is disposed in his heart, not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver." The amount of thanksgiving donations to the church cannot be profitably fixed by those in authority (Keishin hōn no ishi yori zennan zenjō (good men and women) ga sut-i ni nasubeki kansha-kin no kaku too bakutei

* This is not strictly correct as Mr. Ensor had one or two converts in Nagasaki prior to this. Mr. Iida does not mention the part played by the C. M. S. Missionaries in the founding of the Episcopal Church in Japan.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

† We are unable to determine what is the precise significance of these terms. There are said to be in addition to these 2 Reikashō, worshipping places, and 3 Seikyōjō.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

shi, meirei no moto ni jō ni hōkwa wo osamu-beshi to shi shitaru wa, kansha-kin no kompon seishin wo ayamashite. Shiuryo naki ketungi to iwanarubekarazu. [It must be pronounced to be a very ill-considered resolution.] Mr. Lida is strongly of opinion that the slow rate at which the capital of the mission accumulates is very largely to be attributed to the action taken by the Seventh General Synod. The attempt to force the pace, he says, has tended to retard progress. The desire for a Japanese Bishop is pretty general among Episcopalian converts, but it is admitted that only self-supporting Churches should be placed under his jurisdiction. As regards his salary, Mr. Lida says, in view of the fact that when the American Episcopal Mission was founded Bishop Williams was content to do the work of a Bishop on the salary of a Presbyter, a Japanese Bishop would only need a little higher salary than is paid to ordained Japanese to-day. As things are now situated, to place all Japanese Churches under one Japanese Bishop would seem to be a mistake; as it would do violence to the principle that independence and self-support are necessary qualifications for churches that desire to be placed under the exclusive control of native Bishops. That Churches which are half dependent on money subscribed in America and England should be removed from the jurisdiction of foreign Bishops seems unreasonable. The first Bishop appointed will certainly be placed in control of self-supporting churches only. (Jikyū dokuritsu kyōkai igwai hōjin kantoku no tashiba wa aru naki nari).

The September number of the Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church) opens with a discussion of the progress in ethical study made in modern times and the growing tendency in all enlightened countries to find a surer basis for morality than either theology or philosophy furnishes. The basis which satisfies a good many educated people is modern science. Russian scholars and theologians, the Seikyō Shimpō says, take considerable interest in the new ethical theories which have been discussed in Europe and America and their views have undergone modification in various particulars. They do not hold that Christian ethics can never undergo new development. They recognize the fact that each age has witnessed changes in the prominence given to certain moral principles. They believe that ethical science is, like other branches of knowledge, progressive.

In the same number of the Seikyō Shimpō Mr. Yamada Toyohiko writes on a revised Japanese version of the Bible and the use of scripture proper names by the various Christian churches. Here is the substance of Mr. Yamada's article:—Some people imagine that Christianity is entirely dependent on the Bible, forgetting that Christianity existed before the Bible was compiled. In Japan we are too apt to think that the existence of a sect depends entirely on the existence of some sacred writings from which it draws its inspiration and which alone gives it authority to teach. In saying this it is not my purpose to minimize the part which the Bible has played in the history of Christianity, but only to show that Christianity in any country is not wholly dependent on the version of the scriptures in use. Here in Japan it is fortunate that it is so, for nobody who knows much about the subject pretends that we possess a first-class translation of the Old and New Testaments. The version that is best known is that made by Protestant Delegates many years ago. Its many imperfections have been repeatedly referred to by Protestant writers, and we are informed that a Revising Committee has already been appointed to prepare a new version. Some years ago the Roman Catholics, working in conjunction with a Protestant, Mr. Takashi Gorō, published a new translation of the Vulgate version of the Four Gospels. In all three branches of Japanese Christendom there seems to be a desire for a new translation of the Bible. In preparing a translation of the scriptures two main objects must be kept in view: one being the correct rendering of the original; the other the choice of language that is dignified, solemn and impressive. Neither of these objects was realized by the translators of the Protestant version of the Bible now in use. There were no doubt reasons at the beginning of the Meiji era for rendering the scriptures into language which could be comprehended by almost everybody. But now it is felt that grace, dignity and impressiveness have been sacrificed to intelligibility. The easily understood sentences into which the text has been rendered often fail to convey any impression of the grandeur and the depth of the original. Thoughtful readers of the translation now in use not infrequently fail to see the superiority of the Bible to other books owing to the poorness of the language employed. When we come to ask whether it is possible, with the language in its present state, to get the Bible translated in a way that will leave nothing to be desired, we must confess that we see many difficulties in the way. But if all the missions would combine, each selecting its best scholars, they certainly would be able to produce a version that would be infinitely superior to the translations now in use, and which would possess an authority not granted to any existing translation, and whose literary beauties would secure for it a number of readers who can not be induced to look into the present translations. The difficulties in the way of adopting united action in the manner we have indicated may for the present be insuperable, but there is one prelude to this which can be effected, that is, the attaining of uniformity among the sects in the method of transliterating scripture names. There is at present a bewildering variety in the method of spelling names. The name of Jesus is rendered in Kana in 5 different ways. We have イ ス, イ エ ス, ヰ ス, ヰ ス フ and ヰ ヨ. Surely it would be possible for Christian sects to agree on a system of transliteration to be followed in the case of all Bible names.

ARRIVAL OF MR. TAFT IN JAPAN.

The Great Northern Steamship Company's steamer Minnesota with the American Secretary of State for War and Mrs. Taft and Mr. T. J. O'Brien, American Ambassador to Tokyo, and Mrs. O'Brien, which left Seattle on Sept. 13th, arrived at Yokohama at 6 a.m. on Sept. 27th. The party of Mr. Taft consisted of Mr. Carpenter, his confidential secretary, Major General Edward, etc. When the great liner reached No. 11 anchorage, a fine display of day fire-works was made from the grounds of the Customs by arrangement of the Yokohama Municipality. Meanwhile many Americans and Japanese went on board the ship to welcome Mr. Taft and the Ambassador. Among prominent Japanese present were Count Terajima, representing the Minister for Foreign Affairs; Mr. Watanabe, one of the Masters of the Board of Ceremonies, representing the Minister for the Imperial Household; Major Yoshida, representing the Minister for the Army; Governor Sufu; Mr. Nagasaki, member of the Imperial Palace Council; Mr. Mitsuhashi, Mayor of Yokohama, and his staff, etc. At 9.30 a.m., the Secretary and the Ambassador left the Minnesota by the steam launch Asahi (Harbour Office) and landed a little later. The launch went to the English hatoba where they were received by a crowd of Japanese and foreigners with enthusiastic bansai. The Taft party at once proceeded along the Bund to the Grand Hotel in carriages sent from the Imperial Detached Palace in Yokohama, being escorted by a number of high Japanese officials.

The day was marked with fair weather and there was a pleasant breeze. The entrance of the hatoba, Honcho, and the front of the railway station were all decorated with parti-coloured cloth and with the Rising-Sun and American

* Our opinion is that foreign missionaries are not competent judges on this question. When they read the Japanese version of the Scriptures they are always thinking of the version to which they are accustomed and they imagine that the Japanese language used must be equally impressive with the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, English, German or French versions of the Scriptures, which is certainly not the case. It is quite plain that Japanese scholars only are qualified to pronounce an opinion on this subject.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

flags combined, and various other bunting. All the streets along which the party passed were lined with enormous crowds who welcomed them with bansai. Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien and party proceeded to the Consulate-General and subsequently left for Tokyo by the 11 a.m. train. Mr. Taft and party took tiffin at the Grand Hotel, where Governor Sufu, Mr. Mitsuhashi, Mayor; Mr. K. Otani, President of Commerce, etc. were present. At 3.30 p.m., Mr. and Mrs. Taft and their son left the hotel in a carriage from the Imperial Detached Palace, in company with Major Yoshida. They departed from Yokohama by the 4.05 p.m. train, one saloon carriage of which was reserved to them by the Imperial Railway Department. The train arrived at Shimbashi at 4.45 p.m. when departmental ministers and other high Japanese officials and officers as well as foreign diplomatic officials were present on the platform to welcome the Secretary of State for War.

Mr. and Mrs. Taft were present on Tuesday afternoon at a reception given on their behalf at the American Consulate-General. The buildings were decorated and there was a large attendance not only of Americans but of residents of other nationalities. A Japanese band played selections from 4 to 6 o'clock.

Shortly before 5 o'clock Mr. N. F. Smith addressed Mr. Taft. He said they deeply regretted that his stay was so short but expressed the pleasure which the Americans and other residents felt in meeting him and Mrs. Taft, and he concluded by presenting to the guests of the afternoon Mr. Mitsuhashi, Mayor, and the members of the municipality of Yokohama, who desired to vie with American citizens in paying a full tribute of respect and esteem to an honoured visitor whom all Americans both at home and abroad had reason to look upon with pride—(applause).

Mr. Mitsuhashi said:

Your Excellency the Secretary of War and Mrs. Taft:—On behalf of the members of the City Council and myself, I beg to assure you that it has been a great honour and pleasure to the citizens of Yokohama to have welcomed you to this City and we were very anxious that we might be able to show in a more substantial manner our esteem and respect for you as a high official and truly representative citizen of the great nation which has invariably been most friendly to Japan. Further the efforts of your country have been constantly directed towards the preservation and advancement of the general peace and civilization of the world, a policy which we may be permitted to say, we all highly respect and appreciate. Unfortunately on this occasion your stay in this country is so short and your time so much occupied in receiving the attention of our Sovereign and nation, that it has been found impossible, to our deep regret, to request your presence longer amongst us. We venture to hope, however, that your interest in this City and its commercial and industrial relations with your country may be further increased by the present visit. And we now, on behalf of the citizens of Yokohama, beg to request your acceptance of a humble present, a tea service, as a small token of the City's welcome to you and as an expression of our sincere wishes for a very pleasant journey and for the good health and prosperity of your Excellency and your family in the future (applause).

Mr. Taft, in reply, said he had the honour when last in Japan of being received by Her Majesty the Empress, who to show her goodwill to the American people presented to him a piece of beautiful Japanese tapestry, which in elegance rivalled the famed Gobelin tapestry of France. Mrs. Taft was not here at that time but he took the tapestry home and suggested that it should be placed on view in the National Museum so that the public generally should enjoy its beauties. Mrs. Taft, however, insisted that the gift made was to her and declined to part with it, declaring that the public could see it very well in her parlour. He mentioned this to show that as Mrs. Taft regarded these gifts as her own she should be making the speech in acknowledgment. He went on to speak of the pleasure it gave them to visit Yokohama and he congratulated the Mayor on having made a better English speech than he could make himself. Yokohama, he said, was not a foreign city; it was to them a stepping stone between the United States and Japan. He was glad to know that the city was progressing with giant steps to the position of one of the great cities of the world and he gladly paid a tribute to its attractions. After expressing the gratitude of Mrs. Taft and his own for the present of the Municipality, he went on to thank Mr. Smith for his remarks on behalf of the American Asiatic Association. There was something, he said, in the life that one encounters in coming to Yokohama, to the great cities of China and to the Philippines, where cosmopolitan communities are congregated, which enlarged the scope of mind of the man who had previously merely lived at home. He was enabled to have farther and wider views of the function that a nation performed in the progress of the world. To come to such a place as this, where the best of a rising nation was meeting with the finest of the Western nations gave a point of view impossible to acquire at home. It showed, too, that trade was not a matter of hostility but a meeting of peoples desirous to exchange goods with one another, where the views and interests of both should be promoted. He concluded by again giving utterance to the feelings of gratitude that they entertained with regard to their hospitable treatment.

The tea set presented to the distinguished visitors was enclosed in a large case and consists of about a dozen pieces of silver and a fine silver-mounted salver. It bore the inscription:

"Presented to
"Their Excellencies Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Taft,
"By the "City of Yokohama.
"1st October, 1907.

H. E. Mr. William H. Taft, American Secretary for War, and Mrs. Taft were received in audience at 11.50 a.m. on Oct. 2nd and by the Emperor, in company with Major-General Edwards, and Mr. Carpenter, confidential secretary. Subsequently they had audience of the Empress.

At noon, the American notables were entertained in the Homei Hall where Prince and Princess Fushimi, the younger; the Ministers for the Imperial Household, for Foreign Affairs; the Ladies Takakura, Kitajima, and Kagawa, Ladies in Waiting; and thirteen other distinguished persons were present.

At 6.15 p.m. the same day, Mr. and Mrs. Taft and party left Shimbashi for Kyoto on their way to Kobe.

A special carriage was provided on the train for them. The train passed the Hiranuma station at 6.45 p.m. when officials from the Kencho, the City Office, and a number of business men were present to see them off.

At 7.21 a.m. on Oct. 3rd, Mr. Taft and party arrived in Kyoto, and at once proceeded to the Kyoto Hotel. All the streets through which they passed were decorated with parti-coloured cloth, and Japanese and American flags. Beautiful day fire-works were also discharged. General Viscount Kuroki, now in Kyoto on his way from the West, where he has been inspecting various divisions, gave a luncheon to the American visitors at the Kyoto hotel. The same afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Taft visited the old Imperial Palace at Nijo.

By the evening train the party left Kyoto for Kobe, and at once proceeded to the Minnesota on the way to the Philippines.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN CONVENTION.

The following is the substance of the Anglo-Russian Convention, signed at St. Petersburg on August 31st, 1907, which has been placed at our disposal by the Foreign Office:—

CONCERNING PERSIA.

(1) The two Governments mutually engage to respect the integrity and independence of Persia, and testify their desire for the establishment of equal advantages for the trade and industry of other nations.

(2) Great Britain engages not to seek or support political or commercial concessions beyond the line starting from Kasrishirin (on the frontier west of Kermanshah) passing through Ispahan, Yazd, Kakhik and ending at a point on the Persian frontier where the Russian and Afghan frontiers intersect.

(3) Russia engages not to seek or support similar concessions beyond the line going from the Afghan frontier through Gazik, Birjand, Kerman and ending at Bandar Abbas.

(4) Great Britain and Russia mutually engage not to oppose, without previous arrangement with one another, concessions to each other's subjects in the regions situated between the lines as mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3.

CONCERNING AFGHANISTAN.

(1) The British Government engage to exercise their influence in Afghanistan only in the pacific sense. They will not themselves take, or encourage Afghanistan to take, measures threatening Russia.

(2) Russia recognizes Afghanistan as outside her sphere of influence and engages that all her political relations with Afghanistan shall be conducted through the British Government and that she will not send agents into Afghanistan.

(3) Having in view the Treaty signed at Kabul on March 21, 1905, Great Britain engages not to annex or occupy any portion of Afghanistan, nor to interfere with her internal administration, provided that the Amir fulfils his engagements with the British Government under the above Treaty.

(4) The Russian and Afghan Authorities on the frontier may establish direct relations for the settlement of local questions of non-political character.

(5) The two Governments affirm their adherence to the principle of commercial equal opportunity.

CONCERNING TIBET.

(1) The two Governments agree to respect the territorial integrity of Tibet and to abstain from all interference in her internal administration.

(2) The two Governments recognize the suzerain right of China over Tibet, and in conformity with that principle they engage not to enter into negotiations with Tibet except through the Chinese Government. This engagement shall not affect the British-Tibetan Convention of 1904, confirmed by the British-Chinese Convention of 1906.

(3) Neither Government shall send representatives to Lassa.

(4) The two Governments agree not to seek or obtain, whether for themselves or their subjects, any concessions for railways, roads, telegraphs, mines or others in Tibet.

(5) The two Governments agree that no revenue of Tibet in kind or cash shall be pledged or assigned to them or their subjects.

(6) Further stipulations provide for the intercourse of the British and Russian Buddhists with the Dalai Lama, entry of scientific missions into Tibet and the British evacuation of Chumbi valley.

YACHTING.

A fine E.-N.-E. breeze of moderate strength sent all the boats round their respective courses in good time on Saturday and the weather generally was quite acceptable to both large and small craft.

Five big yachts made a picturesque start, all going off in a bunch just under the lee of the bathing barge, Mary first and Kingfisher 35 seconds later, Naniwa, Maid Marion and Riever at intervals of 6, 10, and 20 seconds after the leader. Kingfisher tacked immediately after crossing, the others, except Naniwa, doing the same later, and stood over to the Breakwater. At 1h. 54m. 20s. Mary having tacked, passed clear of the White Lighthouse, Kingfisher following 1m. 40s. later. Here Maid Marion, having carried away something, took in her jibtopsail. They reached the Lightship in one leg and Mary bore away round it at 2h. 7m., Kingfisher 1m. 51s., Naniwa 5m. 7s., and Maid Marion and Riever together 7m. astern. Spinnakers were carried to port from the Lightship and the approximate times at the Widow Buoy were; Mary 2.26.30, Kingfisher 2.28.45, Naniwa 2.33.00, M. Marion 2.34.37, and Riever at 3.36.30. With spinnakers slightly pulled on they ran with a good breeze down to the Nagahama Buoy, where the times were: Mary 2.47.00, Kingfisher 2.49.53, Naniwa 2.54.50, Maid Marion 2.55.

10, and Riever 2.58.00. Mary and Kingfisher were at once laid on the port tack, but Naniwa and the Maid stood in across Mississippi Bay, the latter hanging on at a few yards distance on the lee of the yawl, but being quite unable to get past her. Riever followed the two leaders for a little but then went about and stood in after the two others. Whether she and they gained by this is a question depending on how the current was setting as they went along, but when Mary, after a short cast to port and another to starboard, and Kingfisher, which made only two long legs of it, looked up at the Widow Buoy on the starboard tack they found a strong lee-going set and later found a pronounced tide-wake at the buoy. Kingfisher had in fact to pinch in fetching it. The times of the leading boats at this mark were: Mary 3.21.00, Kingfisher 3.25.05. Just after passing the buoy Kingfisher's jibtopsail, which had been giving at the clew, burst, and had to be replaced, which of course occupied some time. The wind had now dropped a little and for a time Mary drew away, but when it freshened as they neared the Lightship the second yacht closed slightly on her. At the Lightship the times were: Mary 3.44.30, Kingfisher 3.47.50, Maid Marion 4.01.30, Naniwa 4.02.30, Riever 4.13.25. At the harbour entrance Mary had increased her lead on Kingfisher to 4m. 49s. passing in at 3.55.50, and added to it coming up the harbour. The handicap was for a moderate breeze and works out in the following times, the Mary Cup going, it will be seen, to Naniwa:—

	Start.	Finish.	Arb Hand.	Corrected.
	h.m.s.	h.m.s.	m.	h.m.s.
Mary	1.45.05	4.03.54	—	4.03.58
Kingfisher	1.45.40	4.09.06	—	4.09.06
Maid Marion	1.45.15	4.24.03	18	4.06.03
Riever	1.45.25	4.38.45	39	3.59.45
Naniwa	1.45.11	4.35.50	30	3.55.50

Two Mosquito Yacht Club boats, Pele and Sunbeam, raced over the No. 3 course, Tachibana-Lightship Quarantine-ship-Tachibana. Sunbeam finished first, winning irrespective of her allowance of 3m. for a moderate breeze. Times:—

	Start.	Finish.	Arb Hand.	Corrected.
	h.m.s.	h.m.s.	m.	h.m.s.
Pele	2.15.20	3.31.10	—	3.31.10
Sunbeam	2.15.22	3.29.22	3	3.26.22

There was a great show of Larks, no fewer than 14 starting, and there was only one casualty, No. 4 carrying away her rudder and having to be towed in. No. 15 won the first prize on handicap; No. 3 would have been second but fouled the Tachibana Buoy, so that No. 2 wins second prize; No. 9 is third and No. 1 fourth.

THE CROWN PRINCE.

The following programme with regard to the tour of the Crown Prince to Western districts and Korea is published by the Official Gazette.

Oct. 10th.—His Highness will leave Shimbashi by the 10.25 a.m. train for Shizuoka, where he will spend a night.

The 11th and 13th.—At 7.10 a.m. on the 11th he will leave Shizuoka for Maiko arriving there at 4.54 p.m. He will embark by the battleship Katori the following day.

It is said that the First Squadron will escort His Highness to Korea.

YOKOHAMA CHARITY ORGANISATION.

A largely attended meeting of the foreign community was held in the rooms of the Foreign Board of Trade on Tuesday afternoon to receive the report and accounts of the Yokohama Charity Organisation. There were present, Mr. C. V. Sale, in the Chair, Messrs. J. de Cuers de Cogolin, M. Russell, J. Williamson Jones, Rev. E. S. Booth, E. F. Crowe, A. L. Robinson, B. R. Berrick, Paul Messer, P. Sandberg, Jas. Martin, A. J. L. Dewette, M. Beart, C. Ellis, A. G. Morey Weale, H. D. C. Jones, Commissioner Estill, Major Orr, Ensign Wilson (Salvation Army), G. G. Brady, F. H. Bugbird, V. R. Bowden, Rev. W. T. Austen, Rev. H. B. Walton, E. C. Davis, A. E. Wileman, P. Blum, F. W. Horne, Jan. Walter, L. Mottet, C. Griffin, B. C. Howard, I. Bunting, J. Condon, Cato Aall, A. J. McClure, F. J. Abbott, H. Lefeber, and W. K. Tresize.

The CHAIRMAN, Mr. C. V. SALE, addressing the meeting, said:—The annual report and statement of accounts have been in your possession for several days, and with your permission I propose to take the report as having been read. As regards the accounts, I may say that the subscriptions have been greater than in any previous year, amounting to yen 1,945, but even this generous remembrance proved insufficient to meet the numerous calls for assistance, and the year closed with a deficit of yen 1,156. The cost of administration has been very small, only yen 19, so that over 99 per cent. of the contributions have gone directly to the purpose for which they were given. For this effective result we are indebted to the Honorary Treasurer, who has been as careful in limiting expenditure as he has been zealous in securing subscriptions.

You will observe that the grants of relief are classified under three headings. The first accounts for yen 1,502, assistance and supplies to destitute seamen and others; the second is for yen 1,466, principally the cost of transport paid on behalf of men who could neither obtain local occupation nor work their passage abroad; the third is for yen 525 granted to people who, by their association and connection with this port, have a more legitimate claim upon our sympathy and friendly help than the other two classes.

This occasion affords a suitable opportunity for drawing your attention to the extent of the problem presented by the increasing number of destitute foreigners who drift to these shores, but before entering into a general discussion, which mainly concerns the future, I beg to move that the report and accounts be received and adopted.

Mr. H. D. C. JONES said:—Mr. Chairman, I beg to second the proposal that the accounts be accepted and passed. As a new-comer to Yokohama, it is a great pleasure to see the local Charity Organization established on such a sound footing and doing such good work generally among all sections of the community, but your Chairman's indication that "bricks cannot be made without straw" cannot be passed over, and I venture to further second the appeal of the Committee for larger subscriptions or donations. These he understood were growing with the growth of the community and he was sure it would be satisfactory to the many liberal donors to know that their subscriptions were so well and carefully disbursed and far from going to swell a credit balance were earnestly required to make good the rather heavy deficit, 30 per cent. of the actual disbursements, he saw the Organization was working with. It stood to reason that this state of affairs could not be allowed to continue. New and heavier calls upon the association were bound to arise, increasing as the field of labour in which it worked opened out. He thought that they ought all to be prepared, as he was sure they were, to increase their financial support if desired.—(Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN:—In the circular issued yesterday by the Honorary Treasurer as a reminder of this meeting you were advised that we now have to deal with a problem requiring serious consideration—the problem of the unemployed, or, as is often the case in our special surroundings, the problem of the unemployable. The accounts which have just been passed record your pecuniary assistance, but on this occasion we need more; we need your counsel, we need the assurance of your sympathy, we need the promise of your active co-operation. Hitherto we have considered it our duty to provide in one way or another for every destitute person reaching the port. With the assistance of the Salvation Army we have supplied such people with board and lodging, have kept them out of mischief and finally secured their passage to countries where suitable means of livelihood are more easily obtainable. The existence of the Charity Organisation has left no excuse for house-to-house begging, with all its attendant risk and annoyance, and in these ways the entire community have benefited to an extent not perhaps realised, except by the older residents.

There are several reasons, however, for reconsidering the methods employed. Among these may be mentioned the larger subscriptions required to cope with the increasing number of destitutes, and the decision of the Salvation Army to abolish the Naval and Mercantile Home upon which we have relied for co-operation. You will naturally ask for an explanation of these conditions, and that, I think, can best be given by a retrospective view.

Fifteen or twenty years ago the port was frequented by a large number of seafaring men from the steamers, sailing vessels and sealing schooners which discharged and engaged their crews locally. The necessities of these men were provided for by the various boarding masters. These boarding masters considered it a part of their business to keep on the right side of the Consular authorities, and this they found was best achieved by taking care of the comparatively few men who could not, or would not, find work. With the decline of the sealing industry, and with changes in the shipping trade, the openings for employment became fewer, the boarding masters less prosperous, and therefore less able to provide for the unemployed, who then began to look to the public for relief. At this stage, in order to lessen begging, prevent imposture, and relieve genuine distress, the Yokohama Charity Organisation was formed. Shortly afterwards the Salvation Army decided, with the consent, and under the patronage, of the Consuls, to take over the principal remaining boarding master's establishment, a business in which there was still some profit. At the same time they provided a place where visiting seamen and petty officers could secure good meals and clean beds in decent surroundings at a moderate cost. Together with these activities, the Salvation Army undertook to provide food and accommodation at the lowest possible figure for anyone sent to them by members of the Charity Organisation. This arrangement relieved your Committee of much trouble and anxiety, and carried with it the additional advantage that, as boarding masters, the Salvation Army officers were frequently able to ship these men away after an interval of only a few days.

During the past twelve or eighteen months very few sailing vessels have visited our port, while the majority of steamers are regular liners and rarely need to supplement their crews. Thus the boarding-masters' business has practically ceased, the Salvation Army Institution has become a source of loss, and latterly has been occupied almost entirely by the recipients of charity, many of whom are wastrels and ne'er-do-wells without any desire for work and perfectly content to remain where board and lodging is given without the exaction of any equivalent service.

This position of affairs became so unsatisfactory that Mr. Estill, a Commissioner of the Salvation Army, who recently arrived to assume charge of the Army's operations in Japan, determined to change the situation with as little delay as possible, and issued a circular, copies of which appeared in the local Press, announcing that the Home would be closed on the 31st August. Your Committee immediately wrote calling attention to the inadequacy of the notice, and stating our opinion that it was not consistent with the co-operative agreement, or rather arrangement, which had been in force for so long a period. They also said that no work among the Japanese could be of equal importance to that of caring for men of our own race, and that the best method of preaching good works would be the assistance, and removal from the streets, of those foreigners who represent sometimes the lowest, and sometimes the most unfortunate, elements of Western populations.

Mr. Estill replied in a letter which, while acceding to the request for a longer notice, enters into the subject so fully and so very sensibly that I cannot do better than quote his remarks:—

"I have received your letter, and I thank you for the frank expression of your views on the proposal to close our Seamen's Institute at Yokohama."

"In addition to the question of expense, we are of opinion that there is not so much need for a large Seamen's Institute in the proper acceptance of the term as there was formerly. Our views on this point have been clearly expressed in my circular letter referred to in your letter to us. The men that we have to deal with are occasional shipwrecked crews, the annual visit of the Fleet and the Beachcombers. The latter class are unfortunately the largest in number and, in our opinion, if these men are to be assisted at all, it should be more in an Institution calculated to reform them, rather than in one conducted on the lines of a Seamen's Institute."

"You will probably have noticed in my letter announcing the closing of the Institute, it is mentioned that we are considering a plan for dealing with the question under the changed conditions."

"We are at present inclined to a scheme where the men could be classified, that is, to have two departments, one for 'Beachcombers,' the latter would have to be willing to do some kind of work while in the Home to help to defray the cost of his keep, &c."

"I am told that there will be many difficulties in the way of starting such an Institution, not the least of which would be finding reproductive employment for the 'Beachcombers' while in the Home; and it is said that probably there might be local opposition on the part of the foreign community to our dealing with these men in the manner indicated."

"If there is sufficient local sympathy in favour of an Institution as mentioned above, we shall be prepared to consider the same. May I ask if you will express an opinion on this point?"

"As regards the date of actually closing we are allowing this to remain indefinite for the time being."

"We recognise there is a need for an Institution to help the men referred to, and we shall be pleased if we can be the means of supplying that need."

In accordance with this letter, the Home was maintained until the latter end of September, when the premises had to be vacated.

We are therefore face to face with the necessity of making new arrangements for the care of the destitute, whether unfortunate wayfarers on the path of life, shipwrecked crews, or confirmed beach-combers. There has been a great increase in this last class of immigrant. Men drift here from all parts of the world much more than formerly. Sometimes the treatment of the men employed on the few sailing vessels which continue to visit Japan is apparently intended as an inducement to desert. It is well known that some captains are only too anxious to fill such vacancies by engaging a cheaper, and frequently more docile, crew of Japanese sailors. In such cases the deserters remain here, forming one of those instances where it is necessary for us to give assistance although, we think, the captain or owner of the vessel should be compelled by his Consul to deposit a sufficient sum of money for the possible expenses of each man so left behind.

Assuming it to be your desire that we should continue to act on the principle of relieving all destitute cases, we feel that no man should be placed at a material advantage by making himself a pauper. In many instances we are dealing with professional tramps. The liberal diet and general comfort to be secured during their sojourn at various Eastern ports is the greatest encouragement which can be given to the multiplication of these unwelcome tourists. Any relief granted should be of such a nature and on such terms that, while assisting genuine cases of distress, it will discourage the hopeless class of men who have lost all sense of self-respect, will not work, and freely use charitable institutions as havens of rest and refreshment.

In this connection several interviews have taken place with Mr. Estill, whose aims are entirely in accord with our own. He proposes to take new premises, away from the temptations which surrounded the former place, and to cater for the Naval and Mercantile men requiring meals or beds while ashore. In a separate division of the premises work will be provided for destitute men, who will receive board and lodging in return, until such time as means can be found to send them away. The dietary will be sufficient for health, but will be simple, unattractive and cheap. It would be open to each man to supplement this subsistence diet by means of good work and good conduct. If any applicant for charity should refuse to work, complaint will be made to the police by the officer in charge of the Home. Mr. Yunsa, the chief of police in this Ken, has kindly promised to co-operate in this scheme by acting on such complaints, and by arresting and detaining for one week any man found wandering about the streets without visible means of subsistence.

If this plan, which makes sufficient provision for the genuine work seeker, is to be carried out successfully, it requires the abandonment of all indiscriminate charity by every member of this community. Every applicant for help should be referred to the Salvation Army Home, work and consequent relief will always be provided immediately, and no excuse will exist for casual almsgiving. It has been said that anyone giving to a street beggar without enquiry demoralises the beggar, by teaching him that money can be obtained without working for it, and demoralises himself by securing the pleasure of a philanthropic emotion without any personal trouble. However this may be, sufficient evidence exists to show that indiscriminate almsgiving is the main support of vagrancy, a fact so well recognised in some countries that penalties are imposed on those who give alms to beggars.

I hope this outline plan will meet with your approval. It has been submitted to Mr. Estill, who kindly comes from Tokyo to be present at this meeting, and will, I hope, favour us with his views. I may add that in return for his co-operation the Commissioner naturally expects to receive as much support from the local residents for the Army as in the past, and this I feel confident we can safely promise.

Besides the cases to which reference has been made, assistance is required by men who have seen better days, but by reason of misfortune, illness or fault are stranded and penniless. As a rule any attempt to secure local employment is hopeless, and it has been our policy to pay for the transport of such people by the first possible steamer. In some instances the amount paid away in this manner has been refunded, but as a rule the money spent must be regarded as lost. In view of the increased facilities for travel, and the fact that Yokohama is a terminus for such folk, it seems likely that our disbursements in this respect will tend to increase. I think, however, that as a community we are really paying less for this class of relief than in years gone by. Formerly it was the custom of those whose charitable instincts were aroused to circulate lists for each case as it arose. Often the amount collected for a single individual would run up to hundreds of yen, but latterly most of these applicants have been referred to the Charity Organization.

I must apologize for these extended remarks; I am afraid you may have been wearied. There are, however, two excuses to be offered. Firstly, it is several years since a public meeting was held to consider the affairs of the Organization. Secondly, there is the increased necessity for granting relief, and the fact that it must be administered by voluntary effort entails the sympathetic assistance of every resident, a sympathy which we feel can only be fully secured by bringing the entire facts to your notice.

Mr. G. G. BRADY said that while listening to the highly interesting and more than able remarks of the Chairman, he was sure that many around him must have murmured in the words of the Immortal Bard "for this relief much thanks." Mr. Sale had so aptly portrayed the history of and the necessity for the Yokohama Charity Organization; he had so amply explained to them the workings of its inner mechanism that he was convinced that once that speech were perused, or had been perused, by the Yokohama public, any necessary pecuniary aid would be readily forthcoming.—(Hear, hear.)

He would address one remark to the Chairman on one sentence in his speech in which he touched upon indiscriminate almsgiving. On that point, he, with others around him, must plead peccati. He had on many occasions given alms to what he considered deserving cases. He would merely mention one instance, that of a man who visited him at his office within the past three months, and who, from his speech, he (the speaker) deduced was a fellow countryman. He directed the man to the Consul, he sent him to the Salvation Army, he referred him to the Parson, he directed him to the Seamen's Mission, and he suggested to him the Charity Organization. Each visit apparently proved fruitless and he was sure it would take a far harder hearted man than himself to send such a person away. If fault there were it lay with the Organization and its Committee to eradicate and to centralize Yokohama's public charity. There should be one house, one office, one home for the dispensing of charity, and the whole public of Yokohama should be made aware of the fact that any wayfarer calling at his or her office or house must be at once referred to that one central home where immediate relief in food would be given and the merits of the case gone into afterwards. Let them do this and he was convinced that they would remove the evil which the Chairman had touched upon, indiscriminate charity. They would doubtless receive all the necessary pecuniary aid they required and would earn and deserve the heartfelt thanks and gratitude of the whole of this kindhearted community.—("Hear, hear," and applause.)

COMMISSIONER ESTILL rose to say that so far as the Salvation Army was concerned they would be most happy to take their part in the scheme which had been so clearly explained to them that afternoon. It was known of course that the Salvation Army had recently give up the Seamen's Institute, which had necessitated the re-considering of the whole question of relief from a different standpoint. If the scheme as explained to them that afternoon was carried out and the charity that was dispensed to those who needed it was centralized, he was sure that the difficulty so far as dealing with the wasters, if he might so call them, would be greatly minimized at least. There was always a number of deserving men destitute, but there were also the undeserving and the section of that particular scheme which provided that there should be a labour-yard, an arrangement whereby doubtful cases and wasters before receiving relief or in connection with being given relief, should be called upon to do some kind of labour as an equivalent for the relief they received. ("Hear, hear.") He need hardly say that the Salvation Army had had considerable experience in this particular class of work. He had seen it in operation in different parts of the world and his experience had led him to conclude that it would be the best system to adopt here to deal with the difficulty they had in this neighbourhood. If it was decided to carry out the scheme, then the Salvation Army would do its part so far as actually dealing with the work.—(Applause.)

The Rev. E. S. BOOTH, voicing the opinion of all old residents, expressed hearty appreciation of the work done by the Salvation Army in bettering the conditions of the port, and in providing for the relief of destitute seamen and others. Since they had been cooperating with the Charity Organization they had been particularly successful. (Hear, hear.) In order that they might come to some issue he would propose "that the incoming committee be authorized to make the necessary arrangements with the Salvation Army to look after those classes of seamen and others which may be in need of assistance in this port."

Mr. DE CUERS DE COGOLIN seconded and the proposition was carried unanimously.

Mr. JAS. WALTER said that before coming to the question of ways and means, he would point out that much of the indiscriminate charity just spoken of, came not from the men but from the women-folk. The beachcombers, knowing the hours in which the business man was absent from home, went to the Bluff and calling at the houses, forced the ladies through sheer fright to give them money. For that reason it would be difficult to stop the abuse. He suggested that some pressure should be brought to bear upon the different Consuls to see if these men could not be got away from the port if possible without touching the funds collected for the Charity Organization. These men were largely American and British seamen and therefore in regard to collecting money it should not be expected that large sums should be collected from all nationalities. The Germans and Swiss did not come upon the funds for aid. Every member of the Swiss community paid annually six yen to what was known as a Foundation Fund for the relief of destitute Swiss, who in that way did not come upon the Charity Organization. The same was largely, if not entirely, the case with the Germans. He did not know about other nationalities. The seamen touched by the Charity Organization were mostly American and British, more American than British, and some Norwegians. The number of Norwegians was small and much could not be expected from them.

Mr. F. W. HORNE stated that the American Consul also had at his disposal a fund for the relief of seamen of American nationality. This fund was contributed by American citizens, and he personally had collected 500 or 600 yen a few years ago, but he understood that this fund was about exhausted.

Mr. E. C. DAVIS was of opinion that the question largely came back to the case of Captains and shippers deliberately allowing their men to desert, with a view to replacing them with the cheaper and quieter Japanese seaman. He therefore moved:—"That the incoming Committee be requested to make enquiries as to the vessels upon which deserters were last engaged. If it be found that several men come from the same vessel representations to be addressed to the owner or agents or in case of need, to the proper Consular Authorities."

Mr. P. SANDBERG seconded, and the motion was carried.

Mr. A. E. WILEMAN stated that while British Consuls were always willing to render every assistance to deserving cases, their powers were really very limited and they were hedged in by Board of Trade and Foreign Office regulations, which latter did not apply to seamen; under these they could only render assistance to save the applicant from absolute death from starvation.

The CHAIRMAN said evidently there was not much hope of assistance from the Consuls. He suggested that the German, Swiss and American Funds might combine with the Charity Organization to prevent over-lapping. The next business was the election of the new committee. Personally he expected leaving Japan in the spring and he therefore suggested the following gentlemen for the new Committee.—Mr. Montague Beart, as Chairman; Mr. G. G. Brady, as Hon. Treasurer; Mr. P. Messer, as Hon. Secretary; Messrs. L. Mottet, J. A. Harmsen, Jas. Martin, H. C. Howard, the Rev. W. P. G. Field, and the American Consul-General, Mr. H. B. Miller.

Mr. A. G. MOREY WEALE formally proposed the names suggested by the Chairman and expressed the thanks of the community to the Chairman and Committee of the Charity Organization for their past labours. He dwelt upon the loss which the Organization would sustain by the retirement of its present Chairman, who amongst his many other public engagements for the public good, still found time and leisure to care for the interests of the poor and needy. ("Hear, hear.")

Mr. J. WILLIAMSON JONES seconded and the motion was carried unanimously.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman and other members of the Committee, proposed by Mr. A. Bellamy Brown, seconded by Mr. P. Messer, concluded the proceedings.

Walter Adsetts, who was arrested at Chefoo last month for the murder of Gertrude Dayton at Hongkong, arrived in the Colony on Sept. 23. A large crowd was present when he landed. The following morning he appeared at the Police Court to answer the charge, and pleaded not guilty. He was then remanded to Sept. 30th.

KEIHIN KEIBA CLUB.

The half-yearly adjourned meeting of the Keihin Keiba Club was held on Friday afternoon at the Foreign Board of Trade Rooms, No. 74. Mr. J. de Cuers de Cogolin was in the chair and there were over 30 present.

The minutes of last meeting were read by the Secretary, Mr. L. Mottu, and interpreted to the Japanese members by Mr. J. de Becker, who also interpreted the rest of the proceedings.

Mr. M. KIMURA wished to ask questions before the minutes were put to the meeting but as it appeared that they were not connected with the minutes the Chairman put the latter for adoption and they were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN presented the report of the supervisors who substantially approved of the accounts with a few alterations.

The report was as follows:—The Supervisors report that the accounts presented with the report of the Executive Committee are substantially correct and they recommend that the books of the Club be written up in accordance with the said accounts and that in future all receipts and expenditures by the Club or on behalf of the Club by the Kaisha be entered in the Club's accounts and submitted monthly to the Supervisors.

Mr. HIGGINBOTHAM read the alterations made in the accounts. The item of rent, etc., had been approved by the Basei Kyoku and now stood at yen 64,000, yen 6,992.76 for course improvement and improvement of horse breeding, yen 2,000 for charitable purposes, yen 1,000 reserved for the Club and yen 88 carried to the next account.

Mr. M. KIMURA pointed out that while the notice calling the meeting for the 23rd was issued on the 16th the report and accounts did not come out till the 23rd. He contended that by the articles of association notice of all matters to be discussed at the meeting ought to have been given at least a week before the meeting. He held that as the meeting was not properly called, anything done at it would be invalid and it ought to be dissolved.

Mr. SASAKI opposed this view.

Mr. M. STEPHENS proposed the passing of the report and accounts as approved by the supervisors.

Mr. BOUFFIER seconded.

Mr. KIMURA repeated his contentions and was again opposed by Mr. Sasaki who said there was nothing illegal about the meeting.

Mr. WURU held that the meeting was perfectly lawful and that they ought to go ahead and finish their business.

The report and accounts were then put to the meeting and adopted, Mr. M. Kimura protesting. He asked how many were present. There were 32 present and there were 83 proxies. Then he asked if everybody was in favour of the adoption of the report and accounts.

The CHAIRMAN said everybody was in favour.

The CHAIRMAN intimated that Mr. Mori, who had been elected to take the place of Mr. Dayet could not accept as he was too busy.

Mr. A. R. CATTO proposed Mr. S. Isaacs, who declined.

Mr. BOUFFIER proposed Mr. Wada and Mr. Gray seconded.

Mr. M. KIMURA proposed Mr. J. Kimura and Mr. Kawakita seconded.

Mr. SASAKI expressed a doubt whether such an election could take place without notice.

It was pointed out that the intimation as to Mr. Dayet's resignation was only made at the meeting of which this was the adjournment.

Mr. SAKUMA thought as there was some doubt they had better adjourn the meeting and have a new notice sent out for another meeting. Moreover he saw no special necessity for electing a member.

Mr. WOODWARD proposed under the rules, and Mr. Bouffier seconded, as a special extraordinary resolution that they proceed to the election.

The motion to proceed at once to the election was put to the meeting and carried.

Mr. HOOD protested that it was illegal to put and pass such a motion, as no notice was given; a vote was taken and Mr. Wada was declared elected.

In reply to Mr. M. Kimura the Chairman stated that he had voted in favour of Mr. Woodward's proposal.

Mr. M. KIMURA went on to call attention to irregularities in some of the proxies, pointing out that they ought to have been dated, as a date could afterward be inserted and they could be used for another meeting. It was explained to him that the proxies specified the date of the meeting at which they were to be used. He was still speaking when the meeting rose and dispersed.

YOKOHAMA AMATEUR DRAMATIC CLUB.

The annual meeting of the Yokohama Amateur Dramatic Club was held on Monday at the rooms of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade. Among those present were Messrs. C. F. McWilliams, W. S. Moss (Hon. Secretary), E. Eddison, A. E. Cooper, A. L. Robinson, O. Strom, Cyril Allen, J. M. Mollison, N. Buckle, A. H. Windett, G. G. Brady (Hon. Treasurer), A. L. Hudson, E. Drogkamp, B. C. Foster, E. Beart, A. J. Stacey, K. G. Hatfield.

Mr. E. C. DAVIS was in the chair.

On the motion of the Chairman seconded by Mr. McWilliams the minutes of last meeting were taken as read.

The CHAIRMAN in presenting the accounts said they made a very satisfactory showing. He thought many clubs would be glad to be on as sound a basis as this club was on. They had put on two pieces, to one of which, "A Pair of Spectacles," they owed most of their financial success, and were enabled to keep their heads well above water. He thought the future policy of the club should go on the same lines.

Mr. EDDISON thought the assets of the club should be shown in some way.

The CHAIRMAN said in the first place they were not realisable and were only of value to the club as a club.

In reply to Mr. Eddison,

Mr. BRADY said that under the new scheme of the Public Hall they would be allotted proper rooms.

On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Hudson, the report and accounts were adopted.

The Committee was then elected as follows: Mr. E. C. Davis, President; and Messrs. Cooper, C. H. P. Hay, F. W. R. Ward, McWilliams, G. S. Brady, and Eddison.

Mr. BRADY as Hon. Treasurer proposed that of the balance at the club's credit yen 1,000 should be invested in shares of the new Public Hall Association.

Mr. McWILLIAMS seconded and this motion was adopted.

The meeting was then closed.

REPORT.

The Committee have the pleasure of submitting their Report and Balance Sheet for the season 1906-1907.

"A Pair of Spectacles" was performed twice and was a marked success.

"Beauty and the Barge" was produced at very considerable expense. Four performances, one in aid of the Y. C. & A. C., were given, and the play proved to be one of the most successful the Club has put on.

A reference to the Club's Accounts will show the financial position to be a very satisfactory one, there being a credit balance of yen 1,327.62.

Cordial thanks are due to the numerous ladies and gentlemen who so kindly assisted in the Club's performances and to Mr. W. Ross for auditing the accounts.

W. STANLEY MOSS, Hon. Secretary.

TOKIO LITERARY AND MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The opening meeting of the new session will be held at 8.30 on the evening of Monday next, the 7th inst., in the Assembly Hall of the Methodist Publishing House (Kyobunkwan) 1, Ginza, Shichome, for the presentation of the following report and account and the election of officers and committees for the ensuing year.

It is gratifying to record that the responses to the invitation to form a Society in Tokio considerably exceeded expectations. Subscriptions have been received from 157 members altogether; nearly everyone who signified a desire to affiliate eventually took up membership. The average attendance was 85.

The Treasurer's Accounts shew a Bank balance of yen 16 94, after paying yen 175 on account of the new piano.

The net cost of the instrument, the purchase of which was sanctioned on the 8th February, was yen 862.26 and owing to the courtesy of the Rev. H. M. Landis, the Society is relieved from the immediate obligation of making a settlement. The amount still due is yen 687.26 plus interest.

The Officers and Committees tender their hearty thanks to those ladies and gentlemen who so kindly provided the various programmes and to all who helped to inaugurate the Society or at its meetings.

The retiring Officers and Committees are:—

President:—Rev. H. St. George Tucker.
Vice-President:—Mr. Ransford S. Miller.
Treasurer:—Mr. Thos. F. Nonweiler.
Secretary:—Mr. G. R. Bedinger.
Literary Committee:—Miss Green, Miss Thompson, Mr. E. D. L. Sweet and Mr. J. McD Gardiner.

THE LAW COURTS.

SHIPPING CASE.

The case in which Messrs. Langfeldt & Co. Ltd., claim yen 6,353.92 from Captain H. C. Killman, master of the sailing vessel Agenor belonging to the West Coast Commercial Co., America, came up again on Sept. 28th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nakamishi. Messrs. Charles H. Lily & Co. Seattle, were joined in the case as defendants.

Plaintiffs were represented by Mr. Nakamura, and defendants were absent. The intervenors were represented by Mr. Sato.

Counsel discussed the nature of two drafts which Messrs. Langfeldt & Co. received from Capt. Killman for what was necessary to continue the sailing vessel Agenor's voyage, and the money which the firm drew from the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation against the two documents.

The Judge decided to give judgment on Oct. 3rd.

CLAIM FOR MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

A case lodged by Messrs. F. J. Bluetner, A. M. Bluetner, and Dr. Paul R. Bluetner, carrying on business in Leipzig, Germany, against Mr. J. G. Doering claiming yen 4,338.81 for musical instruments sold to defendant, came up again on Sept. 30th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Muraoka.

It may be remembered that at the first hearing on Oct. 3rd last year judgment was given in favour of plaintiffs. Defendant, however, did not comply with the terms of the judgment and consequently plaintiff's Counsel petitioned for a decision enabling them to seize the property of defendant.

The Judge now ordered defendant to pay plaintiffs yen 4,338.81, together with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from Sept. 22nd, 1906, until the execution of judgment. Plaintiffs were allowed to seize the property of defendant on depositing one thousand yen.

OBJECTION TO ATTACHMENT.

The hearing of an application laid by a Chinaman named Chujin against Mr. Paul Helm, petitioning for the cancellation of forcible attachment of immovable property was resumed on Sept. 30th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Muraoka.

Referring to two letters which plaintiff's Counsel produced as evidence at the previous proceedings defendant's Counsel said that Chujin, Chao Wei, and other Chinamen who jointly own the houses built on lot No. 121, Yamashita-cho, made a contract on Oct. 1st, 23rd year of Kwang-hsu (about 1897) as to the dividend each was to get in accordance with the amount of capital they each invested. Nevertheless the registration of the building was made through Win Lo tung on April 18th of the same year at the Chinese Consulate. The registry seems to have been entered before the contract otherwise a dishonest trick was attempted merely with a view to supporting the present case.

Plaintiff's Counsel said that the contract in question was made in writing after the registration of the property. The registry was arranged to suit the convenience of the joint possessors of the buildings. Counsel asked the Judge for leave to examine Mr. Wu Tuck-tung, of the Chinese Consulate, as a witness.

The Judge decided to summon him on Oct. 21st.

CLAIM AS TO DISTRAINT.

In the Yokohama District Court before Judge Muraoka, an action instituted by Chao Fenshi and one other Chinaman petitioning for the cancellation of the seizure of a house by Mr. Paul Helm was heard on Sept. 30th.

Plaintiffs' Counsel said the abodes of G. Uye-lara, his son and their employee named M. Ogi who attended to the building of the house in question, were not known though Counsel asked the Court at the previous hearing to examine them as witnesses. Counsel asked the Judge to adjourn the proceedings until he could find them.

Defendant's Counsel stated that the witnesses required by plaintiff's Counsel seemed unimportant and there was no necessity to adjourn the case for them.

The Judge decided to adjourn the hearing till Oct. 21st.

CONTRACTOR'S ACTION.

An action filed by H. Matsune, a contractor of Aichi prefecture, against the Rising Sun Kerosene Oil Company, No. 27, Yamashita-cho, petitioning that defendants appoint an arbitration in a dispute which has arisen between the parties came up on Oct. 2nd in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Muraoka.

Plaintiff was represented by Mr. Shimidzu and defendants by Mr. Sawada.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that on Oct. 5th, 1904, the contractor entered into a contract with defendant for the construction of fourteen warehouses marked A. B. C. H. I. J. K. L. M. N. O. P. R. and S. at Nonai in Aomori prefecture, at a price of yen 68,541. After the conclusion of the building, defendants made an alteration in the warehouse marked "A." This change in construction cost yen 15,000 above the settled amount. On April 20th, 1905, plaintiff made a contract with defendants for the construction of four oil tanks, the capacity being 44 tons, 2,500 tons, 60 tons, and 500 tons respectively, for yen 24,000. On Aug. 1st, 1905, another contract was made between the parties on which plaintiff painted the foregoing fourteen warehouses for yen 1,250. The whole bill amounted to yen 95,821 of which yen 84,365 was paid by defendants, leaving a balance of yen 11,526. The construction works were concluded in November 1905. Defendants, however, did not pay the balance insisting that the work was imperfect though no defects were found in the works. Thereupon plaintiff asked defendants to appoint two arbitrators in accordance with the contract which provided that any dispute as to the construction should be settled through arbitrators. Plaintiff appointed S. Nimori, an expert of Aichi, and notified the appointment through the Yokohama Local Court on April 19th, 1906, and at the same time he asked defendants to appoint an arbitrator within seven days. Defendants did not do so.

Defendant's Counsel said that the contractor's work was not completed by plaintiff as stipulated in the contracts. The contractor replied to this protest that he was not willing to finish the work and asked to complete the remaining portion for which a deduction would be made. The remaining work was estimated at yen 7,362.50. After further investigation, defendants found that about yen 1,100 was needed to cover the estimate. The matter was arranged between the parties by mutual agreement, consequently there was no necessity to appoint arbitrators. On the other hand, in September, 1906, plaintiff sold to S. Koide the credit against defendants.

The parties produced evidence and gave explanations. At this stage, plaintiff's counsel asked the Judge to adjourn the proceedings as he had to prepare more evidence.

The Court adjourned the case till Oct. 28th.

LIEN HAN-HSING V. HARTLAND.

The hearing of an action lodged by a Chinaman named Lien Han-Hsing against Mr. J. C. Hartland petitioning for the alteration of a registration made on buildings began on Oct. 2nd in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Muraoka.

Plaintiff was represented by Mr. K. Mori and defendant by Mr. Sawada.

Defendant's Counsel said that on Dec. 22nd, 1902, Mr. Hartland lent twenty thousand yen to a third person, a Chinese named Kwan Wong-chong, the security consisting of three stone buildings and four brick buildings on lot No. 97, Yamashita-cho. Subsequently Mr. Hartland registered the property in the Yokohama Local Court. The property, however, was owned jointly with plaintiff, consequently the registration made by Mr. Hartland must be changed leaving only that portion which belongs to the third person.

Defendant's Counsel contended that plaintiff has no right over the buildings in question. Nevertheless, plaintiff lodged an action in 1903 in the Yokohama District Court presenting a similar statement to that given in the present case. His petition was dismissed there and also in two higher Courts. Such action should not be entertained by the Court under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The parties produced evidence, after which the Judge adjourned the proceedings till Oct. 28th at the request of plaintiff's Counsel.

AMERICAN MERCHANTS AND JAPANESE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

New York papers print the following letter which Mr. R. N. Harper, President of the Chamber of Commerce in Washington, has sent to various Chambers of Commerce in Japan:—

To the Tokio Chamber of Commerce, Tokio, Japan: Dear Sirs—Your letter of June 29 was received on July 30. In reply, as president of the Washington chamber of commerce and in behalf of its members, I desire to say that the satisfaction with which your people have viewed the growth of the cordial relations now existing between our two countries in the field of commercial trade cannot, I feel sure, exceed that of this country.

Our people aim to be liberal, far-sighted and just toward all countries, certainly in dealing with questions pertaining to the legitimate rights of aliens, and particularly would this be true if the treaty rights existing between America and any other nation should appear to be disregarded by any unwarranted act or deed on the part of the people of any section of this country.

This nation will not knowingly maintain a deaf ear to any well-founded appeal or criticism on the representative citizens of any other nation based upon the position taken by the people of a single section of the country.

No one recognizes or appreciates the value of the commercial relations existing between our two countries more than we, therefore we desire to assure you that it would be furthest from our wish that strained relations should spring up between your country and a section of ours, the ultimate result of which might be to imperil the pleasant and profitable relations at present existing between the two countries.

We share with you the views expressed in your letter, and trust it will be only a very short time before the recent confusion shall have become entirely a thing of the past, and that all doubts regarding the future relations shall have vanished.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A WARNING.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Sir,—Yesterday, during my consulting hours, a person calling himself F. Masuda called to obtain a subscription for "The Soldiers Families Relief Association." Being busy at that time it did not occur to me that this might be the person who collected a large sum of money from people of Yokohama and failed to apply it to its proper object. I have since ascertained that the name is the same, that an acquaintance of mine gave a large subscription and, failing to get a receipt, wrote to the society in question and found that no money had been paid in and that this person had been discharged. The Society was asked to prosecute and I understand that the police were communicated with.

If this be the same person, it is difficult to understand how he could be walking about in broad daylight collecting money for this or any Society. But it is still more difficult to understand why the Society in question did not warn the public that a defaulter was at large and bent on using its name for the purpose of swindling. I am told that the Society no longer collects subscriptions, but I am not certain if this information is correct. Whether the Society is still collecting or no, it owed a duty to the public to issue a warning against imposture. This laxity in dealing with crime, of which several instances have lately come under my notice, cannot fail to have a serious effect on public morality. A lack of public spirit in this respect cannot be too deeply deplored. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon the people of any country that each unit, whether it be an individual or a society, is responsible for crime which continues to be perpetrated under its cognizance.

Yours, etc., N. GORDON MUNRO,
Yokohama, Sept. 28th, 1907.

YOKOHAMA.

Governor Sufu issued an urgent warning on Sept. 27th in connexion with the appearance of cholera in Yokohama. He advises the public to pay close attention to the cleansing of their houses, etc. Especially he warns those who are concerned with landing and shipping.

The Yokohama Customs is continuing sanitary measures at the landing places, sheds, warehouses etc. since the appearance of plague in Yokohama at the beginning of this summer. Consequently no special arrangements have been made in regard to cholera.

The Harbour Police Office on Sept. 27th ordered all sampans, lighters, etc., not to stay at the hatoba longer than necessary for landing or embarking passengers or cargo.

Governor Sufu has been decorated by the Emperor of Korea with the First Order of Tai Keuk. On Sept. 26th, he was permitted by the Japanese Board of Decorations to wear the insignia.

Mr. K. Takahashi and another prominent capitalist of Yokohama project a canal between Yokohama and Tokyo for the transportation of cargo from and to steamers. Recently Governor Sufu gave permission to the promoters to survey the proposed route, which runs between Takashima-cho and Kawasaki via Kanagawa, Koyasu, Namamugi, and Tojima. As the districts beyond Kawasaki belong to Tokyo jurisdiction, the promoters have applied to Baron Senge, Governor of Tokyo, for a charter to survey the line. It is said that the Minister for Home Affairs will give a charter to the promoters.

The Yokohama Municipality and leading citizens will give a dinner party at 7 p.m. on October 9th at the Social Club, in the Public Garden, Yokohama, to celebrate the Russo-Japanese agreement. M. Bakhmeteff, Russian Minister, and his staff, the Russian Consul in Yokohama, Viscount Hayashi, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and fifteen other notables will be present.

Mr. R. Hiranuma and three other capitalists of Yokohama are endeavouring to establish in Yokohama an industrial bank with a capital of one million yen.

A carriage containing an American lady ran over a Japanese child at 2 p.m. on Sept. 27th at Yamamoto-cho, Bluff. The child sustained injuries on the head and face. The belto, named K. Saiki, was summoned and examined by the Bluff Police.

Three new cases of cholera appeared in Yokohama on Sept. 28th. One of the patients is Toyo (27), the wife of S. Kawakami, a surveyor, living at Hiranuma. Two others are sendo named S. Koshiba and M. Sugishita.

A number of coolies engaged in fighting on the night of Sept. 27th at Kanagawa, and T. Kimura and J. Sudzuki sustained severe injuries. The quarrel arose over a trifling matter.

An epidemic of meningitis seems to have commenced in Yokohama. On Sept. 22th, four cases of the disease appeared. The patients are four men who have been undergoing treatment at the Yokohama Hospital since Sept. 21st.

Cholera is very prevalent in Yokohama. On Sept. 29th, four cases were reported; and on Monday two. The patients are all sendo on various lighters. From the first appearance of the disease, the victim being a Portuguese named Anthony, to the present time, the cases number eighteen in all.

The Harbour Police have posted placards between Benten Bridge near the Railway Station, and at the English Hatoba, warning people that cholera has appeared among lightermen and consequently sea-water must not be used and fishing must not be pursued at the places concerned.

The term of office of Mr. M. Saito, first alderman of Yokohama, will expire on Oct. 14th. He has served twice and the city councillors are contemplating electing him for a third time.

Four new cases of epidemic meningitis appeared in Yokohama on Sept. 30th. According to the sanitary authorities, the disease seems to be prevalent among persons between fifteen and thirty years of age.

Oct. 4th being the anniversary of the birthday of Confucius, the Chinese merchants of Yokohama will give a dinner party at 6 p.m. at the Chinese Club. Count Okuma, some of the Ministers of State, and a number of leading politicians will be present.

H. Goto, a policeman of the Toke Station, has been attacked by dysentery. He was removed to the Manji Hospital on Sept. 30th.

Owing to the prevalence of cholera in Yokohama, principally among sendoes on lighters, sampans, and fishing boats, the Yokohama City Office has decided to temporarily supply free of charge water from the Yokohama Water Works to junks, etc.

A man about thirty years old, on the morning of Sept. 30th, was run over by a train while trying to pass the Futatsuya crossing at Kanagawa. He was crushed to death.

On Oct. 1st, three cases of cholera appeared at West Toke and South Ota in Yokohama. The same day, four cases of epidemic meningitis were reported, one of the patients being Mr. G. Takanashi, of the Yokohama branch of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha.

Professor Ladd left Yokohama at 2 p.m. on Oct. 2nd by the Aki Maru for America. Many Japanese educationists and some officials of the Foreign Office saw him off at the English Hatoba.

Mrs. Mary Ortiz, proprietress of the Shamrock Hotel, No. 137, Yamashita-cho, has been sentenced in the Yokohama Local Court to two months' imprisonment with hard labour and fined eight yen for procuring a Japanese maidservant of 14 years.

Two gentle shocks of earthquake were felt in Yokohama between 6 and 6 15 p.m. on Oct. 1st, the direction being from north to south.

Three Finns named Adolph Nicknen (30), F. Newman (20) and F. Yondre (38) have been punished at the Kaga-cho Police Office with three days' detention on a charge of having wandered about the public highway, without visible means of subsistence. After the expiration of their imprisonment, they will be delivered to the Russian Consul who intends to send them to Vladivostok. It is said that a few weeks ago these men came from Hakodate where they seem to have been discharged from a Russian vessel.

Early on the morning of Oct. 2nd, a case of incendiaryism was found at Hatsune-cho. The flames were put out before much damage resulted. A cloth soaked in kerosene oil was found at the place.

Four cases of cholera appeared in Yokohama on Oct. 2nd, the patient's being sendo, and members of their families. Another case was reported at Kamakura. This victim is a wealthy farmer named T. Sato. On the following day Some (4), a daughter of a sendo, was attacked by the disease.

During ten days ending Sept. 30th, the foreign trade of Yokohama was as follows: exports, yen 7,033,103; and imports, yen 4,002,393.

The Yokohama City Assembly will hold an extraordinary meeting at 3 p.m. on Oct. 8th to consider the election of first alderman of the city as the term of office of Mr. M. Saito will expire on Oct. 14th. It is generally believed that Mr. Saito will be re-appointed.

BASEBALL.

The result of the League match between the Y.C. and A.C. and Waseda University, played in Yokohama on Saturday was somewhat of a surprise. The local nine we know have been practising assiduously ever since the autumn weather set in, and considerable improvement had been noted in several of the players, but not one of their most fervent admirers expected that they would give the Waseda team the dressing-down they did. Ten runs to two seems an impossible margin, but that is the actual score and the Yokohama players are to be heartily congratulated upon it. Judging from Saturday's play it really looks as if Yokohama will recover "the ashes" from Kobe in the forthcoming Interport encounter. The game was remarkably free from errors, two going down against Ogawa of Waseda, while Becker and Walker made one each and Thompson two. The weakness of the Japanese team, as usual, was manifest at the bat; in the field they were excellent. It seems a pity that Japanese students and school boys when gathered in crowds are breaking away from the old traditions of the land in the manner of behaviour. On Saturday they were altogether unmanageable and seriously interfered with the game by encroaching upon the space set apart for play; and they were not amenable to reason when expostulated with, which is a bad sign. "Reverence" and consideration for others seem to be as much left out of modern Japan's educational curricula as they appear from Baron Kikuchi's observations to be in England. Score:

CHOLERA.

On Sept. 29th, eight cases of cholera were reported in Osaka.

A case of cholera is reported among the crew of the steamer Kaijo Maru which arrived at Dairen on the evening of Sept. 28th.

A Moji telegram says that a case of cholera appeared among the crew of the British steamer Borneo, which arrived there on Sept. 27th from Shanghai. The vessel was removed to the quarantine station on Sunday.

Two cases of cholera were reported in Tokyo on Sept. 29th. One of the victims is Mr. S. Yamanaka, chief engineer on the Kichirin Maru, which arrived at Yokohama on Sept. 27th from Kobe. A suspicious case of plague is reported in Hongo, Tokyo.

A new case of cholera was reported in Tokyo on Sept. 28th the patient being a sendo on a lighter.

A fresh case of cholera was reported on Sept. 30th in Tokyo. The patient is a sendo on a lighter which arrived from Yokohama with salt.

A fresh case of cholera was reported in Tokyo on Oct. 1st.

Two new cases of cholera have occurred at Senju and Honjo respectively in Tokyo. The patients are sendoes on lighters plying to Yokohama.

LECTURE ON THE PHILIPPINES.

But a mere handful of people—thirty all told—gathered in the Van Schaick Hall on Tuesday evening to listen to the lecture on the Philippines which Miss Norton had kindly consented to give under the auspices of the Girls' Club. Of course it must be acknowledged that the public notice given of the lecture was very short, still the support accorded was lamentably disappointing. Those who might have been present will learn with regret that they missed a very interesting lecture, a lecture delightfully delivered, beautifully phrased and infused with those delicate touches of personal feeling which only an observant, highly cultured woman can give. After a pianoforte solo by Miss Condon, Miss McCullum, in introducing the lecturer, explained the reason why scant notice had been given of the event. Miss Norton had promised the Girls' Club to lecture for them and the offer had been gratefully accepted. However Miss Norton's stay in Japan was limited and as she was leaving for home that week, travelling through Korea and Siberia, there was nothing for it but to have the lecture at once.

Miss Norton's lecture was illustrated with some beautiful lantern views, showing types of the many races which people the Philippines, scenes around the coast of the archipelago and inland. She seemed to have thoroughly engaged her four years sojourn in the islands and to have thoroughly identified herself with the aspirations of the people.

Miss McCullum, in the name of the Girls Club and the audience, thanked Miss Norton for her interesting lecture, the sentiments being heartily endorsed by those present.

Two songs sweetly sung by Miss Jeanie Booth—"Do you love me?" and "The Sweetest Flower that blows," and a reading by Miss McCullum from Jerome K. Jerome's "Sketches in Lavender, Green and Blue," concluded the programme.

A vote of thanks to the performers, proposed by one of the audience, brought the proceedings to a close.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

The following report and accounts will be presented at the annual general meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society to be held in Van Schaick Hall on Friday evening next:—

The Committee of the Yokohama Literary Society in presenting the 22nd annual report are glad to note that the membership list has improved upon that of 1905-4, hitherto the best season in the Society's records, as borne out by the following figures:—

	1903-4	1904-5	1905-6	1906-7
Lady members.....	129	121	110	138
Gentlemen members...	162	156	155	165
Family tickets.....	15	20	21	23

On the whole the meetings were fairly well attended while the number of invitations issued to friends was larger than ever, showing the interest taken in the programmes outside the ranks of the Society.

The Treasurer's accounts, notwithstanding the heavy expenditure involved in the purchase of the new piano (yen 800) show a surplus of yen 195, and it will therefore be possible for the incoming committee, with the probability of an almost unfettered income, to arrange for a larger number of illustrated lectures in the forthcoming season.

To the ladies and gentlemen who generously contributed to make the musical portion of the programmes so great a success throughout the season the hearty thanks of the Committee are hereby tendered. Again the Society is greatly indebted to many gentlemen outside the ranks of the Society for some excellent lectures during the season and to them as well as to members who also spoke, hearty thanks are cordially rendered.

The papers read before the Society last season comprised the following:—

Oct. 26th.....	"Rudyard Kipling: an Appreciation".....	Mr. P. E. Nicolle.
Nov. 9th.....	"From San Francisco to Samoa".....	Mr. K. Lewis.
Nov. 23rd.....	"A Seventeenth Century Poet".....	Prof. A. Lloyd.
Dec. 7th.....	"The Battlefields of Manchuria".....	Rev. J. H. de Forest.
Dec. 21st.....	"Christmas Entertainment, 'Merchant of Venice,' etc."

Jan. 4th.....	"Words and Meanings".....	Mr. T. Satchell.
January 18th.....	Welsh Music and the Fisteddod.....	Mr. F. Griffiths.
Feb. 1st.....	"Some Old Love-Letters and their Writers".....	Mr. A. Bellamy Brown.
Feb. 15th.....	"Celebration of Longfellow's Centennial".....	The President, Mr. J. P. Mollison and Others.
March 1st.....	"Edward Grieg: his life and work".....	Mr. W. Karl Vincent.
March 15th.....	"Thomas Moore, the Bard of Erin".....	Mr. A. W. Sherriff.
April 12th.....	"A little known Klondyke Trail".....	Mr. J. M. McGregor.
April 26th.....	"An Evening with Balfe".....	Mr. A. W. Quinton.

Owing to the scanty number of entries received for the Musical and Literary Competitions during the previous year, and the entire absence of interest shown in them at the opening of last session, the Committee decided to discontinue this feature of its work.

In closing their Report the Committee would again earnestly impress upon members the necessity of notifying the Hon. Secretary of any changes in address, or departure from or return to Yokohama. Such notices would greatly facilitate the work of the executive officers, besides removing all annoyance to members caused by cards going to an old address or to members who are temporarily absent from Yokohama.

The Officers and Committees during the past year were as follows:—

Mr. A. Bellamy Brown.....	President
Mr. W. Karl E. Vincent.....	Vice-President.
Mr. W. Mounjoy Squire.....	Treasurer.
Mr. J. E. Gray.....	Secretary.
Literary Committee.....	Dr. J. L. Dearing, Mr. A. W. Sherriff, Mr. J. E. Gray, Mr. W. Karl E. Vincent.
Musical Committee.....	Miss Blundell, Mr. J. Macbeth, Miss J. E. Moss, Miss E. P. W. Skrimshire, Mr. B. C. Foster, Mr. C. H. Thoru.

J. E. Gray, Hon. Secretary.

Hon. Treasurer.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. Li Kia-chu, new Chinese Minister to Tokyo, arrived at Shanghai on Sept. 26th from Chekiang on his way to Japan.

The Bachelors of Kobe beat the Married men hollow at cricket on Saturday, the Bachelors scoring 195 runs to the Benedicts 16.

An official report shows that the birth rate of the French Canadians in Montreal is 47.66 per thousand; that is, three times the birth-rate of Paris and double that of New York.

The Kobe Herald says that a ruffian named Onishi Masago was arrested on the 20th. at Nishijin-machi, Fukuoka. He has confessed to having broken into over four hundred and fifty houses, securing articles to the value of yen 50,000. He also admitted that he had violated over fifty women, mostly wives of men of good standing.

Owing to the prevalence of cholera, the Tokyo Sanitary authorities have provided temporary offices at Shimbashi, Shinagawa and Omori to examine passengers from western places.

Mr. G. Hayashi, Minister in Peking, who has been staying in Tokyo for some weeks on official business, left Shimbashi on Oct. 1st by the 6.15 p.m. train. He will embark by the cruiser Nantwa at Shimonoseki.

The Dampo reports that the Russian and Japanese commissioners have nearly concluded the work of delimiting the boundary between North and South Saghalien. Most of the Japanese surveyors have already returned to Aomori.

The N.Y.K. steamer Inaba Maru has brought out to Japan twenty-one stud horses, including two or three mares. The animals, which were shipped at Antwerp, were bought in Europe for the Imperial Stud, and each of them is said to have cost over yen 10,000. One of the horses is to be sent to Kagoshima, the others being handed over to representatives of the Imperial Stud on the arrival of the steamer at Yokohama. The animals were originally twenty-two in number, but one of them died during the voyage.

We learn from Shanghai papers that Mr. Ward Eyre Favorite, of Messrs. Mustard & Co., was participating in a game of baseball at that port on Sept. 21st, when at almost the conclusion of the game he suddenly discarded his glove and walked toward the match, remarking as he went that he was too ill to continue play. He was seen to collapse and Dr. S. E. Sellers of the U.S.S. Williamington, who was on the ground, immediately went to his aid, but found that death had ensued, apparently from heart failure. The police were notified, an ambulance was brought to the ground and at the request of Mrs. Favorite, who in the meantime had been apprised of the distressing event, the dead man was taken to his home. Dr. Marsh subsequently held a post-mortem examination and pronounced death due to heart failure. An officer from the United States Consulate thereupon decided to dispense with an inquest. Mr. Favourite, who had been in the American Marine corps, was well known and much liked.

RAILWAY DIRECTORS FIGHT.

The American papers were greatly diverted by the little display of fisticuffs which occurred at the regular monthly meeting of the directors of the Illinois Central in August between Mr. Stuyvesant Fish and Mr. John T. Harahan. Mr. Fish called Harahan "one of Harriman's tools and puppets." Mr. Harahan denied the soft impeachment and moved the adjournment of the meeting, thus preventing Mr. Fish putting a resolution: then Mr. Fish hit Mr. Harahan and Mr. Harahan hit the floor. The staid and sober New York Commercial in its account of the fight said:—

Mr. Fish is a big man. He weighs upward of 210 lbs., stands over six feet and is of brawny build. But he has always kept himself in perfect condition, is as hard as he is heavy and quick to a degree that belies his bulk. His weight accordingly did not impede his movements, as he jumped across the table and swung at Mr. Harahan all in one moment.

Mr. Harahan had assumed a posture of defence and looked like no mean antagonist. Though not as heavy as Mr. Fish, he weighs around 190 pounds and has kept himself in good condition. It was a contest of heavyweights, with Mr. Fish having but a bit the best of it in weight and reach though of undoubted superiority in science.

The first and only blow was a long right hand swing, with all the weight of Mr. Fish's 210 pounds behind it and all the added strength which a feeling of insult and animosity impart. It broke through Mr. Harahan's guard as if his hands were tissue and landed, with but little diminished impact, squarely on the point of the jaw. Mr. Fish followed it with a vicious straight left, but the left missed. Mr. Harahan was dropping and the failure of the left to land caused Mr. Fish to fall over upon his antagonist. He was up in an instant, but Mr. Harahan was not. Not exactly down and out, he was stunned at least and evinced no inclination to continue the contest.

None of the other directors interfered except by admonitions. The others present were Cornelius Vanderbilt, Robert Walton Goelet, Walter Luttinger, Charles A. Peabody, A. G. Hackstaff, Charles M. Beach and James De W. Cutting. Only the latter two are Fish's supporters. Mr. Goelet, it was said, left the room instantly and hurriedly. Mr. Vanderbilt, according to reports, attempted to quiet the belligerents. All were in a state of intense excitement, but none of them advanced to take part in the fracas. Mr. Fish having recovered his composure, walked over, picked up his hat, nodded pleasantly to the others and left the room without saying a word.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTERS'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

CASA BLANCA.

London, September 26.

The French are fortifying the neighbourhood of Casa Blanca to guard against the event of the force under Muley Hafid joining the rebels against General Drude.

OBITUARY.

Colonel Donne is dead.

[Col. Donne was born on Oct. 4, 1856, and served through many expeditions.—E.D. J.M.]

NEWFOUNDLAND AFFAIRS.

Later.

An Order in Council has been gazetted at St. John's under the authority of the Imperial Act of 1819 (?) legally sanctioning the modus vivendi. The organ of Sir R. Bond, the Colonial Premier, says that the Colonial Cabinet has refused to participate in the publication of the Order and it urges that the Cabinet should repudiate the outrageous action and appeal to the other self-governing colonies to vindicate the colony's rights. Sir R. Bond in an interview said he was determined to uphold the sovereignty of the colony's laws.

LIPTON'S CHALLENGE.

It is reported from New York that the New York Yacht Club has declined Lipton's challenge for the America's cup.

RIOT ON THE RAND.

In a riot at Johannesburg of coolies under notice of repatriation, who refused to make up time lost by unauthorised absence, the police fired volleys, wounding 15.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN "ENTENTE."

The Anglo-Russian agreement absorbs public interest. The papers expect the Cabinet to consider the question of a reduction of the forces in India, though military opinion is opposed to this on the ground of native unrest.

WHY LIPTON'S CHALLENGE WAS REFUSED.

London, Sept. 26.

The New York Yacht Club's refusal to accept Sir Thomas Lipton's challenge was due to the challenge giving no dimensions of the challenger while imposing new and special conditions in regard to the type, size and power of the defender.

FURTHER CONFERENCES IN MOROCCO.

Kaid Sidebarbi, envoy of the Sultan, has arrived at Casablanca to consult with the French. Four more tribes have sent delegates to discuss terms of peace.

The market at Casablanca has been reopened.

DISASTER IN THE MIDI.

Heavy rains and widespread floods are reported from the country round Montpellier. Vineyards are devastated and there have been a number of fatalities. Hundreds of sheep have perished, and several villages are under water.

RIVAL ATLANTIC COMPANIES.

The Hamburg-America Line has ordered from Belfast a liner larger than the new Cunarders, with combination turbines and reciprocating engines.

CANADA AND JAPAN.

At Ottawa the Canadian Manufacturers' Association passed a resolution to the effect that it would be disastrous to abrogate the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, which had greatly developed trade between Canada and Japan.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN CONVENTION AND GERMANY.

Official circles in Berlin state that the Government is friendly to the Convention, the treaty not affecting German commercial interests. This is the view of a section of the Press. Another section considers the treaty the copingstone in the building of the British coalition policy.

THE "LUSITANIA."

London, September 28.

The Lusitania has arrived at Queenstown. She completed her eastward voyage in five days four hours and nineteen minutes, beating the Lucania's record, but the Deutschland still holds the speed record.

SIR W. LAURIER ON THE SITUATION.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Canadian Premier, in the course of speeches delivered in Toronto, said that British diplomacy regarding Canadian affairs had been a record of the sacrifice of Canadian interests. With reference to the Japanese treaty, Canada was only just beginning to reap the benefit of it. Denunciation of the treaty would be an act of panic. The Government did not propose to denounce the Treaty but it needed time to reflect and inquire. He hinted at the appointment of a commission, but was less inclined to annul the treaty in view of the "all red route" project.

NEW ZEALAND.

London, September 29.

The inauguration of New Zealand as a dominion has been celebrated at Wellington with appropriate ceremonies.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

The Newfoundland Government has apparently decided to avoid all conflict with the Imperial Government by freeing colonials from all local restrictions.

MOROCCO.

General Drude reports that only six tribes have not submitted.

CANADA.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has explained that Canada became a party to the Japanese treaty because it was thought that Japan had prohibited general emigration, especially to Canada.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

The New York correspondent of the Times comments on the deplorable behaviour of the American press towards Japan and the sneering references to Japan's quiescence since the Pacific cruise was arranged as compared with her constant diplomatic hectoring previously.

THE AMERICAN BATTLESHIPS.

London, September 29.

It is stated in Washington that the departure of the battleships for the Pacific will be delayed for two months owing to the necessity of repairs.

MR. TAFT INTERVIEWED.

Mr. Taft in an interview said that America and Japan would always be friends. He had no mission to Japan except to bear friendly greetings and to visit old friends en route to Manila. He denied that America had any intention of selling the Philippines.

MORE TROUBLE AT CASABLANCA.

London, September 30.

A torrential downpour at Casablanca has rendered the French and Spanish camps mere swamps and an outbreak of fever is feared.

BIG RAILWAY SMASH IN OHIO.

Fifteen persons were killed and twenty injured, several fatally, at Bellaire, Ohio, in a collision between a Chicago express and a goods train.

LONDON'S LORD MAYOR.

Sir John Bell has been elected Lord Mayor of London.

GERMANY'S INTERESTS IN PERSIA.

The semi-official Norddeutsche Zeitung declares that during the course of the Anglo-Russian negotiations both sides assured Germany that where German interests came into question they would be respected. The Convention shows that Germany's economic interests in Persia are in no wise disadvantageously affected. It reiterates that Germany has no political interests in Persia.

PERILS OF BALLOONING.

London, October 1.

Nineteen balloons ascended in Paris yesterday in a distance competition. This morning a trawler picked up one fifteen miles off the Suffolk coast. Fifteen have descended in France, but the remaining three are missing and much anxiety is being entertained regarding them.

A telegram from Paris says all the balloons are safe.

ANOTHER TRAIN WRECK.

The San Francisco-St. Louis express has been derailed westward of St. Louis. The overturned cars ignited and many persons perished in the flames.

THE KAISER'S ENGLISH VISIT.

Prince von Buelow will probably accompany the Kaiser to England.

The Kaiser and Kaiserin have accepted an invitation to visit the Guildhall on the 13th of November, to receive an address and lunch with the Lord Mayor.

CANADA AND JAPAN.

In Ottawa it is reported that Minister

Cartwright will be appointed a Commissioner to arrange with the Japanese authorities a scheme to limit the immigration of Japanese into Canada.

RUGBY FOOTBALL.

A team of New Zealand professional Rugby football players, including four of the ex-amateurs of the 1905 team, have arrived in England to tour with the Northern Union Clubs.

BRITISH FINANCIAL RETURNS.

London, October 2.

The revenue for the first half of the financial year amounted to £63,031,302, showing an increase of £883,490.

ILLNESS OF A COLONIAL STATESMAN.

A telegram from Sydney states that the Hon. J. H. Carruthers, Premier, Colonial Treasurer, and Minister for Railways, has been suddenly seized by illness and has resigned. The Hon. C. G. Wade, Attorney-General and Minister of Justice, has reconstructed the Cabinet.

CANADA TO PAY JAPANESE CLAIMS.

London, October 2.

From Ottawa it is reported that the Dominion Government has decided to pay the Japanese claims which amount to six thousand dollars. For this compensation the Vancouver municipality will be held liable.

MR. HEIR HARDIE IN INDIA.

Mr. Heir Hardie, M.P., who is presently touring Bengal and making an investigation into native unrest, is reported to have said that conditions in India are worse than in Russia and more horrible than the Armenian atrocities. He declared that India must be self-governing like Canada.

The English press strongly condemns Mr. Hardie's tour as being of the most mischievous character.

THE AMERICA'S CUP.

Sir Thomas Lipton has telegraphed to the Royal Irish Yacht Club regretting that a race for the America's Cup must be abandoned as it is impossible to build a yacht to cross the Atlantic that can compete on equal terms with a yacht that does not have to cross.

ROOSEVELT STANDS PAT.

President Roosevelt, speaking at Peoria, Ill., denied that recent financial weakness was due to his attitude towards Corporations transgressing the law. He admitted that it might have contributed but so long as he was President that policy would not be changed.

(By Special Arrangement with the "Tokyo Asahi Shimbun.")

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, September 25.

It is reported from Paris that the Anglo-Russian agreement has been hailed with unqualified satisfaction. The French believe that Russia is earnestly resolved to devote herself to internal recuperation and to recovering her position in the Far East.

CANADA AND JAPAN.

Ottawa, September 26.

Mr. Borden, the leader of the Opposition, speaking at Vancouver, admitted that the Japanese treaty must be observed until abrogated, and that the fullest reparation must be made. He added that the Conservatives were determined that British Columbia should remain British.

SUBMARINE MINES.

London, September 27.

At the Hague Conference the third Committee for the regulation of submarine mines again discussed the subject. None of the British amendments which would have restored the restrictions originally adopted secured adequate support, and the regulations adopted are altogether inadequate. The Committee ratified the regulation that belligerents when using unanchored mines must have them constructed in such a way that they become innocuous an hour after being beyond human control. They must also use only such anchored mines as become innocuous an hour after breaking moorings.

CASABLANCA.

Important progress has been made in the peace negotiations. Four more tribes have surrendered.

THE ANGLO RUSSIAN CONVENTION.

In Berlin the majority of the papers indulge in ingenious attempts to decide whether England or Russia has got the better of the bargain under the Convention.

The Krens Zeitung declares that Great Britain aspires to convert the Persian Gulf into a second Suez Canal.

The St. Petersburg newspapers say that the only misgivings about the result of the Convention arise from fears of German intrigue, where to Russian opinion is particularly sensitive owing to the disasters of the war with Japan.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, Sept. 27.

According to the Canadian Director of the Bureau of Immigration Affairs, the admission of Japanese will not hereafter be permitted unless they have passports directly for Canada. The arrival of Japanese from Hawaii will thus be prohibited. On Sept. 27th, the Canadian Government decided to send one of the members of the Ministry to Japan with a view to conducting negotiations with Japan with regard to the emigrants question.

With reference to a rumour that Mr. Metcalf, American Secretary of State for the Navy, has tendered his resignation, it is said that he will not resign during the term of President Roosevelt.

Secretary Root on Sept. 26th received a telegram from Mr. Rockhill, American representative in Peking, to the effect that Mr. Wu Cheng-fang has again been appointed Minister to Washington. It is said that the American Government will probably lodge a protest as to the appointment of Mr. Wu Cheng-fang having regard to a certain circumstance when he last occupied the position some years ago.

It is rumoured that Mr. Taft will visit Russia to conclude an agreement with that country. It was reported from St. Petersburg on Sept. 26th that war between Japan and America is believed to be unavoidable.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

London, September 28.

The Times has a strong leader in which it condemns the position taken up by Germany with regard to the regulation of submarine mines. It says that the proceedings at the Hague strikingly illustrate the hypocrisy underlying the doings of the Conference. The subject as debated at the plenary sitting on Friday was whittled down to mere illusory provisions.

THE BATTLESHIPS' CRUISE.

It is reported from New York that the battleships will go to the Pacific in the winter. The Washington correspondent of the New York Times, on apparently unquestionable authority, declares that the cruise is the result of constant Japanese diplomatic hectoring. The American Government has practically exhausted all the resources of friendly diplomacy in trying to meet the captious Japanese. The Times correspondent says that Americans seem angry because Japanese has dared to stand up for her rights. The attitude of the press is distinctly provocative. Sneering references are made to Japanese quiescence since the movement of the battleships was announced.

THE BATTLESHIP SQUADRON.

London, September 29.

The New York Sun editorially states that the battleships are going to the Pacific for ultimate war with Japan. Roosevelt's plans are insane but there is little hope that Congress will oppose them.

FLOODS IN FRANCE.

Serious storms and floods have taken place in the south of France. Thousands of people are imprisoned in their houses, and a great number are out of work.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, September 29.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Canadian Premier, delivered a speech to-day at a meeting of manufacturers held in Toronto. In the course of the address he said that Japanese are strong competitors with Canadian trade in India. They enjoyed special privileges under the treaties. The Canadian-Japanese Commercial Treaty was concluded in accordance with the earnest desire of manufacturers and merchants. Canadian trade with Japan was gradually developing. In conclusion, the Premier said that though some asked for the abrogation of the Treaty because of the recent trouble in British Columbia no responsible person would support such a proposal.

Mr. Maclean, a representative of California, is reported to have said in his electoral division that the Federal Government has no right to interfere in the immigration affair and that the Californians must carry out their purpose with regard to the expulsion of foreign labourers. He said that at the next session of Congress, a serious dispute will take place between the administration and the representatives of California.

In reply to a question by the Police Commissioners of San Francisco with regard to Japanese employment agencies, Mr. Devlin, District Attorney, said that the Federal Government is willing to treat Japanese like other foreigners. Next week, the commissioners will come to a decision as to the Japanese employment business.

The Virginia and three other American cruisers under Rear-Admiral Dayton arrived at San Francisco on Sept. 28th from Honolulu. An enthusiastic welcome was given to them.

San Francisco, September 30.

It is reported that Japanese fishermen have poached seals in Bristol Bay, Alaska, and further stole domestic animals and goods.

According to a telegram from Ottawa, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Canadian Premier, has received a resolution which was adopted by a union representing manufacturers throughout Canada. The main feature of the resolution is that the manufacturers are devoting themselves to the further development of commerce on the Pacific, and do not desire to abrogate the Japanese-Canadian Treaty. They also advise the Government not to listen to the agitation against Japan.

An American Judge at Portland (Oregon) has said that there is no law prohibiting the landing of foreigners without passports, in America. After his declaration, the landing of a number of Japanese who have no passports was permitted. Anxiety is being entertained among the anti-Japanese agitators as to whether the regulations prohibiting the entry of Japanese from Hawaii are to be rendered futile by the view adopted by this Judge.

The Republicans have selected as Mayor of San Francisco Mr. Ryan; the Labourers, McCassey, and the Democrats, Mr. Taylor, the present Mayor. The labourers are expected to be successful.

THE BRITISH ARMY.

London, October 1.

Sir Edward Grey, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, speaking at Newcastle, trusted that all classes would make sacrifices to support the new territorial army. Any weakening of the Navy would be such a disaster that no amount of conscription could possibly compensate for the danger involved.

FRANCE AND HER ARMY.

From Paris comes news that the Minister of Public Instruction and the ex-premier, M. Meline, in the course of speeches severely condemning anti-militarism pointed out that an army was necessary for commercial prosperity, instancing the rapid progress of Japan and Germany. It is the general impression that the authorities ought to summarily check the movement which is increasing in audacity.

JAPANESE STOCKS.

On the stock exchange Japanese stocks are slightly lower as a result of American newspaper utterances.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, October 2.

The St. Petersburg Novoye Vremya, reviewing the Anglo-Russian Convention, declares that German policy is based on sowing discord between Russia and England. With this object Russia was inveigled into Asiatic adventures. Germany embodies the only serious menace to European peace.

JAPANESE IN CANADA.

The Ottawa Government has ordered Mr. Munro, immigration agent at Vancouver, to stop demanding passports from Japanese, which violates the treaty.

THE PROPOSED HAGUE COURT.

Viewing the diversity of opinions concerning the new court of arbitral justice at The Hague, it is understood that the scheme was only presented as a suggestion to the various Governments and is no solution of the question of the distribution of judges.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.

San Francisco, October 2.

President Roosevelt left Washington on Sept. 30th for the central and southern states. The tour is expected to take about one month. He intends to investigate public feeling as to the forthcoming presidential election.

In the cities throughout Canada, anti-Asiatic societies are being organized. They will strongly oppose the entry of Orientals into Canada.

The cordial welcome extended to Mr. Taft has caused good feeling in America.

BRITISH NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

About the middle of October, combined manœuvres by the Channel, Atlantic, and Home Fleets will be held under the command of Lord Charles Beresford. The plan is based on the outbreak of war with Germany. No foreign officer or journalist will be permitted to be present at the manœuvres except Japanese officers.

INDIA.

London, October 2.

In view of the possibility of a serious illicit movement in India, the Times has begun publishing special memoirs of the mutiny in 1857 by Field-Marshal Wood. The Times says editorially that the agitators have terrorised East Bengal and that the situation is serious. It severely condemns Keir Hardie, who is touring the province making inflammatory speeches.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

JAPANESE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

On the 25th ultimo judgment was delivered in the case of Japanese claims for damages on account of the injured restaurants in San Francisco. The Court rejected the claim of $2,000 for consequential damages, but in the matter of direct damages the plea of non-jurisdiction advanced by the Municipality was declared invalid, and an order was made for the Municipality to present its defence within ten days.

(From the above it appears that the consequential damages were disallowed, but the San Francisco Municipality was held liable for the direct damages.—Ed. J.M.)

THE TROUBLE AT MUKDEN.

With regard to the violent conduct of the police at Mukden, the Chinese authorities have publicly removed from office as a punitive measure the Chief of the Police Office. They have also issued instructions that constables must be ordered to treat foreigners politely in future, and have undertaken that similar trouble shall not recur in the future. They have further paid an indemnity.

SHIPPING CASUALTY.

The Japanese steamer XIV Nagata Maru (668 tons) took fire on the 30th ultimo at 7 p.m. and went to the bottom. There were no casualties. This news is telegraphed from Chefoo.

THE CHIENTAO QUESTION.

With reference to the Chientao question the Chinese Government has despatched 40 soldiers from Mukden and has appointed Mr. Chen to be boundary commissioner, asking the Japanese to confer with him. But the Japanese have declined, alleging that there is no occasion for such procedure.

RICE.

Owing to favourable weather, prices of rice have fallen though the market has been disturbed by the operations of speculators. A further fall is expected.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

The market has become firm. All bonds and shares have risen. It is reported in business circles that the rice crop is apparently better than in previous years, foreign trade is favourable, various enterprises are successful, the money market is easy and there is no cause for anxiety as to Government finance though there is a report of slight difficulty in drafting the budget for the forthcoming year.
